

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE SPEECHES OF
SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

ECCLESIASTICAL CORPORATIONS.—INDEPENDENCE OF THE CHURCH.

APRIL 2, 1829.

MR. STANLEY moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the laws respecting the leasing power of Bishops and Ecclesiastical Corporations in Ireland."

Mr. Hume having intimated his intention to introduce certain amendments into the bill, with the view of reducing the incomes of the bishops in Ireland,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he saw no immediate objections to the motion of the hon. member; but he should receive it with great caution, if he conceived it aimed at the spoliation of the church. He could never consent to make the Church of Ireland stipendiary on the Crown. The property of the church ought to be made as secure to its possessors as the property of the aristocracy of Ireland. Respectability was secured to the proprietors of these lands in the same way as other proprietors of lands enjoyed respectability from their situation. This landed property made the clergy independent of the Crown. He had no objection to the introduction of the bill; but he entirely disclaimed a participation in the designs of the hon. member for Montrose. He was satisfied the proposition of the hon. mover did not involve any such designs as those mentioned by the hon. member for Montrose. He was sure it was the hon. mover's intention, while he endeavoured to confer a general benefit on the country, by improving agriculture, not to trench on the rights and privileges of the bishops. He hoped the bill would be discussed on its own merits, without reference to the menace of the hon. member for Montrose.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

CHESHIRE POLICE BILL.

APRIL 13, 1829

Mr. Egerton having moved the order of the day for the second reading of the Cheshire Police Regulation Bill, Mr. Leycester objected to the measure, and moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL denied that the bill was entitled to the appellation of a private bill. He found in the preamble that it was a bill for the better prevention of crime in the county of Cheshire; and he really thought that that circumstance afforded a sufficient reason for his now appearing in the House. As one of the Secretaries of State, he felt himself bound to take a part in the discussion, and to declare, that if the county of Chester were willing to bear the expense of this improvement, he saw no objection to the magistrates making the trial. The hon. member had asserted, that justice was well administered by the local magistracy; but when he looked to the increasing expenses attendant upon the conviction of criminals in the county of Chester, he could not believe that some reformation might not be effected. It had, indeed, been in his contemplation to apply a measure somewhat resembling that contained in the bill to all the counties of England; and he had even wished the hon. member for the county to postpone the bill for some time with that object; but it was found, from the nature of the subject, and the number of concurrent jurisdictions, that the previous enquiries must necessarily be very extended, and would occupy a very considerable period. Feeling, therefore, that the present bill would be an improvement, and recollecting the number of applications which were constantly made at the Home Office for the assistance of the Bow-street officers, he willingly gave his support to an attempt to organise an efficient local police. He begged, however, to say, that although he did not acknowledge this to be quite a private bill, he should abstain from voting upon it, lest he should be supposed to interfere with local interests; although he strongly recommended the hon. member to permit the bill to pass through its present stage, in order that its provisions might be thoroughly examined in the committee.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the bill read a second time.

METROPOLITAN POLICE IMPROVEMENT BILL.

APRIL 15, 1829.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL rose. He said, he was desirous, now that the attention of the House and the public was no longer directed to a subject which had so long excited the warmest feeling and the most anxious solicitude of all classes of his Majesty's subjects, both Catholic and Protestant, of leading the House to the consideration of a topic of considerable interest as respected the preservation of the rights of property, as well as the protection of the persons of his Majesty's subjects. He was about to draw their attention to the state of the criminal jurisprudence of this country, and that of the existing police established for the prevention of crime as well as its detection. It would be in the recollection of the House, that committees of the House had been appointed to investigate this subject as early as the year 1770, and again in 1793. Committees also were appointed in 1812, 1818, 1822, and lastly in 1828. These different committees had been the result of alarm at some remarkable or unprecedented outrage at the time; or the effect, perhaps, of a general conviction, that crimes and offences against the peace of society were so much on the increase as to require an increased and corresponding vigour on the part of our police, with a view to protect the public, and prescribe more effectual remedies for its preservation. But, unfortunately, those committees, however their reports might be creditable to the labours and investigation of the individuals who composed them, produced no effect in improving the law materially; and the subject was lost sight of almost as soon as the cause of the recent alarm had subsided. No effectual measure, therefore, was recommended by the committees, or adopted at the suggestion of individuals in Parliament.

Whoever had read the reports of those committees, particularly those of later date, would find the state of our police to be most defective. It had been pretty clearly ascertained that it was altogether unsafe, and that it had been so for a long period, to commit the care of the lives and properties of the people of the metropolis and its vicinity to the charge of the parochial watch, during that part of the twenty-four hours which constituted the object of their very lax and inefficient protection. He might rest his case on the report of the police committee which lay on the table, and which clearly showed the necessity of some alteration in the existing means for the prevention and detection of crime; but he thought it would be more satisfactory to the House and the public, to state generally the grounds upon which he felt himself imperatively called upon to induce the House to abandon the present system of protecting property and guarding the safety of the person. If they compared the state of crime in the metropolis with that in other parts of the country, or in England and Wales at large, the result would be very unfavourable to the former. If, for example, they selected the last year, and calculated the proportion which the number of criminals in London and Middlesex bore to the population, they would find that not less than one person in every three hundred and eighty-three had been committed for some crime or other in 1828. If, in the same manner, they determined the ratio between the number of persons similarly committed within the same period in England and Wales, the proportion would be found to be one criminal to every eight hundred and twenty-two of the entire population. The result of a comparison of both, as he had stated, would be very unfavourable to the metropolis. It might be said, perhaps, that a different ratio of increase of population in London and Middlesex and the country at large, would account for this difference in the amount of crime; but an examination would show, that the great increase of crime in the former could not be explained by the increased number of its inhabitants. Neither, he was sorry also to say, would the result be favourable to the metropolis, if they compared its present amount of crime with that of any other period, or compared either with that of other parts of the country. In 1821, the number of persons committed in London and Middlesex amounted to 2480, the population being 1,167,000. In 1828, he regretted to say, the committals for crime amounted to 3560. There was no official return of the amount of increase of population in 1828; but assuming it was in a corresponding ratio to that of other periods, the number of inhabitants in London and Middlesex would be 1,349,000 in that year. The result, therefore, of a comparison between the rate of increase of population and the rate of increase of crime in the metropolis, showed that the former was not in proportion to, and could not account for, the great increase of the latter; for there was an increase of forty-one per cent. in the number of committals in 1828 over that of 1821; while there was an increase of population of only fifteen and a half per cent. Increase of population, then, did not explain the great increase of crime in London and Middlesex. Neither did the rate of increase of the number of commitments in England and Wales correspond with that of the inhabitants; for a comparison of both in the years 1821 and 1828 showed that crime had increased twenty-six per cent., while population had increased but eleven and a half per cent.

Although it did not belong properly to his present subject, he thought that, as he had alluded to the state of crime in the country at large, he might, with satisfaction to the House, state, that though the number of committals had increased to so great a degree of late years in London and Middlesex, crime had very sensibly diminished in many parts of the country. The increase of committals in forty-four counties of England and Wales, in 1827, as compared with the preceding year, amounted altogether to 1914; the decrease in six counties, including the city of Bristol, amounted to 167: leaving a nett increase of 1657 committals for crime in the year 1827. But if they proceeded further, and compared the year 1828 with 1827, they would find a decrease of committals in thirty-five counties, of 1656; and an increase in fourteen counties, including Bristol, of 299; leaving a nett decrease of committals for crime, during the last year, in England and Wales, of 1357. This statement, he thought, was some consolation for the unfavourable comparison which the metropolis afforded—the rather, as the diminution of committals generally throughout the country, during the last year, was not at all owing to any laxity of duty on the part of the country police, but to an actual diminution of the amount of crime. This diminution would appear more striking on a comparison of the total number of committals in the last and preceding year. In the year 1827, the total number of persons committed for crime in England and Wales was 17,921; in the year 1828, the number of committals amounted to but 16,566. In some counties the decrease was very remarkable. In Lancashire, for instance, there were but 448 commitments last year, while there were not less than 2457 in 1827. In Somersetshire, the number of committals was 151 less last year than in the preceding. The decrease in Yorkshire was 129; and so on in other places, until they came to what he was sorry to call the unfavourable exception of London and Middlesex; in which there was an increase of 135 committals in 1828, over those of 1827. It was not, he regretted to say, only in one year that London and Middlesex afforded a proof of the increase of crime, much greater than any possible increase of population could account for. If they took any series of years, say seven, on which the police committee had reported, they would find that crime had not only increased in the metropolis more than in the other parts of the country, but had far outstepped the rate of increase of its inhabitants. If they, for example, compared the increase of crime in the seven years beginning with 1811, with the seven years ending with 1828, and then compared both with the increase of population, they would find that crime had increased 55 per cent., while the population had increased but 19 per cent., leaving an excess of crime over population of 36 per cent., to be accounted for by other means or causes.

It was no easy matter to determine what those other means or causes were, which had occasioned this frightful difference between the increase of crime and the increase of population, of not less than 36 per cent. in a series of years. Many intelligent gentlemen, who took an interest in the subject, had endeavoured to investigate and determine those causes; but he must still say—and he spoke in the presence of many hon. members who had taken an active part in the police committee—without having arrived at any satisfactory conclusion as to the real nature of those causes. He feared that one of those causes was the increased mechanical ingenuity of the age; by which the perpetration of crime was aided, and the means of detection lessened. What he meant was, that the mechanical improvements which so much distinguished the country, and which were a great source of its prosperity, so aided the perpetrators of crime, by enabling them to travel a great distance in a few hours, and to use great caution in the selection of time and manner, that the means of detection were very much lessened. All causes, therefore, of the increased comforts of the people of the country became thus sources of crime; not less from the increased temptation which they necessarily created, than from the increased facilities which they afforded of perpetration and evasion.

✱ Another influential cause was, the very unsatisfactory state of that branch of our police which was chiefly controlled by the parochial authorities. He was satisfied, that so long as the present night-watch system was persisted in, there would be no efficient police prevention of crime, nor any satisfactory protection for property or the person. This was the conclusion which the police committee had come to, and which the evidence of persons most interested in the subject made manifest. In fact, it was the conclusion which every one who enquired into our present watch-house system must arrive at. The chief requisites of an efficient police were unity of design and responsibility of its agents—both of which were not only not insured by the present parochial watch-house system, but were actually prevented by it. The House was aware, that each parish had its own watch-house establishment, its own watchmen, its own discipline, and its own responsibility; that it was left to the parochial authorities alone, to devise and enforce and control the means of protecting the property and persons of its inhabitants. By this arrangement each parish was perfectly isolated, so far as prevention of crime was concerned, from every other; there could be, therefore, no general unity of design—no general responsibility. But this was not all; each parish had its own districts, every one of which might be perfectly independent of the rest as to its police; so that the responsibility was still further subdivided, or rather destroyed. Could there, then, be any unity of design under such a system? Certainly not; nor responsibility, until all the parochial police was concentrated under one responsible and efficient head.

He did not, when he made this declaration, mean to deny that some of the parishes in the metropolis had applied themselves meritoriously and successfully to protect the property and persons of their inhabitants, by establishing an efficient parochial police; but he contended, that until this efficiency was made general, nothing but a local benefit could follow from their efforts. What advantage, in a general point of view, could be derived from one well-regulated district, surrounded by five or six neighbouring parishes in which no attempts had been made to remedy the present inefficient watch-house system? Would not the necessary effect be, to drive the thieves and robbers from the protected parish into those parishes on its skirts in which the authorities were indifferent about providing sufficient security for the property, &c., contained in it? Would not, consequently, the one well-regulated district aggravate the evils of its neighbours? This was actually the case with the parishes of Hackney, St. James's, and Marylebone, in which, owing to the voluntary and unpaid exertions of some of the inhabitants, an efficient watch-police establishment was kept up. But though these exertions were eminently successful at present, he need not say, that, being dependent wholly on the disposition of individuals, who had, as he had stated, voluntarily, and without remuneration, undertaken them, there could be no adequate security for their continuance, far less for their extension, but in the appointment of responsible official agents. Besides, he repeated, supposing their continuance could be insured under the present system, they must prove abortive against the effects of a bad neighbourhood until unity of design should be established.

The necessity for that union was strikingly shown by the present police arrangements of some of the parishes adjoining the well-regulated ones he had mentioned.

In the parish of St. Pancras, for example, in which there was a large watch-house establishment kept up, according to returns which he had thought it right to call for, there were not less than eighteen different watch-trusts—that is, eighteen different, isolated, irresponsible police establishments, rendering a unity of design among the eighteen local authorities of that large parish an actual impossibility. In that parish, then, there were eighteen watch-trusts; but if they enquired into the arrangements of other parishes, they would find, not too many watch-trusts, but actually no night-watch at all. This was the case in the parish of Lambeth, in which there was no provision for a night-watch, and in which there was a different species of police altogether, but no watch-trust. Upon this point there was much interesting, and—if he could say so in a case involving so serious a subject as increase of crime—much amusing information in the evidence annexed to the report of the police committee. To that evidence he begged leave to direct the attention of the House, particularly of such hon. members as might be disposed to view his intended bill with a jealous eye.

For the satisfaction of those hon. members, he thought it necessary to state that he had higher opinions in favour of his present object than parochial authorities. Those most competent to judge, and most interested in the subject in the city and elsewhere, had expressed their decided and unanimous opinion, that some material improvements were imperatively necessary in our present arrangements for the protection of property. Those also who were practically acquainted with the workings and defects of the present parochial police system, had expressed the same opinion, either directly or by implication, in their evidence before the police committee. Mr. Julian, the clerk to the magistrates of the Kensington district, had furnished on this point very important information. It appeared from the evidence, that that district was dreadfully exposed to the depredations of thieves and housebreakers.

That it should be so, he thought Mr. Julian's evidence of the number and character of the—he supposed he must call it—parochial police, showed was not very surprising. That witness stated that the wealthy and populous district of Kensington—not less than fifteen miles in extent—was dependent on the protection of three constables and three head-boroughs, some of whom, after they were a time in office, became not very remarkable for their abstinence from intoxicating liquors, and who, from the nature of their appointment by the steward of the manor, were, to all intents and purposes, beyond the control of the magistrates, and who, from having no fees but those the law allowed them, in the end did no duty at all, except indeed that of making out very long bills. Surely it was not surprising, when the great extent of the Kensington district, and its great wealth were considered, that three drunken headles should be no preventive of housebreaking and thievery in it. Indeed, as had been said of the Court of Chancery, three angels, under such circumstances would be a sorry protection, [a laugh.] He repeated—it could not be considered surprising that burglaries were frequent in the Kensington district, with such a police. What said another clerk of the magistrates in his evidence? Why, that in the parish of Tottenham alone, in six weeks, not less than nineteen attempts at burglary had been perpetrated, and out of these nineteen attempts, but three failed, the remaining sixteen being entirely successful. And this was but one parish out of eight in the district.

It was, he felt, unnecessary for him to say, with such facts staring them in the face, that it was the bounden duty of the legislature to interfere, not only to prevent such a daring outrage against the laws, but to provide more secure means of protecting the person and the property of the subject. Again, if they examined the evidence respecting Spitalfields, they would see additional, and, if possible, stronger proof of the necessity of some legislative measure. It was true, that the present state of that district presented a very favourable contrast to its recent one, when gangs of thieves stood at the corners of the streets, robbing, in the middle of the day, all persons who came within their reach, in open defiance and contempt of the laws; but the evidence was still highly important. It showed the imperfect security afforded by the present system of parochial police, and the striking advantages of the exertions that had been made, chiefly through the praiseworthy zeal of one inhabitant, Mr. Gregory, to improve the local police. The individual to whom he had alluded, stated in his evidence that he was then the superintendent of the watch in his district—that the number of watchmen was, as before, twenty-one; but that they were now much more efficient, being better looked after than in the time of the late treasurer, a very old gentleman, who was wholly blind, and never gave himself any trouble about their conduct or appointment.

It was much to be wished, that the conduct pursued in this parish should be imitated by others. But it unfortunately was not. He had returns from parishes in the vicinity of the metropolis, showing that in those parishes there was no species of nightly watch at all; and that the only protection the inhabitants had for their lives and property was their own individual vigilance, and the honesty of the thieves in their neighbourhood. This was the case in the parish of Fulham, containing fifteen thousand inhabitants; and in Chiswick, Ealing, Old Brentford, Acton, St. Mary Stratford Bow, Edgware, Barnet, Putney, Wandsworth, and two other parishes. In those populous and wealthy parishes there was no parochial police—no protection for life or property—but the voluntary exertions of individuals, at whose expense others who had not contributed any thing were benefited. There was no parish not actually forming a part of the metropolis, but in its near vicinity, which furnished stronger evidence of the necessity of an efficient police, and of the consequences to neighbouring parishes of one containing no parochial police, than Deptford. This parish contained upwards of twenty thousand inhabitants, was situated as a ready asylum to those banished from Westminster and the adjoining district for their offences, and positively did not contain a single watchman or night-police authority to prevent crimes and apprehend offenders. It was not surprising, such being the fact, that that parish was the scene of frequent depredations, as in a recent instance of a most atrocious and sanguinary outrage. Within the last few years the indignation at those outrages had led to the formation of a voluntary night-patrol by the parishioners; but as the apprehension for the security of life and property had abated, this temporary protection disappeared with the excitement which gave it birth. The right hon. gentleman proceeded to read a letter from the parochial authority of St. Nicholas, Deptford, in which the writer stated, that though no place required a parochial police more than the parishes of St. Nicholas and St. Paul, Deptford, there was no public watch, no watching or lighting tax, and no protection during night for life and property, but that afforded by two persons, to whom some of the inhabitants paid a sum totally inadequate to support existence and insure vigilance.

Such a state of things must continue so long as that, or any other parish, was dependent on the voluntary exertions of individuals for the means of protection, and was not called upon, by Act of parliament, to maintain an efficient police. This compulsion, in cases where it was necessary, was his present object. This measure contained a variety of details, which he would not then state to the House: indeed, they were of a nature much more fitted for the notice of a Select Committee. He therefore proposed, in carrying into effect the recommendations of the committee of last year, to have that committee reappointed. He would then merely state, that he proposed, as had been suggested by the committee, to unite under one head all parochial police authorities, including, of course, nightly watchmen. These would be under the control of a Board of Police, whose duty it would be to superintend and be responsible for, all the agents required by the police. He would abandon the term "watchman"—indeed it was one that was not in great repute—and consider and speak of their substitutes as a species of night patrol. The bill would appoint three magistrates to the direction of this board. He proposed, that all watch taxes should in future be abolished, and a general police-tax be substituted in their stead. Of course, all parochial distinctions would be done away with. The advantages of this would appear sufficiently evident to those who considered the defects of the present system. It was not unusual now for one side of a street to be in one parish, and the other side in another parish; and, as a consequence—the power of watchmen and constables being confined to their own parish—a watchman standing on one side of the street could not interfere with, and would be a passive spectator of, a depredation performing on the other, so that that depredation was actually short of felony. He had no power of stirring, on grounds of suspicion even of felony, out of his own parish, and could not prevent the actual perpetration of minor crimes, unless in his own district.

One effect of the measure he intended to propose would be, to do away with this and other mischievous consequences of the present parochial distinctions. He did not intend to proceed at first on too extensive a scale, but would endeavour in this, as on other occasions, to effect a gradual reformation, with that cautious feeling of his way, and deriving aid from experience, essential to the ultimate success of all reforms. He would not abolish at once all the parochial police establishments, but would apply his proposed bill to a few districts in the vicinity of the metropolis at first, and then gradually extend it to the others, as its advantages unfolded themselves. In those districts in which the necessity for a change in the present system was most apparent, he would commence with intending that local taxation should defray the expense of the local application of the measure. Supposing, for example, he should begin with ten parishes, those he would make liable to a local police-tax—the local watch-tax ceasing when the measure should be applied. In time the board would be empowered to unite other parishes in the neighbourhood to their jurisdiction; and thus gradually they would make the measure general. With respect to the tax which he proposed to levy, he was confident that it would be much less than the present watch-rates; while, as he need not say, it would ensure a far more efficient police.

The subject had many details, which, though of local importance, would, he conceived, be annoying to the majority of the House, and would be discussed with more advantage in a Select Committee. He therefore would propose the reappointment of the Police Committee of last year. To it he would refer the bill he was about to move for; which was ready drawn up, and had been prepared with great care and ability by gentlemen recommended to him by their talents and fitness for the task. Still, however, as it was a new measure, he would refer it to the reappointed committee, there to receive the necessary minute investigation.

He could not help saying a word or two as to the good effects of a police-patrol like to that which he was about to establish. In 1805, when highway-robberies were so frequent in a particular district adjoining the metropolis, that the watch and police of the district were found to be not sufficient for its protection, there was established the horse-patrol, which was found so efficient in preventing crime and apprehending offenders. It could not be any peculiar change of circumstances since that time that could account for the cessation of robberies in that district; the cause could alone be found in the efficiency of the horse-patrol. The present horse-patrol consisted of fifty-four men. The selection of the patrol was made, in the first instance, with reference to the age of the man, in order that there might be a certainty of having officers capable of enduring the fatigue and discharging the duties which the situation imposed upon them. The selection was also conducted with reference to the previous character of the men. Above all, their promotion was made to depend upon their good conduct; and they were always under the surveillance and control of one establishment. It was upon such principles that he would propose to establish the patrol contemplated by this bill.

Now, with respect to the watchmen. In some instances it had appeared, that the watchmen in some places only received for their regular pay 2d. an hour: in other instances it had been found, that persons who were burthens upon the poor-rates were chosen to fill the situation of watchmen; and, as he had said before, in many parishes, in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, the inhabitants were obliged to come forward themselves, and by their own voluntary contributions support a night-watch for the protection of their families.—He imagined that no objection would be taken to this measure on the score that it went to confer an unconstitutional power upon the board which he proposed to establish. The fact was, the magistrates constituting this board would not possess more than the powers which usually belonged to the office of police magistrate; and even if their power, in some degree, went beyond that extent, the House, he was confident, would perceive that it would be better to have under such a system, a thousand efficient than to have two thousand less efficient constables, under a laxer system. He was therefore satisfied that no objection would be taken to the measure, in so far as it went to invest the board of magistrates to be constituted by this bill with efficient means of exercising the powers which belonged to them.

In one respect, perhaps, objections would be taken to this measure, on the ground of its exciting jealousy on the part of the existing parochial authorities, in consequence of its transferring the patronage which at present vested in their hands, to this department, acting under the control of the Secretary of State. For his part, he could not conceive what valid objection could be urged against the power which would be derived from this patronage to government, more than to that which resulted from the selection of persons for the army and navy. Certain he was, that from the class of persons who would be chosen under such a system, for any jealousy which might be entertained by parochial authorities in reference to the loss of this petty patronage, there would be found an ample compensation in the increased protection which would be afforded against offenders, and in the increased security given to the inhabitants for the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of their respective neighbourhoods. But the subject must be considered and determined upon higher and more extended principles, than in reference to these petty parochial jealousies. When they looked at the relative proportion which the criminals bore to the population in this metropolis—when they saw that one out of every three hundred and fifty-three of that population was committed to prison, charged with some criminal offence, it was their duty, under such circumstances, to legislate upon principles of a higher and more extended nature, and to adopt effectual means to put a stop to such a frightful increase of crime.

But, it might be said, that this measure would go to impose additional burdens upon the inhabitants of the various parishes. It was true, that a certain degree of expense would be required to carry it fully into effect; but he was sure that any additional burden imposed in that way would be fully compensated for, by the additional protection and security which it would afford. Besides, one certain effect of the measure would be to diminish the number of prosecutions in Middlesex and London; and thus, while the inhabitants would be relieved from the watch-tax, they would also be relieved from other parochial rates, which had been materially increased by the expense and number of those prosecutions.—But, he would rest the defence of this measure upon a much higher consideration—upon its effects in checking the increase of crime. He saw no mode by which they could hope ultimately to mitigate the severity of their criminal code, but the adoption of some such measure as this for preventing the increase of crime. It would be vain for them to attempt to mitigate the penalties which attached to crime already, unless they took measures to prevent the commission of crime itself. If, as it appeared from the documents upon the table, the number of criminals in the year 1821 amounted to two thousand five hundred—if they had increased in 1828 to three thousand five hundred—and if they were going on at such a rapidly increasing ratio, it would be obviously impossible, unless some check were put to their increase, to effect any material mitigation in the penalties which, under the existing laws, attached to the commission of crime.

He was not one who considered that this increase of criminals had been mainly occasioned by the increase of distress amongst the population. He believed that these criminals were, in almost all instances, trained and hardened profligates,—that they had been incited to the commission of crime, by the temptations which the present lax system of police held out to them; and he was sure it was possible effectually to check them, by the vigorous exercise of the powers supplied by the common law of the land.—He had already referred the House to an instance, in which nineteen acts of burglary had been committed in the parish of Tottenham, within an exceedingly short space of time; and he might now state, that these burglarious attempts had been committed by notorious thieves, who made burglary a profession. When, therefore, they talked so much of the liberty of the subject possessed by the people of this country, he was afraid that they gave credit to some parts of the population for the enjoyment of much more liberty than they actually possessed. He believed that a large portion of the inhabitants resident in the neighbourhood of Twickenham and Brentford were under constant apprehensions that their lives and properties would be attacked; and such fears were entirely inconsistent with the free enjoyment of liberty and peace. It was the duty of the legislature to afford them protection against the causes which gave rise to such apprehensions,—it was the duty of parliament to afford to the inhabitants of the metropolis and its vicinity, the full and complete protection of the law, and to take prompt and decisive measures to check the increase of crime, which was now proceeding at a frightfully rapid pace; and it was upon such grounds, with such objects, and for the purpose of providing a more efficient police for the metropolis, that he now begged to move for “leave to bring in a bill for the Improvement of the Police of the Metropolis.”

In reply to some observations from Mr. Bernal,—Mr. Peel said, that the hon. member was mistaken in supposing that the board which he proposed to establish would only embrace the regulation and management of the night patrol. That department would be responsible for the state of the metropolis both by night and day. Much benefit had resulted from the day patrol, even as it was at present constituted. To what did the day patrol at present amount? Only three inspectors and twenty-four men. When benefit resulted from such a small patrol, it was fair to suppose that great good would be effected by the establishment of a vigilant and numerous patrol, under the superintendence of the new board of magistrates, and capable of giving efficient protection to the passengers, against the depredations of pickpockets in the leading streets and thoroughfares of the metropolis. The hon. member had spoken of the defects which existed in the present system of the day patrol; but the hon. member would, no doubt, concur with him in thinking, that if that patrol so constituted had been productive of any benefit, it only demonstrated the advantage of having an efficient, vigilant, and well regulated patrol, both by night and day, controlled by one authority, and acting under one head. Unless it were established on such a plan, it would be quite impossible to effect the objects in view; for when the thieves should be driven from one part of the town, they would have only to transfer themselves to another. It was therefore absolutely necessary that there should be but one head presiding over and directing the operations of this new police. With a police established upon such a system, he was confident they would be able to dispense with the necessity of a military force in London, for the preservation of the tranquillity of the metropolis.

Mr. Peel, in reply to Mr. Hume, said, that under the act which he intended to introduce, a certain day would be appointed when the parochial establishments in each parish would be abolished, and the whole management of the police of that parish transferred to the board appointed under this act. It was desirable, however, that so great a change should not be made too suddenly. He did not propose that all at once the parochial police establishment should cease, and that this new police department should at once be obliged to take charge of the whole police of the metropolis. He would first propose to entrust to them the charge of the police in a certain number of parishes; and he would extend their authority gradually to other parishes, until the charge of the entire establishment devolved upon them. By that means, the new police department would become gradually exercised in the management and control of the police, and in the course of time they would be competent to take charge of the entire police of the metropolis. In every instance a day would be fixed when the charge of the police in a particular parish would devolve on this department: the existing parochial authorities would then entirely cease; the rates paid for the maintenance of watchmen would also cease, and instead of the watch-rate a new police-rate would be imposed. He was not, however, for giving to this new department a too widely extended authority all at once. To give to them suddenly the charge and management of fifteen hundred men would be too much. He would have them, in the first instance, to take charge of the police in the city of Westminster; then he would propose to extend their jurisdiction gradually to Kensington, Hammersmith, and other places in the neighbourhood; and in that manner he would gradually extend it over the various districts where its authority was intended to reach.

The bill was brought in and read a first time.

REGULATION OF PARISH VESTRIES.

APRIL 28, 1829.

At the close of a speech of considerable length, Mr. Hobhouse moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the general operation and effect of the laws and usages under which Select and other Vestries are constituted in England and Wales."

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he was not prepared to offer any opposition to the motion of the hon. member for a Committee of Enquiry; but at the same time, he begged to be distinctly understood by no means to acquiesce in the charges which the hon. member had, in his opinion, too widely made against select vestries, and much less to concur in the views of the hon. member respecting the abolition of select vestries in London and its vicinity. There were, doubtless, instances of improper conduct in parochial expenditure; but it did not follow, that such instances were to be found in all select vestries. If the committee could find out any plan for auditing parochial accounts, and for checking abuses in the expenditure of parochial funds, he should be the last person to object to such a plan. No doubt there ought to be a full audit of parochial accounts, and that all abuses in the expenditure of parish funds ought to be checked as far as possible. He could not, however, agree with the hon. member, that, at least in London, a popular election would effect these objects. If persons of respectability and wealth and intelligence were driven from the management of parochial affairs, and such persons substituted as it was likely would be substituted, if every man who paid parochial rates had a vote, the evils complained of would be increased and not diminished. As to the committee over which his right hon. friend (Mr. S. Bourne) presided with so much ability, it was discovered by that committee, that an open vestry was so large and cumbrous a body, that it was incapable of transacting parish business; that every body having a voice, there was no time for deliberation. The committee, therefore, decided in favour of select vestries; and recommended that annual overseers might be dispensed with, and that parochial officers might, if it were thought proper, continue in office more than a year. So far as the hon. member's motion contemplated the establishment of checks upon local expenditure, he acquiesced in it; but he wished to guard himself against the inference of concurrence in all the views of the hon. member, and more particularly against the idea, that he acquiesced in the argument that the principle of the select-vestry system should be departed from, and that that of universal suffrage should be substituted for it. Undoubtedly some improvement might possibly take place by the adoption of the recommendation of the hon. member; but he believed that the present system furnished a more effectual check upon the abuse of local expenditure, by committing its control to men of character and affluence, than to such persons as would stand a contest at general parochial elections.

The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed.

. LAW COMMISSION.

MAY 4, 1829.

After some observations from Mr. Brougham, Colonel Wood, and Sir J. Mackintosh, on the subject of the Law commission,—

Mr. SECRETARY PEEL said, he had heard with much satisfaction the testimony borne in favour of the report of the commissioners. That commission arose out of a motion made by the hon. and learned member, who had stated at the time that he cared less for the form of the commission than for the selection of the members. He (Mr. Peel) had declared, that he would make the selection on a principle which would secure a satisfactory result to their labours. He believed that the general voice of the profession concurred with that of the hon. and learned member in approving the manner in which the commissioners had conducted their enquiries, and the discreet, safe, and temperate reforms which they had recommended. With respect to the law of arrest, it was probable that the commissioners had taken a correct view of their powers in abstaining from entering on its consideration. They conceived that the object of their appointment was to enquire into the practice and proceedings of courts of law. He had no hesitation in saying that he was convinced, by almost daily experience, of the necessity of instituting an enquiry as to the law of arrest, with a view to the reform of the whole subject. At present, the power of arrest was vested in some local jurisdictions, which, perhaps, were not worthy to be trusted with such an important power. He alluded to the manorial courts, the hundreds' courts, and other jurisdictions. The hon. member for Montrose had more than once urged the appointment of a committee of that House, to take the subject into consideration. He did not think that the enquiry could be conducted so well by a committee of that House as by a commission constituted like the present. Whether or not it would be advisable to extend the powers of the commissioners, and direct them to enter into an enquiry respecting the law of arrest, would be a matter for consideration. He was anxious, however, that the attention of the commissioners should not be diverted from their present labours. If it should appear that the existing commission could not conveniently take the subject of the law of arrest into consideration, then it would be for the House to determine whether a separate commission should be appointed for that purpose. In answer to the question, Whether it were the intention of Government to bring in a bill, founded on the report of the commissioners, he would state, without at all pledging himself on the subject, that it had not escaped his attention. He had communicated with the Lord Chancellor on the subject only yesterday, and their joint opinion was, that if a bill could be introduced this session which would embody the recommendations of the report, and which might receive consideration during the recess, it would be a great advantage; at the same time it was necessary that such a bill should be well matured before it was introduced, in order that no undue prejudice should be raised against it on account of defective enactments. He was happy to find that the hon. colonel concurred in the recommendation of the commissioners respecting the Welsh judicature. It was no reflection on the commissioners that there were local objections to their plan. He had not the slightest objection to extend their powers, and had only expressed his doubt as to the propriety of interrupting their present labours.

LABOURERS' WAGES BILL.

In the debate on the second reading of this bill,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he fully concurred with the hon. mover, that the system of paying the wages of labour out of the poor-rates was highly objectionable; but, though admitting the proposition of the hon. member in the abstract, he doubted whether a system which had long existed, and which had been uniformly acted on for so many years, could safely be removed otherwise than gradually. No one could be more fully convinced than he was of the extent to which that species of payment was detrimental to the interests of the poor themselves, affecting as it did the market. There was, in fact, scarcely any thing that more tended to lower the condition of the labouring poor. There was one difficulty which stood in the way of the measure in its present form, namely, that state of the law which prevented what might be called the circulation of labour, that which confined labourers to the limits of their own parishes. The great objection which he had to the bill as it stood was, that it proposed to effect a change quite suddenly, and a change, too, of the highest importance, one that ought only to be brought about, if at all, with the utmost discrimination. He joined the hon. member as heartily as any one could do, in condemning the existing system; but it was a practice which had subsisted for forty or fifty years. If the case were ten times stronger than it was, the remedy proposed ought not to be adopted until after mature consideration, and a notice to the parties interested. It could not be otherwise than gradual; for there was a necessity in the present condition of the poor that would paralyse any act of Parliament. Were it allowed to proceed to its extreme limit, it would disturb all the relations of labour. If a man were suddenly and unexpectedly told, that he could no longer obtain any allowance for his wife and children, he would remember that the moment he deserted them they would be entitled to relief; and thus the greatest temptation would be held out to him to desert them and his work too. Various means could be resorted to for the purpose of evading the provisions of the bill. Notwithstanding the view which he could not help taking of the subject, he would agree to the bill being committed.

The bill was read a second time.

EAST RETFORD FRANCHISE

MAY 5, 1829.

Mr. G. Lamb presented a petition from the bailiffs, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of East Retford, asserting their perfect innocence of the charge of corruption and bribery. In the conversation which ensued,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that no possible blame could attach to the hon. member for Blechingly for not having brought forward this subject before, as the hon. member had not been master of the circumstances which had caused the delay. The circumstances of this session had been peculiar, and would form no rule for the proceedings of another session. He should confine himself to the question which was practically, though not formally, before the House; namely, whether a new writ should be issued for East Retford, with the view of proceeding with the investigation. He thought, that if the House intended now, or at any other time, to renew the investigation, with the view of extending the franchise to the hundred, or of conferring it upon a large town, there was a great objection to issuing a writ, and allowing the voters of the borough to exercise exclusively the privilege which that writ would confer. The House would recollect, that the petition against the election charged bribery, corruption, and treating. The treating was proved, and on that ground the election was set aside. The report of the committee, however, declared, that the borough was notoriously corrupt, and that it required the serious attention of the House. He thought, therefore, that great difficulty would arise if they allowed these constituents to return members during the remainder of the session. It had been said, that in the cases of Grampound and Penryn, the members were allowed to sit to the end of the session; but there was no similarity between those cases and the present; in the former, they found the members sitting, but in the latter the members were unseated, on the proof of treating. He confessed he did not feel the injustice of postponing the investigation, though he could have wished that it had been brought on earlier. The hon. member for Blechingly must judge for himself what course was most proper for him to pursue. If the hon. member persevered in his motion, he supposed that the hon. member for Hertfordshire would persevere in his; and, in that case, he should take the same course that he had taken last session, and vote for the extension of the franchise to the hundred. If the subject were postponed till the next session, he should then also be prepared to take the same course.

The petition having been received, and ordered to be printed, Mr. Tennyson moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill to exclude the Borough of East Retford from electing Burgesses to serve in Parliament, and to enable the town of Birmingham to return two representatives in lieu thereof."

In the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that this case was so exactly the same as that which they had discussed last session, at such length and in such repeated details, that he could relieve the House from the fatigue of listening to him at any length upon this occasion. He must however say, that notwithstanding the surprise and regret of his right hon. friend who had last spoken, at the course which he was about to take, he could not see any cause for it, since he was merely supporting the resolution of the House of Commons of last year, under what appeared to him very similar circumstances. In return for this expression of astonishment, his right hon. friend must allow him to give way to some surprise at a few of the observations which had just fallen from him. He must be allowed to divest himself of all credit for that general horror for reform which his right hon. friend had imputed to him, as well as of some of the arguments in support of reform, with which he seemed disposed to invest him. Indeed, from certain expressions of his right hon. friend, it was obvious that the noble marquis opposite ought to depend upon his right hon. friend's vote, when he should bring forward his general motion on the state of the representation. His right hon. friend appeared to have been particularly struck with the quotation so often repeated—

— Simul alba nautis
Stella refuleit,
Defluit saxis agitatus humor;
Concidunt venti, fugiuntque nubes;
Et minax (quod sic voluere) ponto
Unda recumbit."

And he had applied that splendid passage, with which Mr. Burke had illustrated the passing of the Welch acts, where a new kind of representation was conferred upon general principles, to one where the change was to be expressly founded upon specific delinquency. So that, he repeated, his right hon. friend stood committed for the wider range of reform, at the moment when he thought he was merely enforcing the limited one. He had likewise called to his aid arguments deduced from what he termed the smothered volcano of Ireland; and had asked: "Do you believe that the settlement of the Catholic question will, without the aid of poor-laws, tranquillize that country?" "I am not," (continued Mr. Peel) "called upon now to say whether it will or will not. I see no direct connexion between the one and the other, and I cannot help thinking, that he seeks an unfair advantage, in endeavouring to gain arguments against us, from the settlement of a question in which we cordially acted with him. My right hon. friend admits, that we settled it upon more satisfactory terms for all parties, than could have been done under any other circumstances."—His right hon. friend had next referred to the conduct of the present government, in relation to the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts; but his right hon. friend seemed to have forgotten, that he had sailed in the same boat with him, and the rest of his right hon. friend's then colleagues. They had both equally opposed that repeal,—it might be on different grounds,—had both, in the first stages of that measure, given it their unequivocal opposition, and had both concurred, in the sequel, in effecting a satisfactory adjustment of it. The remarks, therefore, of his right hon. friend equally applied to his own conduct on that occasion. With respect to what his right hon. friend had said on the subject of parliamentary reform, he could only reply, that he had always, as much and as readily as his right hon. friend, acted upon the principle of disfranchisement, when a clear case of delinquency had been proved against any borough. He had dealt with Penryn, for example, on that principle, and had voted for the transfer of its franchise. To be sure, there were particular circumstances in the case of Penryn to warrant the vote that had been given respecting it by his right hon. friend and the other members of the government [hear, hear]. He did not understand the nature of the cheer: but he contended, that a large majority of that House had voted for the transfer of the franchise to Manchester, his right hon. friend nevertheless agreeing with his colleagues in the principle, that the transfer should be made to the adjoining hundred. He saw no ground of exception to that principle in favour of East Retford, and therefore could not adopt the course which his right hon. friend was at present pursuing. He begged leave to remind the House, that in every case, except Grampound, the principle of transfer to the adjoining hundred was recognised by the highest authorities in that or the other House of parliament—by Lord Chatham, for instance, in the case of Shoreham, which "he rejoiced," he said, "was transferred from India to England." Mr. Pitt also had contended, that it was an improvement in the elective franchise in those cases to transfer it to the adjacent hundred, without arguing the question—which stood on distinct and different grounds—whether it would be expedient or not to transfer it to a large unfranchised town.—Upon the whole, then, he saw no reason for departing from the course he had hitherto pursued respecting East Retford. It was true the House might go farther; but that was not the question before it. That question was founded upon the report of its committee; which declared that corrupt practices had been pursued in that borough at elections, calling for its interference as in similar preceding cases. It could not be urged against that interference that it was unfair, because it was made in the absence of the members of the borough, inasmuch as that absence was at once a consequence and a proof of its corrupt practices. The case of delinquency had been proved against it, therefore it must pay the penalty. With respect to the principle of voting for the transfer of the franchise of delinquent boroughs to the large unrepresented towns, he need not say he was not opposed to it, having, as he had stated, voted with his right hon. friend for the noble lord's (John Russell's) motion to transfer the Penryn franchise to Manchester. An hon. gentleman had mistaken what he had said on a former occasion respecting the alteration of the present numbers represented by counties. What he said was, that he did not think it expedient to make any deduction in the present numbers, but not that no alteration should be made in them. Nottingham, for example, the county in which East Retford stood, returned eight members; while Warwickshire, in which Birmingham stood, returned but six; but it did not therefore follow, that two should be taken from the former to be added to the latter, however desirable it might be to make such an addition. In conclusion, he repeated, that he saw no new ground for voting differently from what he had done last session with respect to the transfer of the East Retford franchise. He therefore should support the proposition of his hon. friend, the member for Hertfordshire, for transferring it to the adjoining hundred of Bassettlaw.

The House divided on the question; "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to exclude the Borough of East Retford from electing Burgesses to serve in parliament, and to enable the town of Birmingham to return two representatives in lieu thereof;" when the ayes were, 111; noes 197—majority against Mr. Tennyson's motion, 86.

Mr. N. Calvert then moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent Bribery and Corruption in the Borough of East Retford." Upon which, Lord John Russell moved as an amendment, "That this House do now adjourn." The House divided: ayes 86; noes 180. Majority against the adjournment, 94. Mr. N. Calvert then moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent Bribery and Corruption in the Borough of East Retford."

Mr. Peel said he was not disposed to see the time of the House wasted fruitlessly, after the strong majority which had been already arrayed against the adjournment. If, therefore, the noble lord were resolved to divide the House by pressing his opposition to this fresh proposition respecting the borough of East Retford, it would be far better to submit to that postponement of the motion which he thought might very consistently with the usages of the House, have been dispensed with.

Mr. N. Calvert finally consented to postpone his motion, and the discussion of it was accordingly adjourned until Monday, the 11th of May.

SUPPLY OF WATER TO THE METROPOLIS.

MAY 7, 1829.

In a conversation on this subject,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that he looked upon this as a question of considerable importance to the metropolis; and he trusted, although it was not perhaps quite regular, that he might be allowed to say a word or two upon it. And, first, he must observe, that if any blame were to be imputed on the ground of supineness or delay, the hon. baronet who represented Westminster was the last man to whom that blame could attach, for he had been indefatigable in his exertions respecting it. After the report made by the committee of the House last year, Mr. Telford, the engineer, was applied to as to the probable expense of a survey, with a view to ascertain the best plan for supplying the metropolis with pure water. That gentleman, than whom no more competent authority could be applied to, was of opinion, that the survey would take from £3,000 to £5,000, but he could not be positive that the latter sum would cover the expense. Under these circumstances, ministers did not feel themselves justified in entering upon the measure. Besides, he must observe, that such an interference on the part of government would form a most dangerous precedent. If they interfered in procuring a supply of water, why not in procuring a supply of gas, or in lighting, watching, and paving the streets? Nay, more, if such interference took place with respect to the metropolis, what was to prevent Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, and the other great towns, from making a similar application? Repeated complaints had been, and continued to be, made of the conduct of the water companies—that the water supplied by them was, in some instances, deficient in quantity and impure in quality, and that the price charged had increased with those deficiencies. The consequence would be that, unless the evil were remedied by the existing companies, new companies would rise up, who, by the encouragement they would receive, would teach the present companies that they had forgotten their own interests when they neglected or violated the principle of their contract with the public. He still thought that the companies who were in the enjoyment of this monopoly, were bound to remedy the evil complained of. He thought it would be wise in those companies to bear the expense of the survey. If they would, government would see that it was executed; and there was no doubt that either higher up in the Thames, or from the Colne, a plentiful supply of pure water could be obtained. He had great hopes that the evil would be very soon remedied, either in this or in some other way.

EAST RETFORD.

MAY 7, 1829.

Mr. H. Fane moved "That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a new writ for the electing of two Burgesses to serve in this present parliament for the Borough of East Retford, in the room of the hon. Sir Robert Lawrence Dundas and William Battie Wrightson, Esq., whose election has been declared to be void."

Mr. Hudson Gurney seconded the motion.

Mr. Tennyson opposed the motion, and moved, as an amendment, "That Mr. Speaker do not issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the electing of two burgesses to serve in the present parliament for the Borough of East Retford, until this day three weeks."

Mr. Peel suggested, that it would be better to withdraw the motion for the present; or allow the previous question to be put, which would render the amendment unnecessary. In either case the subject could be renewed at any time that hon. members thought proper. He owned he could not support the motion for issuing the writ. After the evidence they had had, it would be inconsistent with the resolution to which they had already come; and it would be a bad precedent for other boroughs, if they passed such conduct by without taking some proceeding respecting it.

The motion was then withdrawn.

POOR LAWS IN IRELAND.

MAY 7, 1829.

Mr. Villiers Stuart moved, "That this House is of opinion that it will be expedient to take into early consideration, in the next session of parliament, the condition of the Poor of Ireland, with a view to consider the propriety of introducing a system of Poor Laws into Ireland, subject to such modifications as parliament may deem applicable to the peculiar circumstances of that country."

Lord F. L. Gower moved the previous question.

In the course of a long debate, General Gascoyne proposed, that the further debate upon the question should be adjourned to Tuesday.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL rose amidst cries of "adjourn." He said, that the question of adjournment must depend entirely upon the number of members who felt inclined to speak upon the question. The motion of the previous question, moved by his noble friend, proved nothing; and for himself, he had no objection to the general principle of the measure. He was far from undervaluing it: on the contrary, he felt that if negatived at present, it must undergo a full discussion in the course of the next session. If, however, many hon. members did not feel inclined to address the House upon it, he saw no reason why it might not be disposed of that night.

General Gascoyne expressed his determination to support the motion, in the event of its going to a division.

Mr. Peel said that in voting for the previous question, he wished not to be understood as expressing any decided irrevocable opinion as to the principle or the merits of the proposition which had been advocated by the hon. member for Waterford. He should vote for the previous question, as he much doubted the policy of the House of Commons pledging itself in one session of parliament, to pursue any specific course in the next. It would always be open to parliament to adopt the course proposed by the hon. member, without giving any distinct pledge on the subject. There might be circumstances under which it would be right to give such a pledge, in order to allay a ferment, or to subdue the excitement of the moment; but there should exist good and sufficient ground for it before it was done. Here, however, the case was different. Whenever the House pledged itself to consider the propriety of extending the Poor-laws to Ireland, it should at once enter upon that enquiry; in order to allay the ferment and agitation which would naturally take place upon the occasion. He denied that he had, during the last session, expressed an opinion favourable to the introduction of the Poor-laws into Ireland: on the contrary, he had then said that he saw great difficulty in the way of introducing them. It was impossible that he could express himself favourable to the introduction of the system, as it existed here, when he did not know what machinery there existed in Ireland for carrying the English Poor-laws into operation there. He was certain that if they introduced the system as it at present existed in England into Ireland, if they established there overseers, parochial vestries, and select vestries, that all this machinery would be converted into a system of local jobbing. The incursions of Irish paupers into England was undoubtedly a great inconvenience and hardship upon the people of this country, and its direct tendency was to reduce the labourers of this country wherever such incursions took place, as in the west of England, to a level with the paupers from Ireland. While the Irish pauper could come over here for 1s. or 1s. 6d., those incursions would continue; and there was more expense incurred, he believed, in sending one of these Irish labourers back to his own country, than would be incurred if he were allowed to remain in a parish a sufficient time to establish a settlement. But, how could they refuse relief to those Irish labourers in England, when they would not refuse relief to foreigners? The Irish pauper here was entitled to casual support as long as he remained; and therefore, to avoid that expense, the parochial authorities transferred him to Ireland, and incurred a still greater expense in doing so. How could they refuse relief to the Irish pauper, when they gave it to foreigners who might be casually cast on our shores? Very recently a case had occurred, where a number of persons from the north of Germany, who were emigrating to South America, thought it convenient to cast themselves upon our shores, and they were a great burthen to the parishes in the district where they were cast. He would not pledge himself to introduce the principle of the English system of Poor-laws into Ireland, without having first given the subject the most deliberate consideration, as to its effect on the state of pauperism in this country, and as to its probable result, in giving poor but able-bodied men in that country the right to demand assistance. He assured the House, that so far from having expressed any decided opinion on the question last session he had done all he could to show the enormous difficulties in the way of carrying it into effect. He still entertained that opinion, and did not know what machinery would be necessary for such a purpose. By rejecting the motion, the House would express no opinion on the merits of that most difficult question. All he could say was, that he should be willing to act on the suggestion of the hon. member for Armagh, and to give to the condition of the poor of Ireland his full and deliberate consideration; but he could not pledge himself to introduce any measure on the subject.

Mr. Peel further said, he hoped it would be understood that he had given no pledge whatever as to the intention of government to introduce any measure upon this subject. He admitted that the condition of the poor of Ireland required serious consideration, but he had not pledged government to the recognition of any particular system for their relief.

The motion was at length withdrawn.

RECOVERY OF SMALL DEBTS.

MAY 8, 1829.

In answer to a question from Lord Althorp,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, it was with very great reluctance that he had postponed the bill for the Recovery of Small Debts last session. The reason he did so was, because there were a considerable number of patent offices that would be affected by the bill; and it was necessary to grant compensation to those who held such offices. It was easy, he knew, to grant compensation; but this might make an alteration in the practice, and occasion greater emoluments to be received by persons holding other patent offices, by which the public would not be benefited. The commissioners for enquiring into the practice of courts of justice had made a number of enquiries on this subject, with respect to the effect which his bill would have on certain offices; and it was found that the provisions of his bill and the objects of the commissioners were very nearly connected. He thought that the only proper mode of proceeding would be, to grant compensations for all at one time, in order to prevent the evil which had arisen in Ireland from granting partial compensations. At the close of last session, he had called the attention of the commissioners to this subject, and they had succeeded in making many valuable enquiries. He therefore thought that until the whole question were introduced, it would be unwise to bring in this bill. He agreed with the noble lord, that some mode for the easy recovery of Small Debts ought to be provided; and as soon as the question of compensation was settled, it should be attended to. He could assure the noble lord, that no press of business should have prevented him from undertaking a measure of that kind in the present session, if that part of the question to which he had alluded could have been settled with satisfaction to the parties immediately concerned, and with justice to the public interest.

Mr. Peel subsequently remarked, that he was no friend to patent offices. His fear was, that if a bill were introduced similar to that of last session, these officers would get too much under its provisions. So far was he from encouraging patent officers, that, on the termination of the existing officers provision would be made to render it impossible that others should be appointed in the same way. The principle, he admitted, was bad for the interests of justice; but the uniform practice had been, when great offices were granted for public services, to attach those patent situations to them.

On the order of the day for resuming the debate adjourned from the 15th instant, on the motion, "That Mr. O'Connell be called back, and heard at the table,"—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he thought it might tend to save the time of the House, if he were at once to state the view which he took of the subject under consideration. This debate was adjourned upon the day that an hon. member of this House came down to take his seat, on having administered to him the Oaths of Allegiance and Abjuration. The right hon. the Speaker, most properly, in the execution of his duty, which compelled him to enforce the observance of the laws and usages of parliament, according to his construction of them, hesitated to admit the hon. member on taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Abjuration, and required him to take the former Oath of Supremacy. The hon. member objected to take the former Oath of Supremacy, and preferred a claim to sit on taking the oath prescribed by the act passed in the present session for the relief of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects. The question immediately for the consideration of the House was this—whether or not the member for Clare should be heard at all on the subject; and if he should be heard, whether he should be heard at the table or at the bar of the House. With these questions he would in no manner mix up any other question. He would avoid expressing the slightest opinion on the legal point, whether the member for Clare had a right to sit without taking the former Oath of Supremacy. He would postpone his opinion on that point, until such time as it should be discussed; and he would now address himself entirely to these three questions,—whether the member for Clare should be heard at all, and if heard, whether he should be heard at the table, or at the bar of the House. Having given this subject the fullest consideration, during the interval which had elapsed since the debate was adjourned, he had come to the conclusion that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it would be fitting to hear the member for Clare. He thought so because the case was a special case, which could not possibly be drawn into precedent. It was a claim founded on a question as to the construction of acts of parliament. Whatever the ultimate decision of the House might be on that claim, that decision would be more satisfactory, if the House permitted the object of it to state his case in the manner which he should afterwards point out. He was aware that the question was a special and individual one, which therefore, perhaps, might be exempted from the ordinary regulations; but he conceived that it was a question not only of admission to privilege, but of liability to penalty; because, the question would arise as to what oath was proper to be taken, and if the member for Clare should take the wrong oath, he would be subject to a penalty in a court of law. But as there were special and peculiar circumstances in the present case, he was desirous, particularly as it could not be drawn into precedent, of giving the individual so circumstanced every fair advantage, consistent with the usual practice of the House. As to the question, whether the member for Clare should be heard at the table or at the bar of the House, he had no hesitation in saying, that it would not be fitting to permit him to be heard at the table. He thought there was nothing in the precedents quoted which fortified the hon. member's claim argumentatively to discuss at the table his right to sit in that House. The only precedents bearing on the present case were limited to those of Lord Fanshawe and Sir H. Monson. Lord Fanshawe and Sir H. Monson were members of the convention, which was subsequently declared to be a parliament. In addition to these, there were the cases of Mr. Archdale and Mr. Wilkes, who was brought up in custody to the bar. The cases of Lord Fanshaw and Sir H. Monson were very peculiar. They were members of the convention parliament and had sat in the House, without taking any oaths at all, either at the office of the Lord Steward, or at the table of the House. In point of fact, it was impossible that they could have taken any oaths; for the only Oath of Allegiance which then existed was that prescribed by king James, and it was manifestly inconsistent that the members of the convention should take an oath prescribed by king James. They continued to sit as members of the convention, and were parties to the act by which the convention was declared to be a parliament, without taking any oaths, and were found in that condition, when an act passed abrogating the old oaths and prescribing new ones. It was by that statute enacted, that after the 1st of March, 1689, every member should take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, as altered by the parliament, in lieu of the former ones. Four hundred members qualified on the first day, and on the 2nd of March there was a call of the House, and many members who had not been present on the first day, were called upon to attend, and required to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, as prescribed by the 1st of William and Mary. Those oaths were tendered to the two members by the Speaker, and upon declining to take them, they were ordered to withdraw. The case of Mr. O'Connell was, he apprehended, in substance the same. The Speaker having tendered to him the Oath of Supremacy, he declined to take it, and was then ordered to withdraw. Whatever peculiarity attended the cases of Lord Fanshaw and Sir H. Monson, as members of the convention parliament, they did in substance what the member for Clare did—they stated their objections to take the oaths, and they were then ordered to withdraw; but they did not address any argument upon the subject while in the House, and they were not competent to do so, because they were incapable of being present, until they had qualified according to law. The case of Mr. Archdale was very nearly the same. He acquainted the Speaker, that he had consented to serve as a member of parliament under the impression that his declaration of fidelity would be tantamount to taking an oath. When he came into the House, the oaths were tendered to him, which he declined taking, and he was ordered to withdraw. Then came the case of Mr. Wilkes, which a right hon. member thought established the right of the member for Clare to be heard at the table.

Mr. Wynn explained. He had stated, that the case of Mr. Wilkes established Mr. O'Connell's right to be heard at the bar.

Mr. Peel.—The course pursued on that occasion clearly proved that a member who had not qualified must be heard at the bar. Mr. Wilkes was brought up in the custody of the Marshal of the King's Bench, and before any thing passed, he desired to put this question to the Speaker, whether or not, as he had not taken the oaths, and had not presented his qualification at the table, he did not subject himself to the penalties inflicted by the statutes of Charles II., if he addressed any observations to the House. He was then ordered to withdraw. The subject was referred to the House, and the opinion which the House delivered was, that though he had not taken the oaths, and had not presented his qualification, yet there was nothing in the act which prevented him from appearing at the bar. But, independently of these precedents, the question might be tried by the dictates of common sense. Assuming that the Oath of Supremacy was in force according to the interpretation which had been placed on it by the organ of the opinion of that House, whose duty it was, subject to the control of the House, to interpret the law, and to act upon that interpretation;—assuming that it was quite inconsistent with law to permit the member for Clare to be present at discussions of the House, and to deliver arguments without taking the Oath of Supremacy,—what would be the consequence of remaining in the House, having omitted to take that oath? The law subjected individuals who sat, or voted, or entered into the House, not having taken the Oath of Supremacy, to heavy penalties; and therefore, even if there were considerable doubt on the subject, the House ought not to lend its sanction to the possible infraction of the law. The object of the house was to hear what could be urged by the individual in question in support of his claim. That purpose would be answered by hearing him at the bar. By hearing him at the bar he would be exempt from all penalties which possibly might attach to him if heard at the table; and therefore, in reference to his own security, it was better that he should be heard at the bar than at the table. These were the reasons which had brought him to the two following conclusions:—namely, that under the special circumstances of the case, as it was incapable of being drawn into precedent, being an individual question, and as it rested on the construction of acts of parliament, it was right to give to the member whose case was involved in this consideration, the privilege of stating it by himself, counsel, or agents. He had also stated the grounds why he thought the member for Clare ought to be heard at the bar of the House, in preference to being heard at the table. He knew that these matters were considered by some persons, but he believed by no member of that House, of trifling importance. Great public interest, he was convinced, was concerned in maintaining the privileges of that House, and in doing an act of substantial justice we should take care to see that it was done according to forms, which only superficial minds held up to ridicule. An hon. friend appeared to be under the impression, that the House ought to admit the member for Clare into the House. In reference to his having been permitted to advance to the table in the first instance, without being called upon to produce a certificate of his having taken the oaths before the Lord Steward, the precedents were in his favour. That was exactly the case of Mr. Archdale. Before appearing in the House, he informed the Speaker that he entertained strong objections to take the oaths. The presumption, therefore, was, that he had not qualified out of doors; and, notwithstanding that, the House admitted him to the table for the purpose of taking the oaths. The presumption was, that the member had complied with the law, which directed that certain oaths should be taken before the Lord Steward, and he subjected himself to a high penalty if, having neglected to do so, he took his seat. The power to administer the oaths was given to the Lord Steward for the satisfaction of the Crown, which was not content by their being administered by the officers of that House; and the Crown required that the members of the House should give such security with respect to their allegiance to the Crown as parliament should require. The practice of requiring the certificate had not been steadily adhered to. He had himself taken his seat in the House, after qualifying in the Lord Steward's office, without his certificate being demanded. He therefore thought that the course adopted by the Speaker was exactly in consonance with the usages of the House. He should propose by way of amendment, in order to bring the question to an issue, to leave out from the word "O'Connell" to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "the member for Clare, be heard at the bar, by himself, his counsel, or agents, in respect of his claim to sit and vote in Parliament, without taking the Oath of Supremacy," instead thereof.

The amendment having been agreed to, Mr. O'Connell was called in and heard; after which, Mr. O'Connell having withdrawn, the Solicitor-general moved, "That it is the opinion of this House, that Mr. O'Connell having been returned a member of this House, before the commencement of the act passed in this session of parliament, for the relief of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, is not entitled to sit or vote in this House unless he first take the Oath of Supremacy."

In the lengthened debate which ensued,—

Mr. Peel, rising after Mr. Brougham, said, he felt great diffidence in venturing to offer an opinion on a question which required for its due discussion advantages of professional education and professional experience, which he had not the good fortune to possess. But he still felt that this doubt of his competency did not relieve him from the obligation of forming an opinion on its merits, nor prevent him from expressing that opinion in his judicial capacity. The conclusion at which he had arrived was so far satisfactory as to have the sanction of three of the most eminent legal authorities. It was his good fortune, in the judgment which he had formed on the present question, to concur with his learned friend the Solicitor-general, with the learned member for Peterborough, and with his learned friend (Mr. Sugden), whose acuteness and ability were so justly appreciated. He was not prepared to concede the point at issue, on the ground that, by the act of William and Mary, the Oaths of Abjuration and Supremacy had been repealed; for on reference to that act he did not see the repeal, nor any thing to warrant his saying, that such was the design of the eminent men who framed that measure. But by referring to the 8th chapter of the first of William and Mary, it would at once appear obvious, that it never was the intent of the parliament of that day, in passing the latter act, to repeal the Oaths of Supremacy and Abjuration. The 8th chapter of the first of William and Mary provided, that the oaths shall be administered by the Lord Steward, in the Lord Steward's office, to all members of parliament previous to their taking their seats, and that the said oaths shall be administered at the same time, and in the same place, as the former oaths. The 5th section of the 8th chapter of the first of William and Mary afforded an additional proof, that it never was the intent of the legislature, in passing the 1st of William and Mary, to repeal these oaths. That section constituted a renewal of the enactment which made it obligatory on all persons coming into other situations, civil or ecclesiastical, to take these oaths; and it provided, that every person who should be admitted to any employment, civil or ecclesiastical, or who should come into any capacity in respect whereof such person was bound to take those oaths, under the former act, should take the oaths aforesaid in the manner, at the time, and in such courts and places, as he ought to take the former oaths, on entering upon such employment. Here was a strong proof of what was the intention of the legislature in passing these acts. The 1st of William and Mary provided that these oaths should be administered to all members of parliament, and this clause of an act passed subsequently in the same session provided, That the oaths established to be taken by virtue of that act, should be administered to all persons holding offices of emolument or trust under the Crown.—But he would show by a reference to the course pursued by parliament, almost immediately subsequent to the period at which the 1st of William and Mary, cap. 1, was passed, that no doubt whatever could be entertained in respect to this matter. In 1689, a few months only after the passing of the act to which he had alluded, in the new parliament which succeeded in that year, a fact occurred, which in his mind at once set the question at rest. He would ask, if the legislature had intended by the 1st of William and Mary, c. 1, to repeal the Oaths of Supremacy and Abjuration, whether if such had been, as was contended, the real intention of the legislature in passing that act, it would appear that those oaths had been administered by the Lord Steward as usual in the assembling of the new parliament? Was it possible, he would ask, if such had been the case, that an entry would appear upon the Journals of this House, dated the 20th of March, 1689, and which stated, that on that, the first day of the meeting of parliament, the Earl of Devonshire came into his office, and that in the presence of the clerk of the Crown, and of others then and there present, he administered to certain members of parliament, the oaths appointed to be taken by an act in the first year of his majesty's reign, entitled "an act," &c., and that having done so, he formed a commission, consisting of his deputy, and such of the members as had been sworn to administer the said oaths to the other members of the House of Commons, and that the said persons so commissioned and deputed, and attended by the clerk of the House of Commons, did, according to the power given to them administer the said oaths to all the members of the House previous to their taking their seats, and that the said members having been thus sworn proceeded to elect their Speaker. Would it be contended after that, that it was the real intention of the parliament of 1688 to repeal the Oaths of Supremacy and Abjuration, or to afford to any persons relief from the obligation of taking such oaths? The hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, said, that the case was full of doubt and difficulty; and that, under such circumstances, we were bound to give the individual the benefit of that doubt. Now, he was of opinion, that they were bound to stand, in this instance, upon their privileges. If this were, indeed, a case where a question before a court of justice, and a doubt arose, he would say that all the benefit of that doubt should be given to the individual. But it should be recollected, that the question before them was one which regarded more the privilege of Parliament than the right of an individual; and that they were bound to decide that question without reference to the claim of any particular individual. It was said, that Mr. O'Connell should not be made a solitary exception to the general relief afforded by the late bill. But, if the Relief bill excluded Mr. O'Connell, why was not that objection urged to it during its progress through that House? Why was not an alteration in the Relief bill then proposed, in order that Mr. O'Connell might not be excluded? But now they had to decide the claim preferred strictly in reference to the privileges of Parliament, and the obvious intent and meaning of the acts under which that claim was advanced; and there was no necessity for infusing into such a case the painful discussion of personal feelings and consideration. Good God! that personal feelings could be supposed to have any operation in this case! The claim was undoubtedly an individual, but (if he might be allowed to make the distinction) not a personal one, which was advanced in this instance by Mr. O'Connell. He happened to be the only Roman Catholic that was returned to Parliament previously to the passing of the Relief Act, and if the case had been that of Lord Surrey, the member for Horsham, instead of the member for Clare, it was his firm conviction that the House would have dealt with it precisely in a similar manner. Mr. O'Connell, being a Roman Catholic when he was elected, was disqualified by the operation of the then existing law from taking his seat. He knew at the time when he was returned, that such was the meaning given to the law then in operation; there was therefore nothing unjust in telling him, that as he was elected under the former law, by that law he must abide. They might justly say to him, "We deprive you of nothing! we leave you in the state you were in before the passing of the late bill. We have certainly for the future relieved you, in common with all Roman Catholics, from the necessity of making the declaration against Transubstantiation. That bill was intended to place all Roman Catholics in that respect upon an equal footing; but it was not intended to apply to your personal case; it was not intended to relieve you from the necessity of taking the oaths prescribed by acts of parliament which were the law of the land at the time that you were elected. It is by the operation of the former law that you are now excluded; and as you were elected previously to the passing of the Relief bill, there is no injustice whatever in now excluding you, and no necessity has been shown to induce us to go out of our way to perform an uncalled-for act of grace and favour." Mr. O'Connell was elected at a time when the passing of that act was neither contemplated by him nor by his constituents; and he had no right to have it applied retrospectively for his peculiar benefit. The learned gentleman had attributed much force to the position which Mr. O'Connell had taken up in reference to the Act of Union with Ireland. That act provided, that the oaths prescribed by the former acts to be taken by members of parliament, should continue to be taken "until parliament should otherwise provide." "Now," said Mr. O'Connell, "parliament has 'otherwise provided:' the time has expired, and the House is no longer competent to administer these oaths." The learned gentleman who spoke last characterised that as a strong point; but to him it appeared to be a most futile argument indeed.—It was not necessary to take up the time of the House in showing, that the late act was limited to a particular provision of relief for the Roman Catholics, and that a particular provision of that nature could not be urged as an alteration in the law which took away the force of all the previous enactments in every instance. If it were admitted, that the House was not competent to administer those oaths to Mr. O'Connell, neither would it be competent for the House to administer those oaths to Protestant members; and if the passing of the Relief bill took away from this House the power of requiring Protestant members to take those oaths, how had it happened that there was no objection made to them since? If the argument of Mr. O'Connell were well founded, every individual, except a Roman Catholic, on being elected, would have a perfect right to sit in parliament without taking any oaths. The argument was a most futile one indeed; but he was not a little surprised to find the learned gentleman,—after advancing such a position as that, endeavouring to support his claim under the tenth section of the act for the relief of the Roman Catholics,—after thus putting forward his right to sit under the old law, making an effort to sustain it under the act passed subsequently to his election.

Mr. Brougham.—He only adverted to that portion of the act.

Mr. Peel.—He endeavoured to force a construction upon it favourable to his particular case.

Mr. Brougham.—He only mentioned it incidentally.

Mr. Peel said, that he only intended to do the same. It was asserted, that this enactment had not only a prospective but a retrospective operation. Without entering upon the question as to what decision a court of justice might pronounce, in reference to the penalties for not taking the oaths, he would maintain, that the Relief Act had not a retrospective operation, so as to embrace Mr. O'Connell's case, and it could in no other way be made applicable to it; for Mr. O'Connell was elected before the passing of that act. It was not the law under which he was elected, and there could be no cavil on that point; for so early as the reign of Henry VI., the certificate of the sheriff that an individual was duly elected constituted sufficient evidence as to the time that member was returned, and such certificate as to the learned gentleman's return was in possession of the House.—The hon. and learned gentleman had adroitly endeavoured, by referring to proceedings in another place, and by alluding to a clause which had been there proposed by a high legal authority, during the progress of the Relief bill, for the purpose of excluding Mr. O'Connell by name, to prove that there was a strong presumption that the present enactment was insufficient for that purpose. Now, he apprehended that the argument of Lord Tenterden on that occasion was, that if Mr. O'Connell would take the Oath of Supremacy, there was nothing to prevent him from taking his seat; that the necessity of making the Declaration against Transubstantiation was removed, and that there only remained the Oath of Supremacy to keep him out. But, by referring to the act, it would be seen that its operation was wholly prospective; for it enacted, "That from and after the commencement of this act, it shall be lawful for any person professing the Roman Catholic religion, being a peer, or who shall, after the commencement of this act, be returned as a member for the House of Commons, to sit and vote in either House of Parliament respectively, being in all other respects duly qualified to sit and vote therein, upon taking and subscribing the following oath, instead of the Oath of Allegiance, Abjuration, and Supremacy." The act thus applied, not only to a Catholic in the situation of a peer, but to a Catholic who should be returned a member of the House of Commons; and its operation was strictly confined to the future.—The right hon. gentleman proceeded to state, that they were to deal judicially with this question, and to decide according to the privilege of parliament, without reference to extrinsic circumstances. Mr. O'Connell had complained that he was excluded from the enjoyment of a civil privilege. But the legislature had drawn the distinction in the Relief Act between a mere civil privilege and the right of sitting in parliament; and the House would see at once the justice of the distinction. The hon. member was excluded from no franchise or civil right whatever to which his Catholic fellow-countrymen had been admitted by the Relief Act. He was entitled to the enjoyment of all the privileges and franchises conferred by that act on complying with its provisions; but, in this instance, he claimed a right to sit as member of parliament under the old law, and by the operation of that law he was excluded. Upon the whole, he considered it their bounden duty to act in accordance with all the previous customs of parliament in such cases; and no considerations connected with, or arising out of other questions, should induce them to depart from that course. To Roman Catholics returned hereafter they would extend the benefit of the existing law; but it would be wrong to extend its benefit, by a retrospective operation, to a Roman Catholic who had been returned under a different state of the law. Under such circumstances, he felt himself bound to say that, on this occasion, he was not governed by a reference to any external circumstances, and that, let the consequences be what they might, he could not bring himself to adopt a different course. He was acting judicially, and he must vote for the resolution proposed by his hon. and learned friend.

The House divided: Ayes 190; Noes 116. Majority, 74.

Mr. O'Connell having been called to the bar, and having refused to take the Oath of Supremacy, the Solicitor-general moved, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the county of Clare, in the room of Daniel O'Connell, Esq., who, having been returned a Member of this House before the commencement of an Act passed in this Session of Parliament 'for the relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects,' has refused to take the Oath of Supremacy."

Mr. Wynn said, he found in an act of the present session, the following clause, "And be it enacted, that when the session herein directed to be first holden for the purpose of registering freeholds shall have terminated in any county, the Lord-lieutenant or other chief governor of Ireland shall cause notice thereof to be inserted in the 'Dublin Gazette;' and that in case of a vacancy in the representation of any such county in this present parliament, before the publication of such notice of the termination of the session for such county, no writ shall issue for the holding of an election of a knight of the shire for such county, until after the publication of such notice." Now, as the act also required, that no session for registering freeholds should be held until forty days after the commencement of the act, and that forty days had not yet expired, he doubted whether it would be regular for the Speaker to direct the issue of a writ which could not be complied with.

Mr. Peel was quite aware that this doubt would be suggested, and was inclined to think that, notwithstanding the objection, the motion would be better as it stood. The order of the House was not that a new writ should be issued, but merely that the Speaker should issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown. He apprehended that the Clerk of the Crown, notwithstanding the Speaker's warrant, might suspend the issue of the writ until it could be legally issued. The law, I apprehend, will justify the Clerk of the Crown in disobeying—if it can be called disobeying—or rather in not acting upon the Speaker's warrant until the time specified by act of parliament for the issue of the writ has arrived. The clerk will receive the warrant, but he will not act upon it until the law allows him. Thus it appears to me, that the House will perform the duty that devolves upon it, without acting inconsistently with the law. However, the order of the Speaker to issue his warrant may be delayed till the forty days are expired, if that course be deemed the better one; and the question, therefore, is, whether the warrant shall be immediate or delayed for forty days?

On the motion of Mr. Portman, the debate was adjourned to Thursday the 21st.

METROPOLIS POLICE BILL

MAY 19, 1829.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL having moved that the Metropolis Police Bill be recommitted, said, that the anxiety and trouble he had suffered on account of this bill made him desirous of seeing the question decided. Towards the close of the last session the committee made a unanimous report, on which the present bill was founded. That report had been printed, and every body had full notice of what was intended to be done. The bill had been brought in the week after the Catholic Relief bill was passed; so that it had now been a sufficient time before the public. If the city of London had not been included, it was because the committee had reported, that the state of the nightly police there was much superior to that in Westminster. No less than seven or eight committees, from the year 1763 to the present day, had enforced the fitness of some measure of this kind, and it was, therefore, high time that it should be introduced. The increase of crime in London and Middlesex, as appeared by returns from the Old Bailey, further showed the necessity for it; as, between 1822 and 1826, the prisoners for trial at those sessions had increased from two thousand five hundred and thirty-nine to three thousand five hundred and sixteen in the year. He apprehended that the general feeling of the metropolis and its vicinity was in favour of this bill, in which he had come to the determination of fixing the maximum of contribution, in the different parishes, at 8*d.* in the pound sterling upon the annual value of property.

After a short conversation, the bill went through the committee.

MR. O'CONNELL—CLARE ELECTION.

MAY 21, 1829.

In the resumed debate on this subject, Mr. Spring Rice moved, as an amendment, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the act of the present session of parliament, entitled, 'An Act for the Relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholic Subjects,' so far as relates to the Oaths to be taken by members of the House of Commons being Roman Catholics."

Lord Morpeth seconded the motion.

After a discussion of considerable length, Mr. Spring Rice expressed his readiness to withdraw his motion. Had he conceived it to be at variance with the good faith and honour of the House, he could not have proposed it. As there did, however, seem to be a very general opinion that any alteration of the Relief bill might involve a construction of that kind, he was anxious to withdraw it; and if any expressions had fallen from him calculated to excite angry feelings in Ireland, no one could regret it more strongly than he would.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he cordially rejoiced in the announcement of the hon. member. So little, indeed, was he disposed to take any triumph on this question, that he preferred such a conclusion to any negative of the motion, although supported by a large majority. Indeed, he should not have said a single word on the subject, had he not wished to make an observation on an expression which fell from an hon. member, attributing harshness and severity to those who brought forward the motion for the exclusion of Mr. O'Connell. Now, every thing which could give the slightest semblance of the motion being a personal proceeding had been wholly avoided. So far from wishing to push the proceedings beyond the usual practice of parliament, the motion, although not expressly enjoined by law, was not in the discretion of the House, and was in every respect conformable to its practice, in cases either exactly similar or bearing a strong analogy to that of the member for Clare. In the cases of Lord Fanshaw and Sir H. Monson, upon a refusal to qualify, they were discharged from their attendance, not expelled, and new writs were issued. The case of Archdale, the Quaker, was, however, precisely in point. There had been a case, too, of recent occurrence, which bore a strong analogy to that of Mr. O'Connell. He alluded to the case of Mr. Southey. Mr. Southey was elected member for Downton; and having thereupon written a letter to the Speaker, intimating that he did not possess the necessary qualification, the Speaker read the letter to the House, and a new writ was issued immediately. So far, therefore, as precedent went, the practice had always been in strict conformity with the present motion. Had not the House, however, acted with the greatest forbearance to Mr. O'Connell? It was well-known to every member that Mr. O'Connell had been in town from the commencement of the session; and yet, although this was notorious, had any motion been made to compel him to present himself for the purpose of taking the oaths? No motion of that kind had been attempted; and when the decision of the House was made, that decision, it ought to be recollected, was forced upon it by Mr. O'Connell himself. The course of the House had been throughout perfectly justifiable. They could not, in compliance with their duty, have adopted any other. Mr. O'Connell had pronounced a determination not to take the oaths; and he would ask, was not the House bound to provide for a new election? It had been intimated that government had used its influence to increase the majority upon this question. To that statement he gave the most peremptory contradiction. The government had not interfered in any way upon the subject. Even those ordinary forms which they all knew were used to give information to members when business of importance might be expected, was departed from in that instance. He viewed Mr. O'Connell's case merely as that of an individual; and should treat it as he should the case of any other member. The course which the law of the land and the precedents of parliament pointed out should be, without hesitation, pursued towards Mr. O'Connell, regardless of the consequences which an hon. gentleman seemed to fear would result from doing so. His gallant friend seemed to anticipate with considerable alarm the consequences which would follow the course now proposed for adoption by the House. Now, he felt no such alarm. The observations of his gallant friend he should answer by merely stating a few facts respecting the course which government had pursued, during the last few weeks, in the county with which his gallant friend was connected. Several instances of insubordination and disturbance having recently occurred in the manufacturing districts in that county, he had thought it right in mercy to the deluded sufferers, to send over to Ireland for the transport of some troops into Lancashire. Now, so far from being informed that they could not be spared, he had received the following letter from the highest authority in the sister kingdom; and he mentioned the fact to show the beneficial consequences which had already resulted from the late measure of concession. On the 9th of May he had written to the Lord-lieutenant to send over three regiments if he could spare them, and on the 11th his Excellency had written to him the following reply:—"I have this day received your letter of the 9th, signifying your wish to withdraw, if possible, one regiment of cavalry and two of infantry from the military force of this country. In reply to which, it gives me real satisfaction to inform you, that, under present appearances, these regiments may be spared without any danger to the public peace of this country." There was in this letter enough to satisfy him of the beneficial manner in which the late bill had operated upon the tranquillity of Ireland. Why, then, was it to be said that the present question, which was merely one of parliamentary privilege, was calculated to undo the good they had already achieved? He cared nothing about the new election for Clare; all he considered was, the necessity of maintaining the just privileges of parliament. Upon the question of expediency also, he was much fortified in his opinion; for if they were to reopen this consideration, what would those think who were affected by the forty-shilling disfranchisement bill, which was the price paid for the larger measure? Upon the fullest deliberation, therefore, he saw no other course which it became them to take, than to agree to the motion of his hon. and learned friend.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the original motion agreed to.

 PORTUGAL—DON MIGUEL.

JUNE 1, 1829.

On the motion of Sir J. Mackintosh, the passages in his Majesty's speech at the commencement and termination of the last, and at the commencement of the present session were read. Sir J. Mackintosh then delivered a long and powerful speech, relating to the affairs of Portugal, concluding, amidst loud cheers, with moving for copies and extracts of communications concerning the relations between this country and the Queen of Portugal, illustrative of the several topics alluded to in his speech.

Mr. SECRETARY PEEL said, that the right hon. gentleman who had just made an able and eloquent speech to the House, had reserved for the closing part an affecting address to their feelings. The right hon. gentleman had detailed the extreme severities alleged to have been committed upon certain residents in the city of Oporto. He was confident, however, that no sympathy towards the sufferings of individuals, and no indignation against injustice, would withdraw the House from the calm and dispassionate consideration of those principles on which the public policy of this country had been founded with regard to the kingdom of Portugal. He could not but express his cordial concurrence in the hope that this country, through the forbearance, wisdom, and virtue of its constitutional counsellors, would continue to enjoy the tranquillity and harmony which, for the last fifteen years, it had happily experienced. He trusted that efforts would be made to advance general instruction and civilisation, and increased commercial intercourse between the nations, until the character of merely military conquerors was reduced to its proper dimensions, and until society was impressed with just notions of moral obligations and the blessings of peace. He hoped he should not be misconstrued, as a minister of this country, in using this language. It proceeded from no unwillingness to enter upon war, if the cause were just and necessary—from no diffidence in the resources of the country—from no fear of the ability of bringing such a contest to a successful issue; but no man interested in the general improvement and happiness of mankind, and charged with the superintendence of the concerns of a great nation, could be accounted as acting an unworthy part in wishing for the continuance of peace. He indulged the hope of being able to satisfy the House, that the course pursued with respect to Portugal had not only been in conformity to the strict principle of engagements—not only in conformity to the moral responsibility which England had incurred—but that it was better calculated to provide for the continuance of tranquillity, than that which, judging by his arguments and observations, the right hon. gentleman would have been disposed to recommend with regard to the kingdom of Portugal. He admitted with the right hon. gentleman the antiquity of the relations subsisting between this country and Portugal. He admitted that they had continued almost without interruption for four hundred and fifty years; and although the right hon. gentleman said, that on three occasions Portugal was subjected to invasion in consequence of its adherence to England, yet he begged to remind the House, that England had not been backward in advancing to the succour of Portugal; and that the history of no country exhibited more proofs of the part taken by a powerful state to protect any kingdom in its interests and independence. The Portuguese were well entitled to the name of ancient allies: the inhabitants of the respective countries had united their arms in many fields, and almost always in fields of victory. The question now to be considered was, whether treaties existed imposing on Great Britain any obligation which of late had not been fulfilled; or whether any obligation imposed on her a duty to be fulfilled when called on by an appeal for further interference.

If the House would permit him, he would notice in detail the several observations of the right hon. gentleman; and in the first place, those made rather with a view of provoking explanation than of criminating or accusing the advisers of the Crown. The right hon. gentleman had stated that, by a series of treaties, England was bound to protect the integrity and independence of the Portuguese territories. That statement was correct; but he denied that, either in the letter or in the spirit of those treaties, or in any engagement or obligation entered into by Great Britain, there was conveyed a guarantee of the succession of any particular individual, or a guarantee of the existence of any political institution in Portugal. No request for such a guarantee had ever been preferred before the year 1820. In consequence of the unfortunate dissensions since that time, frequent applications had been made to England by different parties, either for the guarantee of certain institutions, or the security of existing forms of government; but the uniform answer was, that the guarantee to Portugal was against foreign invasion, and not on behalf of particular institutions, and that the general rule of England was not to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries. In 1822, his right hon. friend, Mr. Canning, being reappointed to the office of secretary for foreign affairs, was appealed to by the democratic government of Portugal for a guarantee of its political institutions. His right hon. friend referred the deputation to the declaration made by Lord Castlereagh at the congress of Laybach, as the minister of England, that her rule was not to interfere in the affairs of other countries, and distinctly notified to the secretary of state of Portugal, that the general principles of Lord Castlereagh's declaration applied to the institutions of Portugal. He held in his hand an extract from the note written by Mr. Ward under the direction of Mr. Canning. It stated that, in reply to the doubts of Mr. Oliveira, he referred to the declaration of 1821, laying it down as his Britannic majesty's principles, with respect to foreign states, to abstain from interference in their domestic affairs; a principle which applied to all independent states, and was the more binding as depending on the law of nations. He referred, he said, to this note, to show that the present policy was not a line of conduct adopted for one occasion, but a principle expressly laid down both by Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, and which, notwithstanding our peculiar relations with Portugal, in consequence of treaties existing for four hundred years, was yet not considered applicable to Portugal more than to any other state. In 1822, when Brazil and England were engaged in negotiations consequent upon the declaration of the independence of the crown of Portugal, the principle was also considered applicable, and was observed throughout; and, in acknowledging the independence of Brazil, it was understood that it should not preclude an amicable arrangement between the two countries. The course adopted by Mr. Canning not only was sanctioned by sound policy and justice, but was the principle that had always guided England, when called on to interfere in the civil concerns of Portugal. It was quite true that, in 1826, England sent an army to Portugal, and he thought then, and thought now, that, in doing so, she not only acted in conformity with the spirit of ancient treaties, but of wisdom and sound policy. Nothing could be more express than the disclaimer by Mr. Canning, that the army was not sent out for the purpose of supporting political institutions, but at the express instance of the de facto government of Portugal, craving the assistance of England as a protection from foreign invasion. The principle of non-interference was distinctly recognised in sending out that army, and every instruction to the officer in command was to forbear mingling in civil dissensions, but to protect the kingdom from foreign invasion.

He brought forward these statements to show, that England had throughout declined giving a guarantee for any political institutions, or interfering in civil dissensions. That being the general rule, was there any peculiarity in the usurpation of Don Miguel, or in the claims of Donna Maria, to impose upon England the necessity of departing from her usual course? He was prepared to contend, in opposition to the interferences that might be drawn from the arguments of the right hon. gentleman, that there was no special case calling for a departure from our general system of policy. The first proof given by the right hon. gentleman of the duty of a qualified interference was drawn from the fact, that Don Miguel's accession or usurpation was in 1825, at the time when the treaty of separation between Brazil and Portugal had been entered into, and when the constitution had been sent from Brazil, through the agency of Sir Charles Stuart, a British subject. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that this circumstance must have led the people of Portugal to believe that England was a party to the grant of the constitution, and as such bound to aid and support it. The answer to that point was quite conclusive. The affairs of Portugal would be so familiar to the House, that they would recollect that Don John, its late monarch, died in 1826, and that Don Pedro, his son, having effected the separation of Brazil and Portugal by treaty, was styled Emperor of Brazil. Don John died, and the treaty was ratified; but no provision had been made for the succession to the crown of Portugal. Don Pedro claimed the crown as king by succession, and determined on transferring it to his daughter, with the grant of a constitution. Now, the fact was, that England was not in any way responsible for that constitution. Don John died in 1826, and Sir Charles Stuart brought the constitution to Portugal on the 11th of May in the same year; and, by the dates of the different events, it was physically impossible that England should have organized the charter. Sir Charles Stuart was not only the plenipotentiary of England to Brazil, but was also employed in a similar capacity in adjusting certain differences between Brazil and Portugal; and, having discharged his duties as a British subject, he had remained at Rio Janeiro in the latter character. Sir Charles did not act by the advice of the British government, but was the mere bearer of the charter; and Mr. Canning, fearing that his residence at Lisbon might create an impression that this country was responsible for the charter, sent a circular to every court in Europe, disclaiming, on the part of the British government, any part in, or even knowledge of, the transaction; and he moreover ordered Lord Stuart forthwith to leave Lisbon, lest his presence should be misconstrued into a countenancing of Don Pedro's constitution. The right hon. gentleman had inferred, that England had contracted to support the constitutional charter. Now, it so happened, that all delusion upon that point had been effectually prevented by the language of the minister for foreign affairs, who declared in parliament, that he had declined advising the king to interfere in the affairs of Portugal. Nothing could be more explicit than the declaration of Mr. Canning. As the subject was important, he trusted the House would allow him to refer to the words of Mr. Canning. On the 12th of December, 1826, in the celebrated speech which he delivered on bringing down the king's message respecting the affairs of Portugal, Mr. Canning expressed himself as follows:—"It has been surmised, that this measure (the grant of a constitutional charter to Portugal), as well as the abdication with which it was accompanied, was the offspring of our advice. No such thing. Great Britain did not suggest this measure. It is not her duty, nor her practice, to offer suggestions for the internal regulation of foreign states. She neither approved nor disapproved of the grant of a constitutional charter to Portugal; her opinion upon that grant was never required. True it is, that the instrument of the constitutional charter was brought to Europe by a gentleman of high trust in the service of the British government. Sir Charles Stuart had gone to Brazil to negotiate the separation between that country and Portugal. In addition to his character of plenipotentiary of Great Britain as the mediating power, he had also been invested by the King of Portugal with the character of his most faithful majesty's plenipotentiary for the negotiation with Brazil. That negotiation had been brought to a happy conclusion; and therewith the British part of Sir C. Stuart's commission had terminated. But Sir C. Stuart was still resident at Rio de Janeiro as the plenipotentiary of the King of Portugal, for negotiating commercial arrangements between Portugal and Brazil. In this latter character it was that Sir C. Stuart, on his return to Europe, was requested, by the Emperor of Brazil, to be the bearer to Portugal of the new constitutional charter. His majesty's government found no fault with Sir C. Stuart for executing this commission; but it was immediately felt, that if Sir C. Stuart were allowed to remain at Lisbon, it might appear in the eyes of Europe that England was the contriver and imposer of the Portuguese constitution. Sir C. Stuart was therefore directed to return home forthwith, in order that the constitution, if carried into effect there, might plainly appear to be adopted by the Portuguese nation itself—not forced upon them by English interference." On the part of the government of England, it was evident, therefore, that no advice had been given on the subject of this charter, and that England was in no way responsible for it. Mr. Canning publicly avowed this fact; therefore there could have been no deception practised upon Portugal, nor could she have placed any reliance upon the participation of England in the transaction.

The right hon. gentleman, in the second part of his speech, had adverted to the discussions at London and Vienna, respecting the acceptance of the regency by Don Miguel, as involving a necessity to support the claims of the young queen. But surely it was too much to contend, that, if England and Austria had taken certain measures respecting the appointment of Don Miguel to the regency, with the sanction of Don Pedro, they thereby became the guarantees of the queen's rights. It was true that the King of Great Britain and the Emperor of Austria took certain measures to induce Don Miguel to comply with the engagements; and it was true that the engagements he contracted with Don Pedro were not fulfilled. That circumstance might impair the individual character and conduct of Don Miguel, in any discussion regarding his private crimes and vices: but he would remind the right hon. gentleman, that the vices and the crimes of this individual were matter of consideration for the inhabitants of Portugal; and if ever we undertook to govern our public policy by considerations arising from the private acts of individuals, he feared that that influence, which he rejoiced to hear we were admitted to possess, would not long continue. These were considerations which ought not to influence the public policy of other nations. Then the question came to this—Was England to undertake the conquest of Portugal for Donna Maria or not? That was the whole question. The right hon. gentleman said, that England and Austria ought to have compelled Don Miguel to have executed his office of Regent of Portugal. By what means? There was only one of two courses of action—either complete neutrality, or the conquest of Portugal for the queen. To give advice to Don Miguel, without intending to follow up that advice by force, if necessary, would be very likely to disappoint its effect; to threaten, without executing the threat, would be very inconsistent with the dignity of the Crown of England. To enter into any alliance with Brazil, with regard to the succession of the young queen, would for various reasons, besides our proximity to Portugal, make England the principal in the war, and Brazil an inadequate sharer. It would be difficult to contend that there was any thing in ancient treaties, or any part of our stipulations, which strengthened the claim on England to advance the interests of Donna Maria by arms, or to force upon a reluctant people a sovereign they were not willing to accept. The right hon. gentleman had said, that at Vienna it had been intimated to Don Miguel, by the courts of Austria and England, that if he did not accept the regency on the conditions upon which it was offered to him, he should be detained at Vienna until instructions could be received from Don Pedro. He (Mr. Peel) did not recollect that any such intimation had been conveyed to Don Miguel. He had no recollection as to any intention of forcibly detaining him; and he could assert that England was no party to any such forcible detention. England was merely present by her ambassador. It was, no doubt, an indignity to England, that Don Miguel did not fulfil his stipulations, which had been entered into in the presence of her ambassador. But the question was, whether it were just or politic to make this a ground of war? He deplored, as much as the right hon. gentleman, Don Miguel's non-observance of those stipulations, and his want of faith; but he only contended that there was no ground for the interference of England by force, still less for adopting a principle of interference which might lead to serious consequences.

Another subject to which the right hon. gentleman had referred, was the blockade of Terceira; and, without entering into all the particulars of that blockade, he should be able to justify the course pursued by government. The right hon. gentleman had lamented that England had respected a blockade established by a de facto government. He would merely adduce—as a proof that there was no partiality to Portugal in recognising the blockade—the fact, that when Don Pedro disunited the Portuguese empire, and declared Brazil independent, in defiance of his father, he established a blockade. England, upon that occasion, pursued the same course she had now done. Without pronouncing upon the legality of the government, she respected this act. So, in the present case, without pronouncing on the legality of Don Miguel's government, finding a blockade established, we had respected it, as we had done in Greece and in South America when a blockade was established by a competent force. Then the right hon. gentleman had contended that there was a want of courtesy in not admitting the claims of the respective ministers of Portugal and Brazil. Now, there were three individuals in this country who had taken part in some diplomatic relations—the Marquis Palmella, the Marquis Barbacena, and Count Itabayana. But when the Marquis Palmella was applied to respecting the affairs of Portugal, he declared his functions to be at an end. Surely England could not be expected to recognise a minister, who, when he was addressed upon public matters, declared that his functions as a minister were at an end! With regard to the Marquis Barbacena, he arrived here in charge of the Queen of Portugal, quite unexpectedly. The queen had been sent from the Brazils to Vienna, in order to be placed under her relation the Emperor of Austria. No notification had been transmitted to this country of his intention to send her here. Letters were actually received from Mr. Gordon, our minister at the Brazils, dated three weeks after the Queen of Portugal had sailed, which mentioned no intention of the queen coming to England. It was not until the arrival of the Marquis Barbacena at Gibraltar, that he determined to convey her hither; and it was not too much for the government to ask the marquis, "In what character do you appear?" Still it was intimated to him, that notwithstanding the want of courtesy displayed in not notifying the intention of her majesty, this would not affect the conduct of the government, or cause the disrespectful reception of the queen. But this showed the absolute necessity of ascertaining the character and powers of the marquis. Therefore, he could not think that his noble friend at the head of the foreign department, having to do with three ministers of one state, was in fault if he desired to know their powers before he treated with them.

He would again remind the hon. gentleman, that if Don Miguel did sway the destinies of Portugal, this was not owing to foreign influence; it was owing to the Portuguese themselves. He had been proclaimed king by the Cortes of the kingdom. An insurrection had indeed sprung up, but it had failed. The right hon. gentleman said that it failed through some mistake, and that, if the insurgents had pressed forward to Lisbon, Don Miguel and his mother would have been forced to emigrate. But he (Mr. Peel) held it to be quite unnecessary to discuss these points, or to enquire into the popularity of the king, or the consequences which might have happened if the insurgent general had advanced. Don Miguel was the person administering, de facto, the government of Portugal, and he could not think it prudent on the part of England to undertake to displace him, and to dictate to the Portuguese who should be their ruler.

The only other transaction to which the right hon. gentleman had referred in the second part of his speech, was that of Terceira. He would attempt to explain, with as much clearness as possible, the course which the government had pursued in this affair. It was the determination of the English government to maintain a strict and undeviating neutrality in regard to the dissensions of Portugal; and they resolved not to be induced, by any appeal to their feelings, to depart from it. They considered that there had been no sufficient case made out for forcible interference, and they resolved not to interfere. When the insurgents in the north of Portugal were driven to take refuge in Spain, Spain objected to receive them, and England did interfere to procure them a milder treatment. They, however, determined to repair to England, and applied for leave, which was granted; and a body of from three thousand to four thousand men were received at Plymouth, and continued there for a considerable time. The right hon. gentleman said, that a notification was conveyed to them in November, that the officers were to be separated from the men; that, in consequence, the Marquis Palmella informed the Duke of Wellington of their wish to retire to Brazil, and that on the 23d of December they applied to go to Terceira. The right hon. gentleman's version of this transaction was somewhat different from his. On the 23d of December, an intimation had been given to Marquis Palmella, that England would not permit them to go on a hostile expedition to any part of the Portuguese dominions. But the right hon. gentleman had not stated that, on the 15th of October, two months before the period before mentioned, the Marquis Barbacena had written to the Duke of Wellington to inform him that the government of the Azores had made preparations for the reception of the Portuguese refugees, and that the marquis applied for a conveyance of the troops to Terceira, the largest island of the Azores. The other islands had acknowledged Don Miguel; in Terceira the garrison was in favour of Don Miguel, but there was a strong party in the island in favour of the queen. The answer of the Duke of Wellington, on the 18th of October, was, that England was determined to maintain a neutrality in the civil dissensions of Portugal, and that the king, with that determination, could not permit the ports and arsenals of England to be made places of equipment for hostile armaments. It was intimated to the Marquis of Palmella, that although the government were willing to give shelter to the troops, it was improper that they should continue to occupy Plymouth as a military body, and that they should distribute themselves in the adjoining villages. The answer to this intimation was, that their separation as a military body would relieve the Portuguese government of its apprehensions. Was it to be tolerated, that a power not at war with us should see a force collected in England sufficient to excite apprehensions? The Marquis Palmella was told, that the troops must give up their military character, and become individuals. The answer was, that rather than separate, and destroy their military character, they would prefer going to Brazil. The reply to this was, that we did not wish them to go to Brazil, but we would not obstruct them; and, in order to protect them from Portuguese cruisers, a British convoy was offered and declined. The right hon. gentleman said, that application was made for permission for a body of unarmed men to go to Terceira. But it was necessary that the House should know certain facts relating to the export of arms in that island, which, if permitted, every object they had in view would have been attained. He was sorry to be obliged to state these facts; but it was necessary to the vindication of the government, and those who were implicated in those transactions must suffer. At an earlier period than that mentioned by the right hon. gentleman—namely, the 15th of August, 1828—Count Itabayana had applied to Lord Aberdeen for permission to export one hundred and fifty barrels of gunpowder and a quantity of muskets to Brazil. Lord Aberdeen replied, that he would grant that permission, provided the arms and powder were not intended to be employed in the civil dissensions of Portugal; that if the Emperor of Brazil had determined to attempt to conquer Portugal, England would not interfere; and he therefore required a bona fide declaration as to the manner in which the arms and powder were to be employed. Count Itabayana's answer was, that he did not hesitate to give a clear and precise reply, and that there was no intention of so employing them. In consequence of this answer, Lord Aberdeen gave the permission desired; but the arms and powder were, notwithstanding this declaration, instantly transported to Terceira. Therefore, when application was made to the government for permission for the troops to leave this country for Terceira, they said, "We have been already deceived; you profess to sail as unarmed men, but you will find arms on your arrival at Terceira." They did, however, sail, and the right hon. gentleman had asked what right we had to stop them on the high seas? He would tell the House, that they sailed with false clearances, which were obtained at the Custom-house as for Gibraltar, for Virginia, and other places; but the vessels really went to Terceira. Now, he begged the House to consider, and to decide on this statement of the case, and he would ask, whether it were consistent with the character of England to permit a military body thus to wage war from our ports with a power with which we were not at war? We did not recognise Don Miguel, it was true; but we were not at war with Portugal. We still maintained commercial relations with that country, and had a consul there. It was too much for Brazil to desire to place us in a different situation with Portugal from that in which she was herself placed with that country; for she also had a consul there. We had no reason to believe that Don Pedro meditated a conquest of any part of the Portuguese dominions; and the question was, whether private individuals were to be permitted to carry on hostilities with Portugal from Plymouth? The duty of neutrality was as strong in respect to a de facto government as to one de jure. It was inconsistent with neutrality to permit an armed force to remain in this country. In addition to the Portuguese troops at Plymouth, three hundred Germans were enlisted in the north of Europe to reinforce them. Was this to be tolerated? When the Portuguese refugees went to Spain, we required that the officers should be separated from the men, and because Spain refused, we prepared to go to war, and actually sent five thousand men to enforce our demand. Was it the policy of England to prevent the dismemberment of the Portuguese empire? In 1825, we stipulated that Portugal should be separated from Brazil; so that motives of policy as well as neutrality called upon us to discourage these attempts, and above all to prevent this country from being made the arena for the designs of other powers. What was to prevent Russia and France from making a similar use of our ports?

He would now leave the House to decide, whether the government of England was not right in preventing its manifest intention being defeated by false clearances and false assurances. These were the facts of the case; and he was satisfied that the character of England had been vindicated by not allowing its ports to be made subservient to such designs. These were the principles upon which government had acted. The officer who had been entrusted with the naval expedition to Terceira, had acted with the utmost forbearance. He gave ample warning; and it was not until a passage was attempted to be forced that he reluctantly fired a shot, which killed one man and wounded another. Having now given the explanations which the right hon. gentleman required, he came to his motion. It was impossible not to acknowledge the forbearance of the House with regard to the discussion of foreign affairs—a forbearance dictated by a sense of the delicacy of interfering with pending negotiations, and prejudging measures; yet he had no hesitation in saying, that he was perfectly prepared to acquiesce in the motion of the right hon. gentleman, and probably the right hon. gentleman, instead of confining it to a call for certain papers, would allow his motion to stand as it appeared in the notice paper—"for copies or extracts of communications concerning the relations between this country and her most faithful Majesty the Queen of Portugal;" and he assured him, that every paper connected with the Queen of Portugal, which it was consistent with the duty of ministers to produce, should be most readily given.

At a subsequent period of the debate,—

Mr. Peel said, that the British government had not recently made any proposition for the completion of the marriage between Don Miguel and Donna Maria, nor had it ever made any such proposition at any time except with the cordial concurrence of the Emperor of Brazil. The moment the emperor intimated an objection to the marriage, all communication on the subject on the part of the British government ceased. No proposition for the renewal of the proceedings would be made unless with the entire concurrence of the Emperor of Brazil.

Lord Palmerston having delivered a long and masterly speech, the motion was eventually withdrawn, after which,

Mr. Peel moved for "Copies or Extracts of communications concerning the relations between this country and her most Faithful Majesty, the Queen of Portugal."—Agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

The Marquis of Blandford, after an introductory speech, moved the following resolutions on the subject of parliamentary reform :—

"1. That there exists a class or description of boroughs, commonly called close or decayed, in which the returns of members to parliament are notoriously capable of being effected by the payment of money in the way of purchase, and frequently are so effected; and also another class of boroughs, in which the elective franchise is vested in so few electors, that the returns are capable of being effected by the payment of money in the way of bribes to individual electors, and frequently are so effected.

"2. That the existence of such boroughs, and the continuance of such practices, are disgraceful to the character of this House, destructive of the confidence of the people, and prejudicial to the best interests of the country."

The first resolution having been put, it was seconded by Mr. O'Neil.

Mr. Hume said, he conceived that none of the propositions contained in the resolutions could be denied. They had been over and over again proved at the bar of the House, and in evidence before various committees; the allegations advanced in the resolutions were so self-evident, that he did not think it would be possible to find a single member in that House disposed to dispute them. He should certainly vote for the motion.

Mr. SECRETARY PEEL said, he was not prepared to affirm the truth of the allegations contained in these resolutions. Though he differed in opinion from the noble marquis, he was ready to admit the temper and ability with which he had submitted this question to the House; and although His Majesty's government had unfortunately incurred his disapprobation, and though he differed from the noble marquis on this particular question, he begged to assure him that that circumstance did not in the slightest degree lessen the satisfaction which he felt at seeing the noble marquis, the descendant of an illustrious warrior, and the representative of a noble house, bringing forward a measure of this description in such a moderate spirit, and supporting his opinion with an ability worthy of the cause which he had undertaken, and of the name which he bore. This was, however, a subject of such vast importance, that it was obviously necessary that ample time should be afforded for its consideration; and it was plain that, if the House were prepared to affirm the abstract principles of resolutions like those, it should follow them up by some practical measure. Now, he conceived that it would be impossible for the House, even if they were prepared to affirm the allegations of those resolutions, to follow them up by any practical measure at that late period of the session. That was his first objection to this motion. He also objected to the character which these resolutions went to affix upon the small boroughs of this country. If hon. members would even go the length of adopting the charges preferred by the resolutions against the small borough system, would it be fair to give the sanction of the House to such charges, without adopting some remedy for the evil, if evil there did exist in that portion of our representative system? But he was not prepared to affirm the truth of the charges made against the close boroughs. He could not assent to the proposition, that boroughs, where the electors were few in number, were more open to bribery and corruption, than boroughs where the number of electors was great; because he had no evidence whatever of the fact. He could not, therefore, consent to involve in a sweeping condemnation those boroughs where there was a small number of electors. He had no reason to suppose that the trustees of those boroughs had violated the trust reposed in them. But even if, after due consideration, it should appear that any of those boroughs had not honestly exercised their franchise, the noble lord had not stated how he would propose to appropriate the forfeited franchise. The hon. gentleman who had seconded the motion had advocated the necessity of adopting these resolutions now, with a view to pledge the House to the discussion of this important question next session. But if the resolutions were negatived now, the noble lord would not lose the opportunity of having this question discussed next session; and it so happened, by a fortuitous coincidence, that that very night a noble lord had given notice of a motion for next session, for the purpose of giving the elective franchise to the manufacturing towns of Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds. So that if there should be no time for debating the question of parliamentary reform this session, ample opportunity would be afforded for the discussion of the subject in the next session. The noble lord, besides, rested his motion upon grounds which he imagined would not meet with the approbation of the advocates of the general measure of parliamentary reform on the other side of the House. The noble lord had attacked the close boroughs as having, in the first instance, been the means of the adoption by that House of the abominable principles of free trade: and, secondly, as having enabled that House, contrary to the sense of the people, to carry the question of Catholic emancipation. Now, those who advocated the general measure of reform, would scarcely support the resolutions of the noble lord on the ground that the close boroughs had contributed to the triumph of a great principle over local prejudices and passions; nor was he aware that the noble lord's objection to the existence of the close boroughs, as influencing the adoption of the principle of free trade, would have a greater weight with those hon. members. If the system of close boroughs had contributed to the triumph of those great principles, such a system should rather be preserved than sacrificed. Even if he could at all bring himself to assent to the proposition of the noble lord, he would object to the period at which it had been brought forward.

After a speech from Mr. Hobhouse,—

Mr. Peel said, that the hon. member had not treated him quite fairly in his observations. The fact was, when he saw the Speaker about to put the question, after the mover and seconder had spoken, and a few words had been said by the hon. member for Wiltshire, he deemed it right, under such circumstances, to make one or two remarks. Now, he would ask, would it have been fitting, when the case stood thus, for him to have entered into the whole of this question, or to have stated what his views with reference to it were? To prove that the House were not ripe for the discussion of the question, he need only refer to the fact that, in the ten minutes' speech of the hon. gentleman, he had entirely mistaken the nature of the motion. The motion was not for enquiry: on the contrary, the noble marquis proposed the utter condemnation of those small decayed boroughs, in support of which the hon. gentleman had made one of his ablest speeches. He hoped the hon. gentleman would not draw any inference, therefore, from what had occurred that evening, as to his impression with respect to parliamentary reform. He thought he had shown that this was not the occasion on which the House ought to proceed to the discussion of such a question; and being of that opinion, he had met the motion of the noble lord with a direct negative.

The House at length divided: For the motion, 40; Against it, 114 Majority, 74.

EAST RETFORD.

Mr. H. Fane, after presenting two petitions from the Aldermen and Burgesses of East Retford, moved, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the electing of two burgesses to serve in this present parliament for the borough of East Retford, in the room of the Hon. Sir R. L. Dundas and W. B. Wrightson, Esq. whose election has been declared to be void."

Mr. Tennyson moved, as an amendment, "That Mr. Speaker do not issue his warrant to the clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the electing of two burgesses to serve in this present parliament for the borough of East Retford during the continuance of the present session."

Several hon. members having addressed the speaker on the subject,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he thought that there would be greater inconvenience in now issuing the writ than in withholding it. When the House had almost unanimously declared that the borough of East Retford was corrupt, and that it deserved punishment of some kind or another it appeared to him very improper to issue a writ, empowering these corrupt voters to return two members to parliament.

He should vote, therefore, for the amendment of the hon. member. It would have been better, indeed, if the amendment had not been put into its present form by the hon. member, and if he had met the question by a direct negative. He was desirous to meet it so; and if the hon. member would withdraw his amendment, and meet the motion by a direct negative, it should have his support. He begged leave to take that opportunity of replying to some charges which had been made against the government, of wishing to postpone every question till the next session. If ever there was a parliament which could be complained of for not doing business, this was not that parliament. He recollected that, at the early period of the session, the complaint made against the government was not procrastination. They were then accused of hastening their decisions beyond what was proper, and of having made up their mind on the questions that were submitted to them, too hastily. He did not think that the charge of wishing to escape responsibility was at all deserved; but it was not extraordinary that the members of government, whose time had been occupied, should desire, when questions were submitted to parliament involving most important principles, which the individuals who brought them forward had mastered by their undivided attention—it was not extraordinary, that ministers should desire to have the recess, in order to make themselves masters of these important subjects.

The amendment having been withdrawn, the House divided on the original motion: For the motion, 44; Against it, 135; Majority, 91.

THE CURRENCY.

JUNE 4, 1829.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition from a respectable body of manufacturers of Birmingham, signed by 8000 individuals, praying for an alteration in the currency, with a view to the reduction of the public burthens.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL, rising after Mr. Attwood, said, that if the hon. gentleman who had just sat down could propose any plan calculated to remove the calamities of the country of which he complained, he should have chosen a proper period of the session to unfold it; but, instead of doing so, he had got up at that late period of the session, and complained in aggravated terms of the evils under which we were suffering, without suggesting any remedy. It was impossible to restore the currency of this country to a sound and healthy state, without producing a great deal of suffering in the country. The currency, after the year 1797, having become greatly depreciated, ministers had no other alternative open to them, but either to leave things as they were, or to do that which would be attended with distress and suffering for years to some classes in the country. Two measures offered themselves to their consideration in 1819—either to leave matters as they were, with a depreciated standard, or to raise the standard by returning to a metallic currency. An equitable adjustment was also proposed then; and it was proposed that the public creditor, with whom a debt had been contracted in a depreciated paper currency, should, upon our returning to a metallic currency, be paid only in proportion to the value of the paper currency in which the debt had been contracted. The first and great objection to this was, that it would be impossible to discover the original creditor; and, in the next place, it would be obviously unjust to adopt such a measure in regard to those individuals into whose hands those funds had subsequently passed, and who might have purchased them in a currency but little depreciated below the existing standard. He hoped never to live to see the time when a restriction upon the Bank would be again found necessary. It would be easy for government, by an issue of paper, to increase the circulation of the country; but what would be the consequences?—that the exchanges would rise, and that gold would be carried out of the country. Let them but once give the power to the Bank to issue paper not payable in gold, and all the consequences which Mr. Hume, in one of his essays on the increase of the currency, had pointed out, would immediately follow. Such a measure would for the moment promote the prosperity of the country; and it was undoubtedly in the power of the government by such means for a time to establish a factitious prosperity in the country. Such an increase in the currency would, for the time, give a stimulus to trade and commerce; but if he were sure of that, he was still more certain, that such prosperity would not last long, and that the period of unnatural excitement would be followed by a period of languor, and that greater distress and suffering would arise than they had ever before witnessed. It was not necessary to look to the state of the exchanges during the last two months, to see what would be the effect of the issue of a paper currency. The government would, by such means, encourage the departure of gold from this country. It would leave the country; while the Bank would be liable still to pay in gold on demand; and he was convinced, that they never could return to the issue of a paper currency, without relieving the Bank from the obligation of paying in gold. Such an increase in the currency would only in the end increase the sufferings of the country. The government was determined to adhere to the present system; and, for the reasons which he had stated, he never would consent to a revision or alteration of the existing currency of the country. The exports of the country, its imports, and the quantity of exciseable articles, had, during this period, increased. As the consumption of exciseable articles had increased, the receipts of the revenue had progressively increased also. How did the hon. member reconcile these facts to his statement of the total depression of trade and deficient demand? There was a fact which ought not to be lost sight of in looking at this alleged depression, which was the probability that the prosperity of one rising district, such as Manchester, affected perceptibly and injuriously the established manufactures of other districts, having, as it might be called, a monopoly hitherto in that branch of manufacture, such as Macclesfield and Spitalfields. Instead of factories having decreased in number, or the spirit of speculation in this respect being on the decline, the number had sensibly increased every year since 1820, more particularly at Manchester; and, singularly enough, those factories were either silk factories altogether, or factories of goods compounded of silk and cotton, or other material. In 1820 they were fifty-four in number, and they were assessed to the poor-rates of the town at the annual value of £16,816. In 1823 there were fifty-six, and they were assessed at a yearly annual value of £18,293. In 1826, the year in which the Small-Notes bill passed, they increased to seventy-two, and were assessed at £24,000; and in 1828, the year prior to the Small Notes bill coming into operation, they were in number seventy-three, and were assessed at £25,245 annual value. It was true, that during a part of this period some of them were untenanted; but of those tenanted in 1820, there were fifty-two factories, whilst in 1828 there were sixty. How, then, if trade were not progressively increasing, did it happen that the desire to embark in this branch of manufacture had increased from 1820 up to last year? The same disposition to speculate in this branch of manufacture had been displayed in Charleaton-row and Salford, suburbs of Manchester,—the former in 1820 having but five manufactories, in 1828 twelve; Salford having also in 1820 seven factories, in 1828 twelve. It would be absurd to say that this was an evidence of distress in this trade, or a want of incentive to speculate. Yet the hon. member fancied there was, notwithstanding, a cessation of demand for these articles of manufacture. To place the reverse of this argument in the strongest light, it was only necessary to inspect the returns as to the number of looms at work in 1823, which was but two thousand three hundred; whilst in 1828 the number was increased to eight thousand. The information he had on the subject of the silk-trade there was, that the trade was brisk, and that no good silk-weaver was at present in want of employment. Now, were he to hazard an opinion as to the present depression of trade, he should be disposed to attribute it to a variety of causes. Nor was it a singular epoch in the history of our manufactures. Antecedently to 1797, and ere any tampering had taken place with the currency, depression and languor had manifested itself for a time, which was followed by a season of activity. Much was to be attributed last year to the over-productiveness of our manufactures,—to the bad harvest not a little,—to the effect of the American tariff, a measure which, it would seem, had lost its efficacy, in consequence of the activity in smuggling British goods into the United States. Yet though these causes combined to depress trade, prices had recovered, and there was an improvement in the market; nor did he doubt that the vessel would right itself, were it afforded an opportunity. It would, in his mind, be wise not to interfere by the appointment of a committee. He had forgotten to mention, that the factory system had superseded so much the exercise of manual labour, that extreme distress was suddenly brought on particular classes of tradesmen, whilst the trade itself flourished; and in some instances the machinery was so extremely expensive, that the manufacturers, rather than put it out of play, consented to go on incurring a diminution of profits to the extent of ten per cent., or even more. The excellence of our machinery, and its substitution for manual labour, each day threw many out of employment. This was felt more particularly by the poor Irish at Manchester; who crowded thither whenever they were encouraged to expect occupation, being enabled to come over at the trifling charge of 1s. 6d. a head, to a country which not only gave them work, but allowed them a provision from the poor-rates when ill. Their situation had given considerable concern to the magistrates in that district; and they had very properly, in some cases, admitted their claim to relief from parochial funds. He begged the House, especially as appearances were improving, not to unsettle the public mind on a subject of such vital importance. As a minister of the Crown, and speaking with the deliberation which a person in his situation ought to speak, he would say, that no measure could be introduced which would more directly tend to wound our commercial and manufacturing interests, than to derange the system of the currency of the country.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY—BLACKBURN PETITION.

JUNE 12, 1829.

Mr. Sadler presented a petition from Blackburn, in Lancashire, in which the petitioners complained of the great distress in which they, in common with others of the manufacturing classes, were involved, and entreating the House to cause an investigation to be made into the stagnation of trade under which they suffered.

In the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he could not help thinking that the presentation of a petition, and one too without notice, was a most inconvenient season for discussing the merits of so important a question as the state of the nation. He should not therefore follow the hon. baronet (Sir R. Vyvyan) through his details; although if the time were a fit one, he was not without ample materials for rebutting the inferences which he had drawn from them. Upon one point he ought to concur with the hon. baronet; whose fault it certainly was not, that he was deprived of a suitable opportunity of bringing forward the motion of which he had given notice. At the same time he was bound to assure him, that it was not his (Mr. Peel's) fault that the discussion did not come on; for he had attended in his place prepared to argue the whole question with the hon. baronet, and he sincerely believed that the circumstance of not making a House on that particular night was purely accidental. The subject, however, had certainly been very fully discussed upon another occasion; so that there ought to be no complaint of a denial of hearing. He was far from denying the existence of distress. In many parts of the country that distress was severe, and was accompanied by great privation and suffering. Particularly in the district from which the petition that had been presented by the hon. baronet proceeded, was the distress great. He doubted, indeed, if any other part of the kingdom had suffered so much from the effect which the introduction of machinery had had on the hand-loom of the weavers, as that district. It was impossible to look at the efforts of the population in that district to live, and at the inadequacy of their wages, without painful commiseration. But he very much feared, that while the existence of severe distress was admitted, it must also be admitted, that, in the complicated relations of society, it was impossible to apply a satisfactory remedy. He was convinced that, on mature reflection, the hon. baronet, the member for Cornwall, would see that the solution of a mathematical problem was a thing entirely different from the administration of practical relief in a case such as that in question. Those persons must not be supposed to be indifferent to the distress, who were adverse to the policy of entering upon the enquiry recommended by the other side of the House. They felt that, unless they could be pretty confident that such an enquiry would be productive of a satisfactory result, it might aggravate the evil which it was intended to diminish. The hon. member for Aberdeen had declared that there were at least two subjects which ought to be fully investigated before the separation of parliament; namely, the Corn-laws, and the question of Emigration. Now, really, if there were any two topics which had occupied the attention of parliament more than any others, they were precisely those which the hon. member for Aberdeen had described as demanding enquiry. The Corn-laws the hon. member for Aberdeen had himself brought under the consideration of the House but a short time ago, when the subject was fully discussed. The hon. member had himself made a speech on the occasion which lasted three hours and three quarters, and to which he had listened with great attention. The hon. member's proposition was to substitute a fixed duty on foreign corn for the present scale of duties; but the House did not agree with him on the subject. Constant fluctuations on such a subject were most injurious. What advantage could accrue to the country, if, on every question, such as that of the Corn-laws, the legislation were never allowed to be settled even for a single year? Having made an experiment respecting it last year, was it desirable for the House to pledge itself to enter into an enquiry on the subject next year? Were such questions to be always at the mercy of any man who chose to agitate them, and propose that they should be unsettled? If, whenever distress existed in any particular place—distress attributed to machinery, or the importation of foreign wool, or the system of Corn-laws—an enquiry was immediately demanded, there would be an end to all confidence, and no one would venture to embark his capital in any commercial enterprise. He must protest, however, against an unwillingness to enter into such enquiries, being considered as an insensibility to distress. With respect to the existing distress, he must say, that he did not take so gloomy a view of the subject as some hon. gentlemen seemed disposed to take. He could not allow that the capital of the country was daily diminishing. Still less could he allow that our commerce was carrying on by the application of capital from which the capitalist received no return. Such might be the case for a single year; but when he heard the same thing stated for eight or ten years, his answer was, that under such circumstances the capital would be withdrawn. Against the allegation, that the capital of the country had diminished, he would state one strong fact. In the year 1815—a period when the currency of the country was increased by a paper circulation—the rental of the county of Lancashire was valued, for the purpose of determining the contributions to the county rate. That valuation was, he believed, perfectly fair. By some persons, however, it had been considered unfair, and another valuation had taken place last year for the same purpose. The valuation of the rental on land and on the manufacturing establishments of Lancashire, in 1815, amounted to three millions. Last year the valuation (although the improvement in the currency would have a tendency to diminish the nominal amount) was four millions. That fact he opposed to the statement, that the manufactures and the agriculture of the country were carrying on at a positive loss. While he made this statement, however, he admitted the evil of the unequal distribution of wealth in this country, and the general disadvantage which sprung from the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a few individuals; but this was unavoidable, and emanated from the same cause as the increased production of machinery, which, in its improved condition, became so extensively a substitute for manual labour. In conclusion, it was, he feared, a lamentable fact, that so many causes combined to produce this state of things, that any attempt to legislate, with a view to the correction of any of them by the application of specific measures, instead of mitigating, would aggravate all the evils of which the suffering classes of society complained. The government would, however, give their best attention to the subject.

After several other members had spoken, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

ADDRESS ON THE KING'S SPEECH, AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION OF 1830.

FEBRUARY 4, 1830.

The Earl of Darlington moved the Address on the King's Speech, which was seconded by Mr. Ward.

Sir E. Knatchbull proposed an amendment to be made to the question, by inserting, after the words "any former year," the words, "but that we lament the existence of that distress which his Majesty informs us prevails in some places:—We are, however, in the faithful discharge of our duty, constrained to declare to his Majesty our opinion, that this distress is not confined, as his Majesty has been advised, to some particular places, but that it is general among all the productive interests of the country, which are severely suffering from its pressure:—We beg to assure his Majesty, that we will adopt the caution his Majesty has recommended, in the consideration of such measures as may be proposed to us, and that our earnest endeavours shall be directed to relieve the country from its present difficulties."—The amendment was seconded by the Marquis of Blandford.

Mr. Protheroe moved a second amendment, as follows:—"That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to express to his Majesty the thanks of this House for his Majesty's most gracious Speech; and respectfully to inform his Majesty, that being assembled with the deepest impression of the extraordinary duties imposed on us by the unexampled difficulties and dangers of the country, we will direct our instant and earnest attention to those measures best calculated to maintain the dignity and stability of his Majesty's Throne, and to restore this nation to its ancient prosperity and happiness. To assure his Majesty of our undiminished attachment to his sacred person, and of our grateful conviction of his paternal feelings for the sufferings of his subjects; relying upon which, we consider it our first duty to lay before his Majesty a correct representation of the actual state of the country, and of all its leading interests, not concealing those wrongs and grievances which, with the assistance of a faithful parliament, his Majesty will delight to redress.

"To represent to his Majesty, that the measures recommended by his ministers, and adopted by parliament, have failed to restore the country, or to mitigate the calamities under which it is sinking.

"That the tendency of the present political, financial, and ecclesiastical systems, is to accumulate, in few hands, enormous masses of property, leaving the middle classes struggling to support a precarious credit, and the lower, in a degrading dependence for daily food.

"That neither the landowner nor the farmer has been enriched by the Corn Laws, while the bread of the poor is made dear, and the labourer is stinted in his hire.

"That the merchant, the shipowner, the manufacturer, the tradesman, are proceeding in hopeless efforts of industry, without remuneration, notwithstanding the extraordinary inventions of British science and ingenuity, and the increasing demands of extensive countries newly opened to our trade.

"That the peasantry and operative mechanics, with wages or pay barely adequate to the support of life, are hastening to a state of universal pauperism, holding out temptations to the disregard and breach of laws that no longer afford security to property.

"That the pleasures of the rich are purchased by the demoralization of the poor, under the administration of Game-laws, originating in ages of feudal oppression, and pertinaciously adhered to and increased in severity by selfish legislation, whereby the prisons of the country are filled for offences not associated in the feelings of the people with moral guilt or delinquency.

"That by an ill-proportioned system of duties, having no reference but to the supply of a needy Exchequer, the poorer classes are deprived of the wholesome and nutritious drink of their forefathers, and are driven to the use of ardent spirits, alike destructive to their health and morals.

"That the nation is bowed down by a weight of taxation, which has been immoderately increased by laws affecting a change in the currency, made without a due consideration of the situation of the country, so that it is utterly unable to support the burthen.

"That it is impossible for the people to view, without disgust, the mockery of their distress, by a wasteful, blundering, and jobbing expenditure of the public money, in the erection of palaces and public buildings in the metropolis, alike devoid of taste and utility.

"That the people have a right to complain of the indecent and unjust continuance, in undiminished amount, of various grants, pensions, salaries, and allowances which had been fixed or raised during the suspension of cash payments, upon the express plea and justification of the depreciation in value of money.

"That we receive with grateful satisfaction his Majesty's assurance, that the reformation of the administration of the laws has occupied his Majesty's attentive consideration; and that we will devote our earnest attention to the communications his Majesty may direct to be made on these matters.

"That the tithe system (at all times an obnoxious and unpopular mode of providing for the clergy) is at this season of agricultural distress peculiarly galling in its operation, while the unequal distribution of the revenues of the Church of England and Ireland, and the inadequate provision for those who perform its most active duties, are viewed with serious concern by the friends of the establishment, and afford just cause of scandal to its enemies.

"That the colonial interests of the country are plunged in a state of equal depression and suffering, the prices obtained for the produce of our colonies affording in general no profit in return for the capital, the labour, and the anxiety attending its cultivation.

"In acknowledging to his Majesty our conviction, that a state of national suffering and abuses so great and so general, after a long period of profound peace, and amidst so many elements of political prosperity, cannot have been produced without fundamental errors in legislation and government.

"Finally, to assure his Majesty that, although we cannot but feel how uncertain must be all dependence upon the acts of a legislature which does not, and cannot as now constituted, adequately represent the talents, the sentiments, and the wishes of the country, yet we will not fail, while maintaining the integrity of our admired constitution, to consult in all our deliberations the spirit of an enlightened age, and the just petitions of the people, by decided retrenchment of expense, large reduction of taxation, and by a needful reform, commencing with our own House."

Mr. Alderman Waithman expressed a hope that the hon. baronet who moved the first amendment would withdraw it in favour of that just proposed, which seemed more fully to express what he trusted was the sense of the House, because it was much nearer the truth.

In the debate which followed, MR. SECRETARY PEEL, who rose after Mr. Huskisson, said, he certainly was not surprised to hear his right hon. friend say, that the chief recommendation of the hon. baronet's amendment in his eyes consisted in its being "a milk and water amendment," because when he recollected the votes uniformly given by his right hon. friend, and the doctrines which he had uniformly held, he must say, that the smallest possible infusion of milk in the water was precisely that which would best suit the right hon. gentleman's constitution. [Hear and laughter.] The doctrine of his right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) had been, on former occasions, when changes were called for, "Beware how you excite fallacious hopes—trust to the native energy—the natural elasticity of our resources, by which we have so often triumphed; and do not risk the permanent interests of the country by rash experiments on the capital and industry of our fellow-subjects." The right hon. gentleman had not only resisted practical measures, but committees of enquiry, lest he should excite false expectations; and now, hearing an amendment proposed, on principles from which he totally dissents, he is, nevertheless, prepared to support it, because he thinks the exposition of facts contained in the amendment better than that in the Speech from the throne. What course did the right hon. gentleman take with regard to the committee moved for to enquire into the state of the currency? He resisted its appointment to the last, lest its appointment should unsettle men's minds, and upon the same principle he resisted the enquiry into the state of the silk trade last session [hear]. However, it would have been more consistent if his right hon. friend had waited till he heard what specific measures were to be proposed, before he opposed his Majesty's government. It would have been better if he had not endeavoured to raise the expectations of the country, as they must be raised, if we admitted the existence of universal distress, and dissented from the Speech from the throne, stating that his Majesty's ministers had been misinformed—that all our interests were suffering under no ordinary pressure, and that we would direct our efforts to provide relief. Depend upon it, if you vote the amendment now proposed, and if it shall turn out that your efforts to relieve the distress are vain, you will have done more harm than good, and you will have raised expectations which it will be impossible to fulfil. The amendment was not correct; the expressions contained in it narrowed the sentiments of the King's Speech instead of extending them; it spoke of distress "in particular places;" the Speech mentioned "some parts of the United Kingdom" as being distressed, a wider and more comprehensive expression. As to the omission of certain topics in the Speech, and among the rest, the omission of all mention of Ireland, he certainly did think, that after the completion of that measure in which Ireland took such a deep interest—after that country had been placed on a footing of equality with the rest of the empire,—there existed no necessity for making special mention of a part of the kingdom which had no longer any thing to distinguish it from the remainder. Since the passing of that measure it might be said of the two countries—

"paribus se legibus ambæ Invictæ gentes æterna in fœdera mittant."

The quotation had been applied by Mr. Pitt to the expected effect of the Union, and certainly it was not less appropriate when used with reference to the measure recently accomplished. Under such circumstances, it might fairly be said, that the time had arrived when we might consider the condition of Ireland the same as that of the other parts of the united kingdom, and, except the occurrence of special circumstances required it, Ireland need not be particularly mentioned. It was now to be looked upon as England or Scotland. He would say, however, that the condition of Ireland was now much better and more satisfactory than it had been previous to the last session of parliament. An hon. gentleman had drawn a comparison, unfavourable to the latter, between the American President's Message and his Majesty's Speech. Whatever might be that gentleman's satisfaction at the tenor of the American message, his was as great. The manner in which England was mentioned by the president, gave his Majesty's government, in common with all other classes of their fellow-subjects, the sincerest pleasure; and he was glad of that opportunity to repeat the expressions of amity and friendship used by that distinguished man when speaking of this country. His words were these:—"With Great Britain, alike distinguished in peace and war, we may look forward to years of peaceful, honourable, and elevated competition. Every thing in the condition and history of the two nations is calculated to inspire sentiments of mutual respect, and to carry conviction to the minds of both, that it is their policy to preserve the most cordial relations. Such are my own views, and it is not to be doubted that such are also the prevailing sentiments of our constituents." He re-echoed these sentiments:—May all the competition between the two countries be the competition of industry, civilization, and peace!—May the foolish sentiments of individual hostility entertained by some in both countries, gradually vanish before the influence of good sense and right feeling; and, as both nations possess a common language, and are derived from a common source, may they be united in lasting relations of good-will and amity! He gladly took this opportunity, on the part of the English government, of re-echoing, with respect to America, those kindly sentiments which her president had expressed towards us. But in contrasting the two Speeches, the hon. gentleman began by complaining of the mention made in his Majesty's message of so notorious a fact as the termination of hostilities between Russia and Turkey. As his Majesty had announced to parliament the breaking out of the war between these powers, it was proper that he should mention its termination. The hon. gentleman also complained of our treatment of Don Miguel, and spoke of the supposed feelings of America if she had received such a Speech as the English parliament had received on the subject. But the fact was, that the American President recognised Don Miguel, as was apparent from this passage of his Message: "During the recess of Congress, our diplomatic relations with Portugal have been resumed. The peculiar state of things in that country caused a suspension of the recognition of the representative who presented himself, until an opportunity was had to obtain from our official organs their information regarding the actual, and, as far as practicable, prospective condition of the authorities by which the representative in question was appointed. This information being received, the application of the established rule of our government in like cases was no longer withheld" [hear, hear]. The hon. gentleman attributed all our distresses to misgovernment, and to defects in our representative system; but unfortunately for his hypothesis, the same distress which we complained of in England existed in America, where the representation was constructed on the basis of universal suffrage [hear]. What said President Jackson on this subject?—"No very considerable change has occurred during the recess of Congress, in the condition of either our agriculture, commerce, or manufactures. The operation of the tariff has not proved so injurious to the two former, nor as beneficial to the latter, as was anticipated. Importations of foreign goods have not been sensibly diminished, while domestic competition, under an illusive excitement, has increased the production much beyond the demand for home consumption. The consequences have been low prices, temporary embarrassment, and partial loss. That such of our manufacturing establishments as are based upon capital, and are prudently managed, will survive the shock, and be ultimately profitable, there is no good reason to doubt." With respect to the amendment, during the last thirty years there had been no occasion upon which an amendment to an Address had been carried;—that in nineteen years out of the thirty no amendment was proposed;—and that the present was an Address in respect of which no objection could be made, with the exception of the omission of two or three topics. A gentleman complained of the policy of late governments in adding to the House of Peers; but from this charge the Duke of Wellington, who had made only one peer since he became prime minister, was free. The Speech stated the increase of exports in the last year; and it was said we inferred from thence that our trade and commerce were in a flourishing condition. But we inferred no such thing; we only stated facts; and, notwithstanding the increased exports, his majesty regretted the prevalence of distress in some parts of the kingdom. It was said ministers had not stated facts correctly, and that they were indifferent to the distress, because they recommended no remedy. Where was the proof that the Speech from the throne mis-stated facts? Was the House prepared at once, without enquiry, and without the necessary information before it, to sanction by its vote the allegation made in the amendment of the hon. baronet, that the distress was universal, and existed throughout all parts of the country? The hon. baronet's amendment stated that all the productive interests of the country were suffering severely under a general depression. There was no qualification whatever in the statement. Was the House prepared, in the face of Europe, to sanction such a statement? [hear]. "Distress exists in my own neighbourhood," argued the hon. baronet and those who support him, "therefore I am bound to conclude that the distress is universal amongst all the productive interests of the country." Should not the House pause before it founded a statement as to such an important matter upon evidence of such description? Should not the House pause before it took for granted any such statement, the more particularly when it found this important fact mentioned in the Speech from the throne, namely—that the exports of British produce during the last year had far exceeded those of any former year? It was rather extraordinary, with such a gratifying statement in his majesty's Speech, to find an amendment proposed, which declares, that all the productive interests of the country are labouring under severe depression. The House should therefore hesitate before it adopted such a proposition [cheers]. But it might be said, that this was no proof of the prosperity of the country, and perhaps it would be added, that all these exports were sold at a loss, and that no return was made from them. But was it to be supposed that, year after year, from the year 1819,—for that was the period from which the distress was dated,—was it to be imagined that year after year, from that time, the manufacturers of this country had continued manufacturing and exporting at a positive loss?

[hear] Was it probable that such a thing could have occurred? But then it was asserted, that let the amount of our foreign exports be what they might, our home market was depressed; and that while an increase had taken place in our exports to foreign countries, a great and corresponding decline had taken place in our home consumption. He would at once meet and deny that assertion [hear]. No corresponding decline in our home consumption had taken place at all, to be put in contradistinction to the increase in our foreign exports. The allegation was, that the distress existed universally throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland. He held in his hand returns to disprove to a great extent the truth of that assertion. He was compelled to refer to matters of detail to furnish arguments to induce the House to pause before it adopted the proposition of the hon. baronet. He was prepared to show, from documents in his possession, that there had not been the falling-off that had been stated, in the internal consumption of the country. He had been furnished with comparative statements of the amount of tons carried, and of the tonnage duties received, upon the principal canals, for a certain number of years; and the important fact which they established should be well weighed by the House before it pledged itself to the opinion of the hon. baronet, so contradictory as it was to the statement made from the throne. These statements exhibited a comparative increase year after year in the amount of business done on the principal canals. He would take a cipher as the foundation of his respective statements, which would furnish no indication of the comparative business of one canal compared with that of another; but which would actually show at the same time the general increase of business done on those canals, proving an increase in the internal consumption of the country. These returns commenced with the year 1820,—that year when the bill which he (Mr. Peel) would never disclaim, though so much obloquy had been thrown upon it—he meant the bill for regulating the metallic standard, and restoring the currency, took effect. He had expressly desired that they should be made out that year, for he well remembered, that when that bill came into operation, prophecies without number were propounded, that the commercial transactions and concerns of this country were so complicated and so multiplied, that any attempt to carry such a measure into effect would tend to cramp and depress the energies of the country. He was ready to take his stand by what had occurred in our foreign trade; but he would fortify himself by proofs of an increase also in our home consumption. The returns which he had procured were from the Forth and Clyde canals, from the Duke of Bridgewater's Canal, from the Grand Junction Canal, from the Kennet and Avon, and from the Berkeley and Gloucester Canals. In the year 1820, the amount of tons on the Forth and Clyde Canal was three thousand two hundred and ninety; in the year 1821, four thousand and twenty-eight; in 1822, four thousand four hundred and sixty; in 1823, four thousand eight hundred and seventy-four; in 1824, four thousand eight hundred and seventy-four; in 1825, five thousand eight hundred and four; in 1826, five thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight; in 1827, five thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and, in 1828 (the last year to which the accounts were made up), five thousand nine hundred and seventy. Thus, in the year 1828, the amount of tons was five thousand nine hundred and seventy, while the average of the eight preceding years was four thousand eight hundred and forty-three, giving an increase in the year 1828 to the amount of one thousand tons upon this canal. Upon all the other canals a similar progressive increase had taken place in their business, from the year 1819 till the year 1828. On the Duke of Bridgewater's Canal, in the year ending the 1st of January, 1830, the average amount of tonnage was one thousand five hundred and eighty-six, while, in the year 1829, the average was one thousand one hundred and fourteen; so that it appeared that the average amount of tonnage on that canal for the last year exceeded that of the former year by nearly five hundred tons. It might here be said that though the tonnage had increased, the tonnage duties had not. Now, he had expressly enquired as to the amount of duties received, and this was the result. Upon the Grand Junction Canal, the average amount of the tonnage duties received for the eight preceding years was £8,606, last year the average had risen to £9,000. On the Grand Trunk Canal, the average of the eight preceding years was £8,001, last year it had risen to £14,049. Upon the Kennet and Avon the average for the same period was £1,699, last year it amounted to £2,190. The average amount of tonnage duties upon the river Avon for the same period was £1,547, last year it had amounted to £1,706. The average amount upon the Berkeley and Gloucester Canal for the seven years preceding 1828, was £1,069. It had increased in 1828 to £2,235; and last year, to £2,360. Here, on this canal, the average was more than doubled in the course of two years. These facts should induce the House to pause before it sanctioned the statement that universal irremediable distress prevailed throughout the country. These facts applied to England; but let the House recollect, that if any part of England, Scotland, or Ireland should be proved not to have been subject to the depression spoken of, the statement of the hon. baronet must fall to the ground. Now, with regard to Ireland, an hon. gentleman said, that great distress prevailed in the city of Dublin. He was ready to admit that distress did exist in the Liberties of that city, but as long as he had been acquainted with Ireland he never knew a period when the manufacturers in that irreclaimable part of Dublin were not in distress,—so much so, that scarcely a year passed without appeals being made on their behalf to the charity of the public. No doubt distress prevailed in Ireland, and God grant that some measure might be devised to remedy it; but was there any proof before the House, that the agricultural interests of Ireland were suffering under universal distress and depression? Could it be said that universal distress existed amongst the agriculturists of Scotland? He doubted that such was the fact; and before the House asserted it, he would call upon it to employ due precaution in forming its opinion. He would maintain that the Address, in answer to the Speech, gave a truer description of the state of the country than the amendment proposed by the hon. baronet. It was perfectly consistent, on the part of his majesty's ministers, while they felt sincere sympathy for the distress which did exist, to be extremely cautious as to the adoption of rash experiments with a view to its alleviation [hear]. The distress which did exist had originated in causes over which government had no control; and it should be borne in mind, that it was not exclusively confined to the dominions of his majesty. The agricultural interests had also experienced similar depression in America and in other countries. In France, for instance, the distress had been in many places as severe as in any part of this country. In parts of the United States, the distress had been equally as great as with us. In Russia, at this moment, a proclamation had been issued for lowering the rate of interest, with a view to remedy the agricultural distress prevailing there; therefore the causes whatever they might be, which had operated to produce this distress were not confined to this country. Great weight was certainly due to the effects produced by unfavourable seasons. He believed that the expense incurred by the agricultural interest, both in cultivating the soil, and collecting the harvest, had never been so great as in the last two years, owing to the extreme wetness of the seasons. That was sufficient to account in some degree for the depression experienced by the agricultural interest; and, besides, he did not think that due weight had been assigned to the effect of the importations from Ireland. That was a cause beyond remedy or control. Ireland was fairly entitled to a free access to the markets of this country, and no man would be mad enough to propose to restrict the importations from that country. He held in his hand an account of the amount of importations from Ireland into the port of Liverpool during the last year. During that period there had been imported into Liverpool from Ireland, forty-nine thousand oxen, thirteen thousand calves, eighteen thousand pigs, one hundred and eleven thousand sheep, one thousand three hundred lambs; and the total value of agricultural produce thus imported amounted to £1,270,000, exclusive of corn [hear]. It was impossible to deny that such immense importations from Ireland had the effect of depressing the agricultural interests of this country. The same argument applied to Scotland. The Crown, he therefore conceived, was quite justified in entreating the House to use extreme caution before it should attempt to remedy, by legislative interference, the distress that existed. The ministers had been taunted as if they were influenced by a species of false pride, as if they were so determined to adhere to declarations formerly made respecting the currency, as blindly to close their eyes to the real distresses of the country. It was said, that they were afraid to expose themselves to the charge of inconsistency, and this followed close upon the charge which had been made against them from the same quarter last session, when they were accused of departing from those principles to which they stood pledged, in bringing forward a measure, which they had uniformly opposed. It was then said, that they were actuated by a corrupt desire to maintain themselves in office, and the charge now was, that they were so wilfully and perversely determined to adhere to the present currency system, that they would hear of no change in it whatever. Now, he would say upon this occasion, as he did when assailed by a contrary charge last session, that he was ready to abandon his opinions respecting the currency, to which he was supposed to be so unalterably pledged, if he could bring himself to believe that his so doing would be productive of any real and permanent benefit to the interests of the country [hear]. It was no imputation on the part of a public man to recede from opinions which he had maintained, when he found others better adapted to the circumstances of the country. From his experience of public life, he was never more convinced of anything than of the arrogance of binding one's self to any set of opinions respecting matters of this nature [hear]. To him it appeared much better to act upon the principle avowed by the hon. baronet who had proposed the amendment, and to look at every measure solely in reference to its merits, uninfluenced by the ties of any party, or by any preconceived opinions on the subject. He was ready to adopt that principle; he should be always ready to abandon opinions when proved to be wrong; and, on the contrary, he should always support those which he conceived to be right. As he said before, he could not see any imputation on the part of a public man in receding from those opinions which he had hitherto maintained, when the interests of the country called upon him to do so. Now, with regard to the currency, after the best deliberation which his majesty's ministers could give to the subject, they were determined to adhere to the present system, being convinced that if any error had been committed in establishing that system, we should only be exposed to still greater evils than those we had suffered by again doing any thing to unsettle the currency of the country [hear]. His majesty's ministers were not indifferent to the distress in the country; they did not deny that distress existed, they were not wanting in sympathy on account of its existence, nor in a sincere desire for its alleviation; but at the same time they were determined to adhere to a cautious policy in dealing with it. He would warn the House to beware of making rash experiments. It was because his majesty's ministers believed that any rash experiment with the currency would, while it might possibly give some immediate benefit, only be productive of more permanent evils than those from which we had been relieved, that they had come to the determination of maintaining the present system, and exposing themselves to whatever obloquy might be attached to the course which they had resolved to pursue [hear, hear].

On a division on Sir E. Knatchbull's amendment, the numbers were, Ayes, 105; Noes, 158; majority against the Amendment, 53.

The Address, as proposed by the Earl of Darlington, and which was as usual an echo of the speech, was then put and carried.

EAST INDIA CHARTER—LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S LETTER.

FEBRUARY 5, 1830.

Mr. Spring Rice having presented a petition from the county of the city of Limerick, against a renewal of the East India Charter, requested information from Mr. G. Banks, respecting a certain letter which had recently appeared in the public prints of this country, stated to have been received by an official individual in India, from the noble President of the Board of Control (Lord Ellenborough), and which letter contained statements of the utmost importance respecting the administration of justice in India, and the intentions of His Majesty's government with regard to the renewal of the East India Company's Charter.

Mr. Banks, in giving the information required, to the extent of his power, said he had understood from the noble lord, that the letter in question was written in the shape of a strictly private and confidential communication from him to the individual to whom it was addressed, and that it was never intended to meet the public eye. Sir John Malcolm had since expressed his deepest regret that it should have come before the public, and had stated, that a deliberate and shameful breach of confidence was the only means by which such a document could have been brought before the public.

In the course of a desultory conversation on the subject,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said,—Different versions had been circulated in India of this letter, which he understood were very different from the one published in this country. He had asked his noble friend respecting it when the letter was published here. The noble lord acknowledged that he had written a letter of that description, but he could not say whether that were a correct copy of it, and it was moreover a letter written hastily, and inadvertently. He did not mean to say, that a public officer had a right to write letters to public functionaries upon public subjects, and afterwards to screen himself from animadversion on the plea that his letters were private [hear]. In such a case, a public officer might produce copies of despatches which he had transmitted to a colonial functionary, while at the same time he had given in private letters very different instructions to the same individual. But the case was different where a public officer, as in this instance, writes a private letter hastily and inadvertently; and the expression which occurred in this letter as to the wild and tame elephants, was sufficient to show that there existed no deliberate intention on the part of the writer to interfere with the independence of the judges. In this case no doubt, his noble friend had written a hasty letter, and no such inference should be drawn from such a letter, as that any intention existed on the part of the government to control the independence of the judges in India [hear]. If such a construction should be put on his noble friend's letter, no man would regret it more than his noble friend. He was not prepared to admit that the copy published of this letter was a correct one, as there was no means of ascertaining that at present; but he would only submit, that the whole tenor of his noble friend's official conduct should free him from the charge of seeking to lessen the independence of the judicial bench in India. The expression as to the wild and tame elephants was but a hasty and inconsiderate joke hazarded in a private letter, and it should not be set against the public tenor of his noble friend's life.

REPORT OF THE ADDRESS ON THE KING'S SPEECH.

FEBRUARY 5, 1830.

The Earl of Darlington having brought up the report of the committee appointed to prepare the Address, Lord Palmerston spoke at some length respecting the foreign policy of the country.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he agreed with his noble friend, that this was not the fit occasion for entering on so important a subject. In the first place, its importance entitled it to separate and serious consideration; and as his majesty had stated, that when the proper time arrived, the necessary documents would be laid before the House, he did not think it right, in the absence of such information, that any discussion should be provoked. By approving of the Address, no gentleman pledged himself in any degree to approve of the course taken with respect to our foreign policy. By agreeing to it, no one would be precluded from hereafter expressing his opinion on that foreign policy. With respect to his noble friend's policy—that policy which his noble friend advocated so ably and so eloquently—it would, if adopted, involve the country in war [hear]. The noble lord took the same course last session. His noble friend did not exactly avow that such was the scope of his policy; but he was certain that if the doctrine his noble friend maintained, with respect to foreign governments, were acted on, in six months this country and all Europe would be involved in general war [hear]. The policy of the present government had this recommendation—that it had maintained peace and secured peace consistently with the preservation of the power and the honour of England [hear]. His noble friend had made an allusion with respect to the necessity of preserving Turkey, on account of the wellbeing of Europe. He (Mr. Peel) apprehended that, in the present situation of Europe, the integrity and independence of so great a power should be supported; but those who held that doctrine did not, therefore, approve of the system of government by which the internal affairs of Turkey were regulated. Did his noble friend recollect, that it had been an object of great interest with reference to the state of Europe, to guarantee the integrity of Turkey? Did he recollect that in 1799 this country did guarantee the integrity of Turkey? Mr. Pitt, who then presided over the destinies of this empire, did not take that step because he admired the government of Turkey, but because he thought that the dismemberment of such a power would be attended with disastrous consequences. Now they might entertain fears of the consequences that would ensue from the dismemberment of any portion of Europe; but were they on every occasion of that kind to act with Quixotic feeling and immediately to proceed to war? When Turkey gave Russia a fair justification for hostilities, on what account could we interfere? His noble friend asked, "Why did you not before the termination of the war, or before it had broken out—why did you not counsel concession?" That was exactly what ministers did. The government asked Turkey to do that which Russia had a right to compel her to do—namely, to fulfil a treaty; but Turkey had no right to expect that we should espouse her cause by going to war on account of the caprices of the divan. The interference and proffer of advice and good offices only could be required. His noble friend had asked, why that advice was not offered sooner? Now, his noble friend was in the cabinet at the time, and he must know that ministers had not an opportunity of giving it. He must be aware that some time previously to the breaking out of the war, our ambassador was removed from Constantinople; and therefore we had not the means of conveying the sentiments of this government; but, by every mode in which that advice could be given, it was imparted to Turkey. The success of the Turks in the first campaign did not alter the views of ministers. After that campaign, which Turkey thought a complete failure on the part of Russia, our advice to Turkey was, to do that at a period of victory which she ought to have done before it. That advice was rejected; and whatever his noble friend's idea might be, he thought that those who refused at that time to go to war for Turkey, acted for the real and permanent interest of this country. As to Greece, (continued Mr. Peel,) my noble friend says he hopes to see the treaty of London carried into full effect. I can assure him, that in the course of events that have followed, we have laboured diligently in the strict execution of the treaty, and in no instance has there been a deviation from that treaty, unless it were in favour of Greece. He will find this statement fully borne out by the official documents. My noble friend intimates that, in the present state of Turkey, one island or another valley are of very little importance to her, and may be granted to Greece. My noble friend's principles seem somewhat lax here: it may be a convenient doctrine to apply to a great power in an abject state; but we have never aided Greece in any measure not in conformity with those principles of honour and justice which we have always regarded. With respect to Portugal, my noble friend has only repeated what he urged last session; but his advocacy meant, if any thing, "Go to war for the purpose of dispossessing Don Miguel." But if the population of the country cared nothing about the possessor of the throne, why were we to interfere? If, at the period that may be selected, we should determine on his recognition, it will be a pure question with relation to the treaties between the countries. In his majesty's speech it is said there are some parts which evidently contemplate the recognition of Don Miguel. I have never concealed my opinion of the conduct of Don Miguel. He did not keep the faith he plighted to this government. But it is an important question, whether his personal character will alone justify us in refusing to recognise him? Don Miguel practically exercises the powers of government in Portugal, and his rule takes place apparently with the general consent; every attempt to dispossess him has failed; at an early period he called together the ancient Cortes, and had their assent to his accession. This was a body venerable for its antiquity, and its decision gave his title a sanction in the eyes of the people. They looked on that decision as the expression of the general will. The island of Terceira is a military garrison, which has declared for the young queen Maria; but it is a small island, far detached from Portugal, and not in the slightest degree influencing that kingdom. Would that fact authorize us to force a sovereign on the people of Portugal? We desire that she may ascend the throne in obedience to her father's will; but if the people of Portugal will not support her claim, it must fall to the ground. There were great doubts whether Don Pedro had the right to give the crown to his daughter; and all the Portuguese lawyers have decided in favour of Don Miguel. Higher considerations than those of mere personal character must rule the course of policy which a country like this will follow. We are not authorized to force a rejected sovereign on any country. Don Miguel is in no shape subject to our authority. If we once commence a "war of opinion," we can never circumscribe its course. My noble friend, however, is so anxious, that he asks in reality why we have not fitted out an armament to prevent Spain from invading Mexico? Now, really, he must take leave to say, that if the principle of interference required by his noble friend were to be carried into full operation, it would involve this country in wars with almost every nation with which it was allied or bound by treaties. The noble lord had, however, asserted that the government of this country should have interfered to have prevented the invasion of Mexico by the Spaniards from the island of Cuba. Now, he recollected very well that his right hon. friend (Mr. Canning), at the time he put forth those able and powerful state papers, which were demanded from him in the fulfilment of his duty as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, always admitted the right of Spain to fit out and undertake any expedition she pleased for the conquest of her colonies, although he denied to other nations the right of interference, which might be exerted, not for the purpose of reassuming the legitimate authority of the parent state, but for the purpose of assisting either party as it might suit their interests to obtain an advantage over the other. This he was satisfied was the tenor of the principle laid down by that right hon. friend, and recognised by the House. But then the noble lord asserts, that although the right of interference was not exercised by the government to protect Mexico from the Spaniards, it was exercised on a former occasion to preserve Cuba from the attacks of the Mexicans [hear]. Did the noble lord, however, not understand that there might be some circumstances so peculiar, and some considerations of such overwhelming importance, with regard to the connexions and relations of England with the isle of Cuba, as to justify a great departure from the rules which governed other portions of her policy, and not to be defended on general principles [hear]. The noble lord ought to have a thorough understanding of every thing connected with the peculiar situation of this country and Cuba before he ventured to illustrate his argument by a reference to the case of Cuba. On every other occasion, he repeated, that the government had invariably governed itself by the principles which it had recognised; and although they had not, as the noble lord seemed to think they were bound to do, gone to war for the purpose of preventing every act of which they might disapprove, yet he trusted it would be found that they had not done any thing to forfeit the character or compromise the honour or station of the country. He should conclude with observing, that he should not enter further into the various topics connected with our foreign policy, because the Address did not pledge the House in any manner to approve of or adopt it; and if hon. members would but suspend their opinions until the papers connected with it were before them, they would have ample opportunity of expressing their opinions on its soundness and propriety [hear].

The Marquis of Blandford proposed, as an amendment, that the following words be added to the end of the Address:—"That this House feels itself called upon, in the awful and alarming state of universal distress into which the landed, commercial, and all the great productive interests of the country are at this moment plunged, to take care that your majesty shall not be the only person in your dominions ignorant of such an astounding fact, as well as of the consequent impending danger to the throne, and other great national institutions, established by the wisdom of our ancestors, for the protection and benefit of the people over whom your majesty has been called to preside.

"That this House is at no loss to indicate the real cause of this most unnatural state of things, and, in justice to your Majesty and the whole nation, it can no longer hesitate to proclaim that cause to the world.

"It is a fact, already too notorious, that this House, which was intended by our ancient and admirable constitution to be the guardian of the nation's purse, has, from causes now unnecessary to be detailed, been nominated, for the greater part, by a few proprietors of close and decayed boroughs, and by a few other individuals, who, by the mere power of money employed in means absolutely and positively forbidden by the laws, have obtained a domination, also expressly forbidden by act of parliament, over certain other cities and boroughs in the United Kingdom.

"That in consequence of this departure from the wisdom of our ancestors, the nation has been deprived of its natural guardian, and has, in consequence, become so burthened with expensive establishments of all kinds, that, in a period much shorter than the life of man, the taxation has increased from nine millions to nearly sixty millions a-year; and the poor-rates, or parochial assessments during the same period, have augmented from one and a half millions to eight millions annually.

"That to render such a mass of taxation, so disproportionate to the whole wealth of the kingdom, in any degree supportable, recourse has been had, either from ignorance or design, to the most monstrous schemes in tampering with the currency, or circulating money of the country; at one time by greatly diminishing the value of the same, and at another time by greatly augmenting such value; and at each and every of such changes, which have been but too often repeated, one class of the community after another has been plunged into poverty, misery, and ruin; while the sufferers, without any fault or folly of their own, have been hardly able to perceive from what hand these calamities have come upon them.

"That, under such circumstances, and with this knowledge before its eyes, this House would consider itself lost to every sense of duty towards your majesty, and guilty of treason towards the people, if it did not seize this opportunity of declaring to your majesty its solemn conviction that the state is at this moment in the most imminent danger, and that no effectual measures of salvation will or can be adopted until the people shall be restored to their rightful share in the legislation of the country; that is, to their undoubted right, according to the true meaning of the constitution, of choosing the members of this House."

Mr. O'Connell seconded the amendment.

Sir Francis Burdett having spoken at some length, and the Marquis of Blandford having persisted in pressing his motion to an immediate division,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he did not rise to provoke discussion on a question of such importance. Differing entirely from the hon. baronet in the view he took of the merits of the question, yet he cordially concurred with him in thinking that the time chosen for its discussion was most improper. Whatever might be the opinions of members on the merits of the question, all agreed that it could not then be properly discussed [hear, hear]. He rose principally to express his regret that the rule generally laid down for their proceedings—of not remarking on what had passed elsewhere—should have been departed from. He regretted that the hon. baronet should have referred to any thing that had occurred in the other House. He conceived that what had fallen from the hon. baronet must have proved the expediency of the rule of not making any such remarks, for he could not break through it without committing injustice, and without attacking a person who was not present to defend himself. The noble baronet, unintentionally he was sure, had misrepresented the observations of his noble friend in another place. He was satisfied that his noble friend never meant to impute the general distress to the use of machinery and the application of steam to assist labour [hear]. His noble friend, he was satisfied, did not mean to say that the distress was caused by those improvements which were the great elements of all our general prosperity [hear]. He believed his noble friend, lamenting that distress, had never attributed it to scientific improvements, which his noble friend was satisfied were the cause of our commercial and manufacturing greatness, and by which alone that greatness could be preserved. But his noble friend had probably lamented that the use of these improvements should have in some cases caused partial distress. His noble friend probably alluded to the effects of introducing the power-loom. His noble friend, at the same time that he imputed our manufacturing improvements to the discovery and employment of new agents and new powers, yet regretted that these improvements could not always be introduced without diminishing the demand for labour. Was it fair to say of the prime minister, that he imputed the distress of the country, of the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, to the improvements and discoveries of science? No; he rejoiced in those improvements, and he felt their immense importance to the manufacturers of this country.

On a division, the Marquis of Blandford's amendment was negatived by 96 against 11; majority, 85.

MEXICO—CUBA—SPAIN.

FEBRUARY 8, 1830.

Sir Robert Wilson having put some questions respecting the conduct of the English government between Spain and the states of Colombia and Mexico,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he could assure the hon. gentleman that on this, as upon every other occasion, it was his desire to answer any question put to his Majesty's Government in that House respecting the foreign policy of the country, as frankly and as clearly as was consistent with the general interests of the State. But he felt the questions now put to involve a point of such deep importance, that the House would excuse him if he did not content himself with giving a simple answer to the questions of the hon. gentleman, but enter into a short explanation of the facts, and of the intentions and policy of the government. When a noble friend of his on a former night put a question to him upon the same subject, he answered it upon the strength of his recollection; and if he then fell into any mistake as to the occurrences which had been referred to, he was sure the House would readily pardon him when they considered that seven or eight years had intervened since they took place, and since any circumstances had very particularly required him to refer to the several documents. But in the interval since that discussion he had referred to the documents, and found that his recollection upon all the substantial points was correct. He had stated his impression of the facts to be, that in the year 1823, Mr. Canning, then being Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, made a public declaration that England would not resist any attempt made by Spain to re-establish her power and authority over her revolted colonies. He declared that England could not interfere in any contest that might arise between the mother country and the colonies; but, at the same time Mr. Canning avowed that England would not recognise the right of any other foreign power to ally herself to Spain for the purpose of aiding her in such an attempt; that if it were made by the mother country, and by her own resources, then that this government would not interfere, but observe a strict neutrality between the contending parties. His noble friend had said that something more was added, about the difficulty of maintaining a strict neutrality; and it had been further asserted that Mr. Canning prohibited any counter attempt upon Cuba on the part of the South American States. His answer to that was, that if any prohibition were issued by Mr. Canning, prohibiting Mexico from attacking Cuba, he was confident that it had been made upon some peculiar ground, involving perhaps the common interests of humanity, or some particular and paramount interest of this country. Though there was no record of a particular conference that had been referred to, he found upon examining the records of these transactions, that that view of Mr. Canning's motives had been the true one. In the notes of a conference between Mr. Canning and the Prince de Polignac, which took place on the 9th of October, 1823, he found that Mr. Canning made this important declaration: "That the British government would not only abstain from interfering to prevent Spain from resorting to any negotiations for the recovery of her colonies, but would aid her in such negotiations; and in any case be strictly neutral, even if war should be resorted to by Spain herself. But that if Spain should form a junction with any other foreign power that should aid her in the war, then that the British government would consider another case to have arisen, and its conduct would be influenced by other views." This was the ground taken by Mr. Canning, and he referred with pleasure to another part of the document, in which the Prince de Polignac, on the part of France, disclaimed in any case the intention of joining in hostile measures against the South American colonies. Thus far the declarations of Mr. Canning on the question were in their possession. He had no recollection of any others, and there was no record of any such prohibition as that which had been alluded to; the strictest search had been made but no record could be found. If any such had been made, the probability was, that it had been verbal; and of this he was certain—that it was made as an exception to the general rule, and justified by some peculiar considerations growing out of the circumstances of the case, either relating to the common interest of humanity, as he had said before, or to some paramount considerations of state. He had said that there was no record of the act, or of the motives which dictated it; but if Mr. Canning did make such a prohibition, he should think it rather referred to the manner in which the war was likely to be carried on. This he was bound to state in justice to the memory of Mr. Canning: so strongly did Mr. Canning feel the desire of promoting the tranquillity of the South American colonies—so anxious was he to prevent the revival or the opening of fresh hostilities between them and the mother country, that in the year 1824, just previous to our recognition of their independence, he offered Spain to guarantee to her the possession of Cuba, upon condition of her entering into negotiations, the basis of which should be, that their independence should be formally recognised [hear]. If, therefore, any such prohibition were ever declared by Mr. Canning, he was satisfied that it must have been made upon some special grounds. He was the more confirmed in this conclusion, because there was on the part of the United States of America a declaration of such an intended amicable interference, in which special grounds were pointed out. In a note of Mr. Clay, the minister of the United States, dated December, 1825, that government, then having recognised the independence of Mexico and the other republics, he declared its intention to preserve a strict neutrality in the case of a war between them and her former colonies. The terms of that declaration were, however, that if Spain should persist in carrying on war without the prospect of success, the republics of Colombia and Mexico would probably retaliate, by making an attack upon Cuba, that being the point d'appui from which Spain could carry on her operations; and that if a war carried into that island by the republics should prove to be one of a desolating nature, such as the putting of arms into the hands of one class of the inhabitants against another class, then it would be necessary for America to interfere and to prevent such a war of extermination from proceeding. This was the ground which America had taken. What she said was, that she would not interfere so long as the war was conducted on both sides according to the laws of civilized nations; but she would not see such a course taken as must lead to the depopulation of the island of Cuba, and leave it to be transferred to the possession of some European power. If Mr. Canning ever made any declaration, he was satisfied it must have been one of this nature. With regard to the recent expedition sent out by Spain against Mexico, it was, he believed, almost entirely sent from the Havannah. Almost the only person in it who proceeded from the mother country, he believed, was the commander of the troops. How then could this country interfere? He could assure the hon. gentleman, whatever he might think, that it would have been extremely difficult for England to have prevented the sailing of that expedition by remonstrance alone. So much for what had been done; and now for the intentions of the government as to the future. They felt a deep interest in the welfare and the prosperity of these infant States. They had recognised their independence, and were anxious to see that independence consolidated by their tranquillity, and by their security from foreign attack, so long as they gave no just cause of interference to other powers. He therefore hoped that the South American States would now turn to their own resources and be able to compose their internal quarrels; in that, he repeated, they would find their chief safeguards against attacks from without. Ministers had hoped that Spain herself would ere now have been convinced of the propriety and policy, if not of recognising their independence, at least of abstaining from actual hostilities against the South American republics. They had hoped that she would at least have observed the principle upon which she proceeded in the contest with her Flemish colonies, where, long before their independence was recognised, she tacitly assented to a suspension of hostilities. The forbearance of Spain in that instance justified us in the hope that she would display like wisdom and moderation in this. And it might be here observed, that for several years she had abstained from issuing letters of marque against the States of South America, and so consulted the interests of humanity, and avoided many of the atrocities which, under the sanction of such an authority, had disgraced the flags of other nations. If there were a chance of the permanent revival of hostilities between Spain and South America, the policy of England would be—1st, to endeavour to effect an amicable termination of the contest, and to bring about a peace, a common object not less interesting to Spanish America than to ourselves; but if all our endeavours should fail,—if Spain determined to persevere in the attempt to recover possession of her colonies,—he had no difficulty in thus publicly declaring, on the part of his majesty's government, that so far as the laws and operations of civilized warfare were concerned, this country would for herself act between the contending parties on the principle of strict impartiality [hear].

The conversation here dropped.

THE KING'S, OR LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

FEBRUARY 8, 1830.

On the motion that the Royal Speech be taken into consideration, Mr. G. Lamb rose in explanation of his motives for voting for the amendment to the Address on the first night of the session.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL then said, he trusted the House would indulge him for a very few moments, while he endeavoured to explain one or two points of his former observations, which had been very much misconstrued by the hon. member for Dungarvon (Mr. Lamb). That hon. member had assumed that he (Mr. Peel) argued for the necessity and propriety of non-interference, on the ground, that they could not depart from that course, through the fear of being called on to engage in war. Now, so cautious had he been against any misconstruction of his language with regard to war, that throughout the whole of the observations he addressed to the House on the subject of the foreign policy of the country, he most studiously avoided the mention of the word peace, without at the same time declaring that peace was not worth having, unless it could be preserved in a manner consistent with the honour and interest of the country, and the integrity of its power; and he repeated, that he did so expressly for the purpose of avoiding that very misrepresentation—a misconstruction into which the hon. member for Dungarvon, he had no doubt quite undesignedly, had fallen on this occasion. England might well afford to avow her love of peace; because she was strong enough and powerful enough to feel no fear of the consequences of war: and, (said Mr. Peel) let me tell those who ascribe such motives to this country, that those who have from principle, from humanity, and from a sense of its good policy, laboured to maintain a just peace among nations, will always be found the most able to sustain the consequences of a just and necessary war [hear]. I shall take leave to add one word on a subject to which the hon. member has also alluded very pointedly in the course of his speech, and which I know has made considerable impression both here and elsewhere. The hon. gentleman has in effect declared, that it is well known both in France and in England, that the present ministry of France owes its appointment to the government of this country. I have no doubt that the other impressions of the hon. member are founded on authority equally erroneous; but of that I shall now say at once, there never was any report so utterly unfounded, so wholly devoid of truth, as that any communication, either direct or indirect, was sent by any individual holding any situation in the government of this country to any member of any party, or holding any situation in France, with respect to the appointment of Prince Polignac to the head of its ministry [hear, hear].

The motion was agreed to.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S CHARTER.

FEBRUARY 9, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, his majesty's government had felt it to be their duty to avail themselves of the very earliest opportunity to redeem the pledge which they gave at the close of the last session of parliament, that as soon as possible after the commencement of the present session, they would themselves propose a committee of enquiry, for the purpose of investigating the state of the commerce between this country and our Indian possessions. And if, in proposing that committee, his statement should appear disproportionate to the vast importance of the subject, or if he forbore from entering on the present occasion into the manifold and most interesting details which were necessarily mixed up with it, he begged it to be understood, that he took that course, not from any insensibility to the paramount greatness of the question, but from a recollection of the peculiar position in which he stood that night, and from a strong feeling of the duty which was placed before them, and which the public expected they would perform with calmness and caution (hear). He did not consider that it was part of his duty to submit to this House on the present occasion, the consideration of any plan for the future government of India—that it was any part of his duty to state the opinion of his majesty's ministers as to the renewal of the present East India Charter, or to point out any modification which might be made in the existing system by which India was governed. He trusted that they would come to night to a calm and dispassionate enquiry into the propriety of appointing a committee to examine into this great question, leaving the details to future consideration, when the committee should have stated its opinion. He considered that to be the only question before them. He felt that this was an enquiry which would impose on them higher obligations, with reference to moral feeling, than almost any other in the whole sphere of public affairs; and therefore he did not wish to agitate the ultimate question precipitately.

He had also another motive for avoiding, if he could, the discussion of the details of this question, because it was not his plan to have a lengthened debate on mere opinions relative to Indian affairs. He hoped, in the first instance, that the subject would receive the most serious consideration of a committee—a consideration worthy of the importance and dignity of the question in issue [hear]. He meant to propose a general committee for the purpose of examining the great mass of documentary evidence that was ready to be submitted to the House, and also to enter on a faithful examination of persons who were conversant with all the facts connected with the situation of India, and who possessed local information with respect to the commerce carried on with that country. He proposed one committee rather than two or three committees, because he doubted whether the subjects to be considered were not so closely connected together, that the evidence on one point might tend to elucidate another, and therefore it appeared to him better that the whole should be laid before one body, instead of thus dividing it amongst many. He thought if one committee were appointed to enquire into the finance of India, another to look into the trade of India, and another to take into consideration the commerce with China, that much inconvenience would ensue. The subjects were so nearly connected, that he feared if such a course were pursued, much confusion would be the consequence. If the plan proposed by the hon. member for Callington (Mr. Baring) were followed,—namely, that of having two or three committees—it would not, in his opinion, answer the purpose. Such an arrangement, he conceived, would be bad. If two or three committees were appointed, there was a very great chance of the House being bewildered, amongst various conflicting opinions from the different committees. He would propose this committee with the plain and honest view of having a full, perfect, and unreserved investigation with respect to the affairs of the East India Company [hear]. Every document connected with the trade, with the commerce, and with the finance of India, should be laid before that committee. He proposed this committee, not for the purpose of ratifying any engagement previously existing between the government and the company. In fact, no such engagement, open or secret, express or implied, existed [hear]. The government in the fullest sense of the language, were free agents [hear]. He repeated, that he did not propose this committee with a view to the sanctioning of any previous engagement with the government. No such thing was in existence, and in any future proceeding the ministers were desirous of being guided according to the result of the enquiry. As there was no such irrevocable engagement on the part of the government—as the whole subject was open to investigation—he felt himself entitled to impress on the House the extreme importance of the enquiry into this great question.

He, however, begged to implore gentlemen to consider that they had greater objects to look to in the progress of that enquiry, than merely to determine in what manner British commerce was to be carried on. He entreated the House to recollect that there were other questions connected with this subject, of greater importance than the extension of trade [hear]. They would have to consider the whole character of the government—a government placed over an immense extent of territory, wielding a powerful force, and administering a revenue of very great extent. They would see, in approaching the subject, a wide and ample field for enquiry and observation. They were bound to consider the various modes in which that government affected the people over whom it ruled; they were bound to consider how any alteration might affect the influence of the Crown; and there were various other points which would also claim their attention.

He here felt it likewise necessary to speak of the East India Company; and, looking to the information of which he was in possession,—viewing the documents that were in his hands, he was bound to say that any investigation into the conduct of that body would, he believed, tend to their credit [hear]. He did think, that they had ever been excited by a sincere desire to promote the welfare and interest of those who were placed under them [hear]. Contrasting the administration of the Company with that of any other colonial establishment that ever existed, he was convinced that their conduct would redound greatly to their honour. Let gentlemen consider, that they were legislating for a body very peculiarly situated; and let them bear in mind, that the present form of government extended over many millions of people, and that it had existed for a great number of years. Now, although he was not prepared to say that another form of government might not be devised, from which equal benefits would flow, still he must contend, that sufficient was known of the present system to induce them to pause before they rashly interfered with it [hear].

In looking to the financial state of the Company, they would have to compare the amount of revenue now received with what was likely to be called for and produced in future. They would have to consider the amount of civil charges, and to see whether the gross revenue received by the Company was equivalent to those charges.

With respect to the commercial concerns of the East India Company (continued Mr. Peel) the documents that will be presented to the committee will contain much important information. On this subject, however, I abstain from pronouncing any opinion; but I may, nevertheless, refer to the returns that will be made, as sufficient to convince any calm and right-judging man, that too sanguine an expectation has been held out as to the result of any arrangement for opening the trade with India. However, means of judging on this point will be fully supplied. It will be shown by documents already prepared to be adduced, what effect the free admission of the Americans has had—what the price of tea has been in all parts of the world—what difference there has been in the price of that article as furnished by the Company, and by individuals trading on their own bottom, for private speculation—on all these points the fullest information will be given, and any other information that can be procured shall be laid most unreservedly before the committee.

Among the other considerations which will present themselves to this committee, I have reserved for the last place that which appears to me to be the most important—the welfare and interests of those who are now subject to the dominion of this country [hear]. I have seen returns which make the amount of the native population immediately subject to the control of this country, not less than ninety millions of persons [hear]. When we consider the extent of territory over which our power is acknowledged—when we consider the enormous mass of population subject to our dominion—when we call to mind the great revolution of empires by which that dominion has been established—when we reflect on the immense distance from which sovereign authority over those regions is exercised—when we call to mind the difference in language, manners, religion, and usages, between ourselves and the almost countless thousands over whom we govern, the mind cannot fail to be amazed at the contemplation of objects so vast and various. But whatever may be the sentiments we entertain upon the question, sure I am, at least, that we must approach the consideration of it with a deep feeling, with a strong sense of the responsibility we shall incur—with a strong sense of the moral obligation which imposes it upon us as a duty to promote the improvement of the country, and the welfare and well being of its inhabitants so far as we can, consistently with the safety and security of our dominion, and the obligations by which we may be bound. We shall undoubtedly feel ourselves called upon to consider what are the measures that may best tend to protect the natives of those distant regions from wrong—to secure to them their personal liberty and the fruits of their industry; in a word, to endeavour, while we still keep them under British rule, to atone to them for the sufferings they endured, and the wrongs to which they were exposed, in being reduced to that rule; and to afford them such advantages, and to confer on them such benefits as may, in some degree, console them for the loss of their independence [hear]. These, Sir, are considerations which, whatever may be the anxiety to extend British conquest, and to maintain the rights of British subjects, must indisputably be entertained in a British parliament [hear]. Avoiding, then, Sir, all minute reference to subordinate details, however important—unwilling to touch on any topic that may provoke discussion, which, for the reasons I have already stated I am anxious to avert—I have cautiously refrained from mooted any point upon which there could be any conflict of opinions; and now, Sir, in this same spirit I shall conclude, by simply moving:

“That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the present state of the Affairs of the East India Company, and into the Trade between Great Britain, the East Indies, and China; and to report their observations thereupon to the House.”

After some observations from Mr. W. Whitmore, Sir J. Macdonald said,—If the right hon. gentleman has, as I suppose he has, prepared a list of the proposed committee, will he object to read the names to the House? The House may then judge how far the professed impartiality is to be carried [hear].

Mr. Peel hoped to be able to give the honourable member a satisfactory answer. The committee would be sufficiently extensive to ensure on all occasions a full attendance for the despatch of business; and it would also be numerous enough to subdivide itself for financial purposes. He would now read the list he had drawn up to the House. It would be seen that it was an ample one, and he hoped that it would be observed that he had attempted to give the commercial and landed interests a fair representation therein. There were of necessity the names of many hon. members left out, whose services would undoubtedly be of advantage to the committee; but he begged those gentlemen to believe, that the omission had not proceeded from disrespect, or from any thing like disregard for the zeal and talent they could bring with them to the enquiry. Hon. members would be pleased to bear in mind that his duty had been to make a selection. He had done so to the best of his ability, and he hoped it would meet the approbation of the House. [Mr. Peel then read the list.]

In answer to a question from Mr. Hume,—

Mr. Peel said, there was no idea of imposing any thing like a close restriction upon the committee, whose decision would, of course, be founded upon the evidence adduced before them. With respect to the word “present,” he had found it in the motion for the committee of 1813, and he thought himself safer in taking the very words used with respect to that committee than he could be with any other. Now, as to the representation of the different interests in the committee, he had laboured to make it as full and impartial as possible, and he did really think the commercial interests were sufficiently represented in having introduced the members for Liverpool, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Preston, Lancashire, Staffordshire, Dublin, Limerick, and Yorkshire; and surely there was no want of the names of eminent advocates of their interests. He found the names of Mr. Baring, Mr. Irving, and Mr. Poulett Thomson, than whom none were more highly looked up to by the commercial and manufacturing classes. He begged the House once more to remember that the greatest benefit was to be derived from the examination of witnesses.

After a discussion of considerable length, the motion was agreed to.

CORRUPTION IN EAST RETFORD.

FEBRUARY 11, 1830.

On the Motion of Mr. N. Calvert, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent Bribery and Corruption in the Borough of East Retford," a debate arose; in the course of which, Viscount Howick moved the following resolutions by way of amendment:—"That the existence of bribery and corruption in the election of members of that House had frequently been established by evidence at the bar, especially in the instances of Penryn and East Retford; that it was notorious, however, that similar practices occurred in the majority of the other boroughs in the country; and therefore that it would be better to abandon the useless and expensive course of proceeding by bill to disfranchise particular places, and in lieu thereof to adopt some measure for a general reform of the representation."

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he was not surprised at the anxiety of the House to come to a decision on a subject which had already been so frequently and so fully discussed, and he could assure hon. gentlemen that for this reason it was not his intention to trespass long on their patience. He rose from a wish to disembarass the question of the extraneous political and personal allusions of his right hon. friend the member for Liverpool. His right hon. friend argued, that because the government had selected the same gentleman as attorney-general who had filled that office under the administration of Mr. Canning, they therefore should adopt the same course in respect to the franchise of a corrupt borough as had been adopted by the House in the time of that right hon. gentleman. His right hon. friend had passed a high eulogium, in the justice of which he (Mr. Peel) fully concurred, on the great learning and talents of Mr. Abercromby. He was happy to have the opportunity of selecting to fill the important office of chief baron of Scotland, a gentleman of the acknowledged talents, and great skill in the Scottish law for which that right hon. gentleman was distinguished. In every thing which had been said of that learned gentleman he fully concurred, but why his right hon. friend should infer from that appointment that government would now be prepared to consent to the transfer of the lapsed franchise to a large town, instead of extending it to the adjoining hundred of Bassetlaw, he (Mr. Peel) was at a loss to conceive; for if they were to follow the course pursued at the time alluded to, it would be to extend the franchise to the adjoining hundred. He owned he could not see what his selection of the hon. member for Sussex, on a former evening, as a member of the committee on Indian affairs, because he represented the interest connected with the growth of wool, had to do as an argument on this question; nor could he see the force of the ridicule which his right hon. friend endeavoured to throw on that selection, and the cause which he had assigned for it. He recollected that, in a speech made by an hon. member last year on the subject of wool, it was stated, that in the northern parts of China there would probably be a considerable outlet for our woollen trade. Remembering that, and believing that if the prospect were realized, it would afford a market for one of our staple commodities, he did think it only what was due to that interest to place on the committee a gentleman representing a part of the country greatly interested in the production of that article. That, he thought, was a reason why an air of ridicule should not be thrown on his selection of Mr. Burrell. He would now put it to the landed interest whether there were a preponderance of that interest when they saw his right hon. friend object to the name of one country gentleman on the committee, and ask to displace Mr. Burrell by inserting instead of his name that of Mr. Marshall, as a representative of the manufacturing interest. In this he saw no proof of the ascendancy of the landed aristocracy in that house. He (Mr. Peel) did not repent of having preferred the name of Mr. Burrell to that of Mr. Marshall, and he must repeat, he could not see the force of the ridicule which his right hon. friend endeavoured to cast on him, because in that selection he had not forgot the interest of that staple commodity of our manufactures and trade. He would now say a few words on the subject before them, and would be very brief, as he was sure that most hon. members were now heartily tired of a subject which had been already so frequently discussed. In the propositions before the House there were four courses from which they were to choose. The first was to issue the writ for the borough of East Retford at once, because some hon. members seemed to think that the evidence in proof of general bribery in the borough was not complete, and that whatever corruption had existed, was already sufficiently punished by the long suspension of the issue of the writ. The second course proposed for adoption was that of the hon. member for Hertfordshire, who was for extending the franchise into the hundred of Bassetlaw. The third was for taking the franchise altogether from East Retford, and transferring it to Birmingham; and the fourth was that proposed by the noble lord (Howick), which went, in his (Mr. Peel's) opinion, to cast an imputation of corruption on all the cities and boroughs in the kingdom. Of these four, he was prepared to adopt that of the hon. member for Hertfordshire. He objected to the first proposition,—that for an immediate issue of the writ—on this ground, that though the evidence did not afford proof of any individual guilt, yet, to his mind, there was sufficient proof of a prevailing habit of bribery in the borough; and as the House had already declared that the borough was corrupt, and ought to be punished, it was, he thought, too much to ask that the writ should now be re-issued. With respect to the proposition of the noble lord, whom he always listened to with respect, because every thing which he pressed on the attention of the House he brought before them with great clearness and ability,—he owned it was one in which he could by no means concur. It was one declaratory of the general prevalence of bribery and corruption in all the cities and boroughs in the kingdom. Now, if he were to admit this, which he did not, but if he were to admit it, it would be an argument in favour of the proposition of his hon. friend the member for Hertford: because if the cities and boroughs were generally corrupt, it would be a good reason for transferring any franchise which Parliament might have at its disposal, not to any town, but to a county; for the noble lord's motion did not extend to charge bribery against the counties. He would admit with the noble lord that there did exist more of bribery and corruption in boroughs and cities than counties, and that, as he had said, would be an additional reason for extending the franchise of this borough to a large body of county voters; but he could not go with the noble lord in the declaration of general bribery and corruption amongst the boroughs and cities. He could not bring himself to consent to include in such a charge the borough of Westbury, which he had the honour to represent, or to involve its respectable electors in so sweeping a censure [A laugh, in which the right hon. gentleman joined]. The noble lord did not include counties in this charge: he represented a county himself [Cries of "No, no"]. Well, then, a borough; and he (Mr. Peel) would have no objection to the noble lord applying this charge to his own borough, if he so pleased, but he believed he would get few hon. members to join him in applying it to the places they represented. He hardly imagined that the hon. baronet near the noble lord (Sir F. Burdett), would consent to such a censure upon his constituents. Taking, then, the proposition of the noble lord as one to which he thought the House would not consent, he would now come to that of the hon. member for Hertford, for extending it to the adjoining hundred of Bassetlaw. The argument of his right hon. friend was not understood. His right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that every case of the kind before them should rest on its own abstract merits, and that he saw circumstances in this that induced him to think that the safest course would be to extend the franchise into the neighbouring hundred. But his right hon. friend the member for Liverpool (Mr. Huskisson), in a manner unworthy of his great talents, had endeavoured to throw ridicule on the extension of the franchise to Bassetlaw. He (Mr. Peel) had voted for that proposition before; and he saw nothing in the argument of his right hon. friend to induce him to depart from the same course on this occasion. Some allusions had been made to the influence which the Duke of Newcastle would obtain by the extension of the franchise to Bassetlaw; but it was not necessary for him to state that he could not have any private inclination to promote the political influence of any one opposed to government. As the thing had been alluded to, however, he would declare, upon his honour, that the support which government gave to the proposition of his hon. friend for extending the franchise to the hundred, was not the result of any communication or any understanding whatever with the noble duke alluded to [hear]. But the fact was, as understood, the interest of the noble lord would not be promoted by the extension of the right of voting to the hundred. There were in that hundred two thousand freeholders, and if he were correctly informed, there did not exist any great leading interest amongst them.

In stating his intention of giving the same vote on this question now as he had done on former occasions, he must not be understood as expressing himself hostile to the extension of the franchise to large towns. He had voted for the transfer of the franchise from Penryn to Manchester, and on that occasion he stated that if, on a future occasion, a majority of the inhabitants of any borough should be proved guilty of bribery and corruption, he should not object to the transfer of the franchise to a large town, with this understanding—that there should be a division of franchises, at the disposal of Parliament, alternately between the landed and commercial and manufacturing interests. He saw no reason to change that opinion, but he thought that there were circumstances in the case of East Retford which should induce Parliament to extend the franchise to the adjoining hundred. This question had been so often under the consideration of the House, and the House had expressed its opinion upon it by so decided a majority, that he did not think it necessary for him then to restate the arguments which he had urged before, on the motion of his hon. friend; but one element in the case which weighed with him was the consideration that the county of Nottingham sent only eight members to Parliament, and he saw no good reason why that number should be reduced to six. The same consideration did not exist in the case of Penryn. He also considered that this extension would act as a punishment amongst the guilty electors, while it would not take away the right from those who were innocent. The throwing in upon the borough this large number of freeholders would, to use the language of an hon. member not then in the House, be a punishment, by “sluicing” them with these two thousand fresh voters; and that the electors of East Retford so considered it, was proved by their protest to that House against the proposition. Now, considering that the question had been eight or ten times discussed, and not apprehending any preponderance of the landed interest in the House from this accession, he thought it would be the safest course which the House could pursue, to adhere to its former decisions; but should it now, contrary to those decisions, adopt the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Tennyson), he (Mr. Peel) had no hesitation in declaring that he should feel it his duty not to oppose by any vexatious delays the passage to the other House of the bill which the hon. member would in that case bring in; for, after the decision of to-night, be it what it might, he did hope not to hear the name of this borough again.

On a division the original motion was carried by 126 against 99; majority, against the amendment, 27.

On the question being put that the bill be now brought in, the House again divided. Ayes, 154; Noes, 55; majority, 99. The bill was accordingly brought in, read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on the 26th of February.

REDUCTION OF PUBLIC SALARIES

FEBRUARY 12, 1830.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for receiving the report of the Committee of Supply, and that a supply be granted to his majesty, Mr. Callaghan addressed the House, recommending the reduction of expenditure and taxation. In a discussion which ensued, Sir James Graham moved the following resolution:—

“That whereas subsequently to the Act 37 Geo. III., for the suspension of Cash Payments by the Bank of England, large augmentations have from time to time been made in the Salaries and Pay of Persons employed in the Civil and Military Service of the Country, on account of the diminished value of money; and whereas the alleged reason of this increase has, for the most part, ceased to operate, in consequence of the Act 59th Geo. III., which has restored the metallic standard of value,—it is expedient that, with a view to relief from the present excessive load of taxation, all such augmentations should now be revised, and every possible reduction effected, which can be made without the violation of existing engagements, and without detriment to the Public Service."

Mr. G. Dawson, at the close of a speech of considerable detail, said, the forms of the House prevented him from moving an amendment to the proposition of the hon. Member for Cumberland; he might meet it by moving the Order of the Day; but as he did not wish to get rid of it in that way, he would let the House negative it, and he would then move the resolutions which he held in his hand, and which he would read to the House. The hon. member then read the resolutions, which were as follows:—

"That his Majesty was graciously pleased to assure this House, in reply to an Address of this House of the 27th June 1821 (that his Majesty would give directions for a minute enquiry into the several departments of the Civil Government, as well with a view to reducing the number of the persons employed in those departments, which from the great increase of business was augmented during the late War, as with reference to the increased salaries granted to individuals since the year 1797, either in consideration of the additional labour thrown upon them during that period, or the diminished value of money), that his Majesty would give directions as desired by the said Address.

"That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that there be laid before this House an Account of the progress made in such enquiry, and of the measures adopted in consequence thereof.

"That it is the opinion of this House, that, in all the Establishments of the Country, Civil and Military, every saving ought to be made which can be effected without the violation of existing engagements, and without detriment to the Public Service."

In the course of the debate,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, I do not conceive that the hon. baronet, the member for Cumberland, is disposed to press the question to a division. So far as I can collect, he is inclined to rest satisfied with the motion of my hon. friend; and I am therefore relieved from the necessity of making many observations which it would otherwise have been my duty to offer to the House. But the hon. baronet, in the commencement of his speech, made a direct appeal to me to which this may be the most convenient time to give some answer. From what I could infer from the outset of the hon. gentleman's speech, I did not expect that he would have entered into the general question of the currency, and the measures which might be proposed for establishing it on what he would conceive a proper footing. I thought that the hon. baronet's motion assumed that the currency, as at present established, must be so maintained, and assuming that the currency was to be so maintained, propounded that certain reductions should be made. This is not perhaps the most convenient or fitting opportunity for going into the consideration of that question, and I shall therefore, not answer in detail the appeal which the hon. gentleman has made to me. But I beg to assure the hon. gentleman that it is not from any desire to shrink from the discussion of the question when the proper opportunity shall present itself. When the regular notice shall have been given, and the attention of the House called to the subject in the necessary form, I shall be prepared to approach it with all the deliberation which its importance demands. But I cannot let even this opportunity pass without remarking, that in the very able speech which the hon. member has addressed to the House, he has made admissions with respect to the currency which tend to relieve me from the responsibility of the introduction of the bill of 1819. For, if the hon. baronet is prepared to act upon the just and wise principles which he has to-night laid down, were an occasion again to arise similar to that upon which the bill of 1819 was passed, the hon. baronet would be bound in consistency and principle to give to me his entire and cordial support. Sir, I beg to declare that whenever I approach the discussion of this great question, considering its delicacy, its complication, and, above all, its importance, I shall forget all political, or rather all party considerations; I shall be inattentive to that violent declamation which ascribes to the measures to which it is opposed the character of iniquity, cruelty, robbery, and fraud. I will ask the House patiently and liberally to consider the position in which we were placed in 1819; and, being content to adopt the principles which the hon. member for Cumberland has laid down, I will call upon the House to pronounce whether there were any alternative to enable us to avert the evils which then impended, other than that of adopting some measure similar in principle to that of 1819, and the infallible consequence of which must be the infliction of considerable distress. Sir, it was not the measure of 1819, but, as my hon. friend who spoke last has properly and truly said, the measures which preceded the Act of 1819, which imposed the necessity of some decisive measures, and to which must be attributed the evils which have occurred since the change of the currency. We had to consider whether we should revert to a metallic standard, or whether we should continue to maintain an inconvertible currency. If any standard were adopted, the infliction of some distress was inevitable. But the hon. member says, that he would establish the civil list on the scale on which it was in 1820, because the faith of parliament was pledged to it. I entirely concur with the hon. member in this sentiment, and I cannot state in terms sufficiently strong the value and importance which I attach to an adherence to national faith. But I would ask the hon. gentleman, if it would be fair to adhere to engagements made by parliament to the crown in 1820, can he refuse to abide by engagements made during the progress of the war with the public creditor? I fully concur in the necessity and propriety of maintaining the national faith inviolate; but I affirm that no engagements made in 1820 are more sacred than the compacts made with the public creditor during the war. I would remind the hon. gentleman and the House that, at the time when every loan was made, there was a distinct intimation to the persons advancing their money, that, within six months after the termination of the war a metallic standard would be restored; and the hon. gentleman, I dare say, will admit that it would be difficult to maintain that, because the national creditor advanced his money in a depreciated paper currency, he is not entitled to reclaim his advances when peace is established, and the restriction upon the bank removed. Sir, the hon. gentleman admits that the chief difference between him and me is, that he would take a silver and gold standard, while I take a gold one alone. The present is not the occasion, but the time will come when I shall have an opportunity of stating the reasons which induced the committee of 1819 to prefer a single standard—and that a standard of gold—to a joint standard; and I can assure the hon. baronet, that if the only difference of opinion between us be, that he would take a joint standard in preference, twenty out of the twenty-five per cent. of distress, which he attributes to the restoration of a metallic currency, would have been imposed by his proposition of a joint standard. Sir, another admission was made by the hon. baronet, of no less importance, and equally true, but not more true than the former, which is this: I trust we shall ever remember the eloquent and impressive sentiments in which the warning was conveyed, which indeed ought always to be present to our minds. Says the hon. baronet, "You may issue your small note currency as you did in 1822, and its convertibility into gold will be no security against the evils of which it will be productive. But as the year 1825 followed that of 1822, if you adopt the same course, the same consequences will ensue, the same languor will follow the same excitement, and similar calamities will be again entailed upon the nation." Sir, I concur in every portion of the hon. baronet's sentiments on this point, and revert to my original position, that there is, in fact, no material difference of opinion between us, and that I am entitled to claim, for the bill of 1819, the hon. gentleman's candid support, and his powerful advocacy.

There is also another point in which I concur with the hon. member—namely, that the re-issuing of a small paper currency, although nominally convertible into gold, would only give a temporary and precarious relief, and that any benefit which it could confer, would be dearly paid for. The cheapness of the currency would produce a temporary advantage, but would ultimately occasion the departure of the whole gold currency from the country. Experience has told us that gold and a small paper currency cannot coexist in a country like this. To raise an immense superstructure of paper nominally payable with gold, would be pregnant with danger; such a state of things might go on for two or three years, but it would end in the departure of all the gold from the country—in excessive and violent changes of funds and other property, and in a sudden panic and simultaneous demand for gold. It would then be no answer to say "We are solvent; give us time, and we can discharge all our obligations." The reply would be, "We have a right to gold at once." There would be a simultaneous rush for gold, and a general bankruptcy and ruin would ensue. A general rush to the public funds would instantaneously take place, and at the same time a simultaneous contraction of the paper currency, and a reacting of all the calamities of 1825. These considerations ought to induce gentlemen to approve and support the bill of 1819, because I believe that such as I have described would be the consequences of a small paper currency, even though it were nominally convertible into gold. Sir, I conceive that the motion of my hon. friend has a clear claim to the preference of the House, because I feel that, before the House comes to a resolution which would seem to imply that nothing had been done for the relief of the popular burthens, it would be right that the House should be in possession of some account of what the government has actually done. The hon. gentleman will also see that his motion is calculated to excite extravagant hopes which cannot be realized. He has alluded to the increase of military pay, but, Sir, the pay of the army has not been increased since 1797, and when the hon. gentleman alluded to those military officers whose pay has been increased, he appears to me to have made rather an injudicious selection. He has spoken of the Governor of New Brunswick, the Bishop of Nova Scotia, the Governor of Sierra Leone, and another, all of which are civil appointments, although they may at times be held by individuals possessing military rank; but the places themselves are civil offices. I believe also that the hon. gentleman will find that, acting on his own principles, nothing could be done which would effect any material reduction of taxation in that way. The motion of my hon. friend calls for an account of what has been actually done, and the House can then apply it to the Estimates. Sir, I must beg to protest against an inference drawn by a noble lord who has intimated that this resolution is extorted from his Majesty's Ministers by the speech of the hon. member. I would refer to the resolution passed in this House in 1821, on a motion of the hon. member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Banks), praying his Majesty that every possible reduction might be effected in the extensive establishments necessary for the maintenance and defence of the kingdom, and more especially in the army and other great institutions essential for the supervision and regulation of the national concerns. Knowing that the Crown acted on this resolution, we can have no objection that the House of Commons should place upon record a resolution recommending that every reduction and retrenchment consistent with the national engagements, and with the advantage of the public service, should be made.—Sir, a great deal has been said on the subject of having taken the advice of different parties in this House. Sir, I am not conscious that there have been any accessions to the government in which there have been any compromise of principle, and I confess I see nothing disgraceful in a man, when he approves of the conduct and measures of government, giving that assistance which may tend to render those measures effectual for the service of the state. For those who compose his Majesty's present administration I may be permitted to say, that our intention is to persevere in performing that which we feel to be our duty to the country. We are aware of the state of party in this House, and are not ignorant of the consequences which may arise from the combination of parties here. But, let these consequences be what they may, it is our determination to pursue our path firmly and conscientiously. In the course of last year we performed a great duty, by acting in contradiction to the opinions we had previously entertained, and the course which we had long thought it our duty to pursue. I then thought, and I do still believe, that that step was imposed upon us by a positive and overwhelming necessity, even though, by carrying it into effect we forfeited the confidence and the attachment of many in this House. But, Sir, I cannot now, even to conciliate the goodwill of that party, or any member of it, say that I repent the step that we have taken. I solemnly declare that subsequent events have convinced me that, by that course, we averted from the country great and awful calamities, the pressure of which would now be felt in aggravation of the distress which is described as universal and severe. Had Parliament refused to grant that long-agitated question of Catholic Emancipation owing to our perseverance or obstinacy, or whatever other name may be given to it, at this moment Ireland and England would be in very different situations from what they now are. I firmly believe that from the settlement of that question have resulted greater benefits than I contemplated, and greater dangers have been averted than any one could have foreseen. There have certainly been individual acts of atrocity which were a disgrace to those concerned in them; but it is not from individual acts that we are to judge of the character or condition of a nation, nor can we form a just or accurate estimate from the exaggerated accounts of those acts of violence, even where they are not altogether destitute of foundation. But I see in the condition of that country the elements of future religious peace and national prosperity. The upper classes of society are falling into an oblivion of past animosities as rapidly as can be expected in so short a time, and the example of those classes is fast extending through the great body of society. Deeply as I regret the loss of the confidence which a portion of the members of this House have withdrawn from his Majesty's government, and clearly as I foresee the possible consequences which the combination of parties may lead to, I yet cannot purchase their confidence by expressing a regret for what has occurred. I say this with no feeling of hostility or asperity. I had at the outset a perfect knowledge of the painful consequences which might arise to me individually, and in my public capacity, from proposing the measure of Catholic Emancipation; but if the same junction were again to occur—if the business were to be transacted over again—with still greater deliberation and determination, and with increased preparation to make any personal sacrifice that might be necessary, I would this very night give notice of a motion for the introduction of such a measure. Sir, we made that concession and that sacrifice for the public good, and for the public good alone; but we have made and we will make no concession and no sacrifices for the purpose of maintaining ourselves in office. We will uphold the established institutions of the country with such salutary and well considered reform as change of circumstances may render necessary, and so far as shall be consistent with the preservation of the permanent interests of the country. We will propose such measures of retrenchment as can be effected with advantage, but will propose none which cannot be maintained consistently with the honour and just influence of this nation; and I say with confidence, but with perfect respect, that, whatever may be the consequence of the combination of parties in this House, there is a sufficient fund of good sense prevailing in the country, without reference to ultra Whig or ultra Tory, which will ultimately sanction and confirm the course that has been pursued, and which it is our intention to pursue. [The conclusion of this speech was delivered in an expressively animated manner: and was received with loud cheers.]

In reply to Mr. Attwood, Mr. Peel, in explanation, begged to say that an inference had been attempted to be drawn from his declining to enter into details, which was totally unfair—namely, that he had admitted that an alteration had taken place generally, about the period of 1819, to the amount of 25 per cent., or upwards. He begged to say that he never had, either in words, or tacitly, made any such admission, and he was satisfied, neither the hon. member who last spoke, nor any other who concurred in opinion with that hon. member, could prove that any such depression then took place. Whilst thus availing himself of the privilege of explaining, he would take this opportunity of saying that he anticipated great advantages from the improvement of the banking system, though decidedly opposed to the issues of notes for a less value than £5. Indeed, he hesitated not to confess that he hoped and trusted the day would soon arrive, when all the present restrictions on the banking system would be removed.

Sir James Graham withdrew his motion, and the resolutions of Mr. G. Dawson were adopted.

REDUCTION OF PUBLIC ESTABLISHMENTS.

FEBRUARY 15, 1830.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved that the Order for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider of the Supply, Mr. Hume moved, by way of amendment, "That this House will forthwith proceed to a repeal and modification of taxation to the largest possible extent which the reductions that may be made in the Civil, Military, and Naval Establishments of the country will admit, as a means of affording general relief to the Country."

In the debate which ensued, Sir Francis Burdett spoke; and Lord Howick having expressed his intention to vote in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Aberdeen,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL expressed his satisfaction at having on that occasion to vote with the hon. baronet, the Member for Westminster [“No, No,” from Sir F. Burdett]. He understood he was to have the benefit of the hon. baronet’s vote; but he found his opening sentence completely destroyed by the unexpected declaration that the hon. baronet’s vote was to be against his own speech. Certainly he inferred from that speech that the hon. baronet meant to vote against the motion. Undeceived as to his error, he should say that he could not agree with those gentlemen who contended that no relief could be given to the people by a reduction of taxation. The remission of every tax was, undoubtedly, a relief to the people. He never did suppose that, when a tax was not necessary, the amount of such tax ought to be diverted from the natural application of industry; for he was sure it would fructify more in the hands of the people than in those of the state; and, if taxation were not necessary, he should not wish to levy taxes. He did not expect that the currency question would have been mentioned that night; and he really would advise any gentleman who wished that the currency should be again altered, that he would undertake, on some specific night, to bring the motion regularly before the House; and he would also advise him, not only to give a notice, but to take the trouble to propose an enactment; and come to the House ready to show, in all its details, how the currency was to be depreciated, what would be the effect of his measure on all contracts, and how the distress would be remedied by the depreciation he meant to propose. Members seemed to conceive, in every discussion, that depreciating the currency was an obvious remedy for the distress; and when the hon. baronet brought forward the important measure he no doubt contemplated on this subject, he should be ready to meet his argument: on the present occasion he meant only to make one or two short observations. He could not understand the hon. baronet’s doctrine, that reducing the currency five millions in amount necessarily reduced the income of the country fifty millions. He could not see why the reduction of the currency should reduce the income to a ten times greater amount. By raising the value of money, those who possessed it could obtain a greater command over commodities. He admitted that there was a certain class whose property was incumbered, and who were obliged to discharge their incumbrances at a fixed sum; and he would admit, that raising the value of money was a hardship on them, but to those destitute of incumbrance it was no hardship. The hon. baronet said, that because they had already tampered with the currency this was a reason why they should tamper with it again. That was the hon. baronet’s argument:—we had recently tampered with the currency, and we ought with less reserve to tamper with it again; if we had at one time depreciated the currency, the same argument would apply again with additional force. But he would beg the hon. baronet to recollect the inconvenience that would be felt, if by any further tampering with the currency they were again to unsettle after ten years’ continuance, (for so long had the currency been established on its present basis, with the exception of a short interval, in 1822,) he would beg the hon. baronet to recollect the vast inconvenience which would result from their again unsettling all the contracts of the country. Would he then attempt to alter all the engagements contracted on the faith of Parliament, that an alteration in the currency should not again take place? And would the hon. baronet venture to say what would be the consequences of their altering the currency, influencing and deranging all the contracts that had been entered into during the last thirteen or fourteen years? Not only would the hon. baronet unsettle all those engagements; but he (Mr. Peel) wished to know what criterion he would fix upon to determine the precise standard. There was one other point connected with the hon. baronet’s speech on which he wished to say a few words. If the House were to determine on the hon. baronet’s proposition to depreciate the currency, what would be the inevitable consequence? The moment that the public who held paper convertible into gold coin found that that gold coin was to be deteriorated, they would rush with their paper to obtain gold before the deterioration. If, indeed, the hon. baronet could, by his emphatic will alone, instantly alter the standard, so that a man who held paper should find on awaking to-morrow morning that for that paper he could obtain only eighteen or nineteen shillings in the pound, that would be another affair. But before the legislature could pass a bill upon the subject, every man who held paper, consulting like most persons his individual interest, would press forward to obtain the performance of the engagement which had been made with him in the medium in which that engagement had been contracted. On these two grounds, therefore—first on the impropriety of unsettling all the pecuniary engagements which had been entered into since the year 1819, or rather since the year 1816; and secondly, on the confusion which the urgency of the demand for gold in its present state must necessarily occasion—he entreated the hon. baronet to pause before he dreamt of proposing a deterioration of the currency. So much for the episode which the hon. baronet had introduced into the discussion; and now a few words upon the motion of the hon. member for Aberdeen. To that motion there were, in his opinion, more objections than it would be convenient to take up the time of the House by stating. It was unusual and unprecedented. It was unusual, before ministers laid the estimates on the table, and stated their views with respect to taxation, to propose a resolution, not to repeal any particular tax, but a general resolution that the House would proceed to repeal a certain taxation. What was to be gained by such a proposition? If the resolution were not agreed to, the hon. member would be just as much at liberty to propose the repeal of any particular tax as if the resolution were carried. In fact, it was the duty of the House to repeal whatever taxes could be repealed consistently with the public benefit. The hon. member, therefore, would not advance a single step, if all that he meant was, that the House should repeal exactly the amount of taxes which their duty to the public would permit. But the proposed resolution went further. As had been justly observed by his right hon. friend, it went to dispose of the Sinking Fund. Now, that might be a proper proposition; but undoubtedly it was one which required more consideration than could be given to it when introduced incidentally to their notice. But here, without an hour's consideration, it was proposed to determine that there should be no sinking fund. He protested, therefore, against the adoption of that Resolution without further consideration. But that was not all. It was impossible to separate the motion from the comments with which the hon. member had accompanied it. The public would couple the resolution with the hon. gentleman's speech. Now, in that speech he proposed to reduce the expenditure, and, consequently, the taxation, eight millions and a half. He would leave the House to judge what effect would be produced on the public mind if a resolution should be agreed to by the House of Commons, promising a reduction of taxation of eight millions and a half. Another objectionable part of the proposition was, that it had no specific purpose. The hon. gentleman proposed to remit a great taxation, but he did not particularize the taxes which ought to be remitted. He did not propose that the tax upon soap, upon candles, upon malt, &c. ought to be remitted. Now, any one who proposed the remission of a tax ought at once to bring in a bill for that purpose. For nothing could be so injurious to the retail trader as to leave in a state of uncertainty the taxes which it was intended to remit. But the hon. member said, "Remit taxation, but leave the country in doubt what particular taxes you will remit." The consequence of adopting such a resolution, coupled with such a speech, would be not to restore confidence in the country, but to suspend business; because it could not be known for three or four weeks what particular taxes would be reduced. The hon. member would have adopted a more rational course had he brought forward a proposition for repealing some particular tax, and taken the sense of the House upon it. An hon. gentleman had urged as an argument in support of the hon. member's proposition, that it would atone to the country for the omission in the King's Speech, and repair the disappointment occasioned by doubting the existence of distress in the country. He knew how unpopular any person made himself at the present moment by arguing against the existence of universal and overwhelming distress. He was convinced, however, that the description of the distress in the speech from the throne was much nearer the truth than any description characterising it as universal and overwhelming. The communications which he had received from various parts of the country since the delivery of the speech, from persons with whom he was unacquainted, but who volunteered their statements, concurred in declaring that there was not that universal distress which the hon. gentleman opposite supposed. Although he admitted that there was distress in many parts of the country, while he deeply lamented it, yet he did not believe that it extended over the whole kingdom, or that it was so severe as to extinguish all hopes of remedy. There was an elasticity in the resources of the country which he was persuaded would ultimately lead to a return of comparative prosperity; and he did not think, by exaggerated descriptions, and by exciting, however unintentionally, general despair and dismay, that we should approximate more closely to the restoration of confidence, and the practicability of diminishing the public burthens.

On a division Mr. Hume's motion was negatived by 184 against 69; majority, 115.

SETTLEMENT OF GREECE.

FEBRUARY 16, 1830.

Lord John Russell, pursuant to notice, moved, "That this House learnt, with satisfaction, that his Majesty, having recently concerted with his Allies measures for the pacification and final settlement of Greece, trusts that he shall be enabled at an early period, to communicate to parliament the particulars of this arrangement, with such information as may explain the course which his Majesty has pursued throughout the progress of these important transactions. That it is the confident hope of this House, that such final settlement will be found to secure to Greece a territory sufficient for national defence, and a government provided with full powers to adapt its institutions to the wishes and wants of the people."

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances in which I am placed, I trust that I shall be enabled to give such general explanations to the noble lord, as may induce him to be of opinion that it is not necessary to take the sense of the House upon his motion. I say that I am placed under peculiar circumstances, because the House will recollect that on the first day of the session, in the speech from the Throne, his Majesty stated, that in conjunction with his Allies, and in conformity with the Treaty of the 6th of July, he was on the point of concluding a final arrangement for the pacification of Greece, and for the determination of its relations with the rest of Europe: and his Majesty was pleased to add, that all the papers connected with that arrangement, sufficient to explain the course he had taken, should be laid before Parliament at an early period. In my official capacity I am, of course, cognizant of those papers; and I cannot help thinking that nothing could be more inconvenient than for me at the present moment to be drawn into an untimely discussion which may involve that information of which ere long the House will be in possession. Were I drawn into such a discussion, I do not know how I could avoid availing myself of that information, thus obtaining an advantage in debate which others do not enjoy. I therefore trust that the object of the noble lord will be attained, although I do not enter into that discussion; but if it should hereafter arise, and if the noble lord should deem it necessary to take the sense of the House, I hope that the forms of the House will not prevent my offering some further observations. The noble lord avows that his main object is, if possible, to procure an explanation on two points which he deems of pressing importance.—First, the nature of the institutions provided by the Allies for the future government of Greece; second, the territorial limits to be assigned to the new State. On the first point I apprehend I shall be enabled to give complete satisfaction. I can assure the noble lord, that in the arrangements, the bases of which have been laid by the Allies who are parties to the Treaty of the 6th of July, although the noble lord seems to have heard rumours to the contrary, no attempt has been made to dictate despotic monarchy to Greece. No provision is made in the arrangements which can control the establishment of such institutions as may be compatible with the present situation of Greece. I can also venture to disclaim, certainly on the part of my own country, and I believe on the part of France and Russia, any wish to interfere with the formation of such institutions as are best calculated to secure the liberty and promote the happiness of Greece. Into the second point, which relates to the limits of the new State, I can scarcely enter without an infringement of the principle to which I referred at the commencement of my observations. On the 22nd of March the Protocol was issued to which the noble Lord referred, and which in some way or other obtained publicity in the continental Journals, relating to the limits of Greece, and the noble lord has expressed his apprehensions that the boundaries now about to be assigned will be less than those mentioned in the Protocol. I feel that the present is not the occasion for entering into the details, but I can venture to assure the noble lord, that the arrangement now in progress for the independence, happiness, and security of Greece is, in my opinion, much more favourable than that which was contemplated in the Protocol. The territorial limits may be less extensive, but the compensation for the more confined limits will, I think, be found ample. The noble lord justly observes, that it must be the policy of those countries which entered into the treaty of the 6th of July to give Greece such security as in her infancy will protect her from foreign interference: he, therefore, wishes that she shall have a frontier capable of being easily defended. It may be sufficient for me to assure the noble lord that there is no such limitation of the new state as he appears to believe is contemplated—that the boundaries will be far more extensive than the Morea, and that will include all those places with which our historical recollections are gratefully associated, and that the nature of the frontier will in a considerable degree afford the means of defence. But the question of limits is of much less importance, provided those states which entered into the treaty of the 6th of July have completed that arrangement, which we hope will be a fulfilment of that engagement—provided also, that those states, under whose fostering care this new government is to be established, feel that interest in its prosperity which will induce them, until its resources are of themselves sufficient, to undertake the guarantee of its independence.

With regard to the anxiety of this country to support the government of Turkey, it will be recollected by the noble lord, that on a former occasion some sarcastic remarks were made upon the supposed attachment of ministers to Turkish institutions—as if, because they did not wish for the dismemberment of the Ottoman power, they necessarily admired its institutions! At that time I protested against any such inference, and I added that I thought I could prove, by the opinions of statesmen strongly attached to liberty and liberal institutions, that it was possible to entertain a desire to preserve the integrity of Turkey without the implication that it was fit to support its system of internal government. The noble lord has spoken of the opinion entertained by Mr. Fox in 1791, but in 1806 the circumstances of Europe were certainly such as to induce Mr. Fox to think that it was for the general interest of Europe—for the sake of the preservation of the tranquillity of the world, that the independence of Turkey should be secured. There was another proof of the opinions of Mr. Fox on this subject, which I did not bring forward. In the course of the discussions with the French government in 1806, a proposition was made by Prince Talleyrand, that some compensation should be made to Sicily, by the establishment of a new state, consisting of Albania, and the Morea. Mr. Fox protested against this proposed dismemberment of Turkey, contending that it ought to be part of the policy of Great Britain, France, and Russia, to preserve the integrity of the Turkish power. Mr. Fox, therefore, attached great importance to the maintenance of Turkey as an independent state; but I hope that the mention of this topic will not tend to introduce discussion. I did not on a former day mean to state Mr. Fox's views as to the general system of European policy. I only wished to show by that instance, that public men, in accordance with the example of their predecessors, might attach importance to the preservation of the integrity of Turkey without necessarily leading to the inference that they approved the system of internal government in Turkey. If the noble lord had brought forward his motion in a hostile manner; if he himself had not said that he rather introduced it in order to procure from ministers such an answer and such information as they could give consistently with their duty; and if I thought he meant to press it to a division, I should feel under the necessity of at once opposing it; but considering the promise of the Crown at the earliest period to afford information, I do not think there is any thing in the complicated relations of this country with regard to Greece, as they have existed during the last three years, to entitle this House so far to withhold its confidence from the present servants of the Crown, that it should undertake to express an opinion before it has obtained the information on which an opinion ought to be founded. I beg the House to recollect that when the present government (I mean the administration of the Duke of Wellington) came into office, they found the Treaty of the 6th July in existence; the objects of that Treaty were necessarily vague and imperfect, but the intention of it was to apply an immediate remedy to an enormous evil affecting the interests of every commercial country. Although the present Ministry were not the authors of that Treaty, yet, throughout the whole progress of its execution, we were as desirous to fulfil its objects in the spirit of the Treaty as was Mr. Canning himself. What were the facts? Shortly after the accession of the Duke of Wellington to power, one of the parties to the Treaty found herself, on grounds quite extrinsic, involved in a war with Turkey. Against the right of Russia to enter into that war we did not protest, but left her to pursue the line of policy she deemed it proper to take. It has been said, that my noble friend at the head of the cabinet, and the government generally, were in some respects responsible for the precipitation and rashness with which Turkey commenced hostilities, and for the obstinacy with which she persevered in them; it has also been contended that we were deceived as to the result, and thought that Turkey could maintain a successful resistance. The main charge against us, however, has been, that Turkey was in some way improperly induced to place reliance on the friendship and goodwill of Great Britain, particularly after she had been termed in the Speech from the Throne, our "ancient ally," and that in consequence of that alliance, she was led to embroil herself in war. Now, a simple reference to a few dates, without entering into any argument, will totally disprove this charge. I vindicate not only the government of the Duke of Wellington, but that of Lord Goderich, from the imputation of having created an impression on the part of Turkey, that she might rely upon the assistance of England, either directly or indirectly. It so happens that the battle of Navarino was fought on the 20th October, 1827, and the account of it reached Constantinople on the 1st Nov. following. The Ambassadors of the Allied Powers, and the Minister of England as one of those Powers, in consequence of their total dissatisfaction with the assurances given by Turkey, left Constantinople about the 20th December, 1827. Turkey had, therefore, at that time, first, the proof that England had taken her share in the battle of Navarino; and next, the proof that England was displeased with the course she had taken, by the departure of her ambassador from the capital. It was on the very day that the British Ambassador left Constantinople that the Porte was infatuated enough to issue that document called a Hatti-scherriff, and which was the immediate cause of the war. It was issued on the 20th December, and it was not until the 3rd January that my noble friend was made Prime Minister. When he was so appointed, it was not known that the Hatti-scherriff had been published by Turkey, nor did that fact transpire until after she had been designated in the King's speech the "ancient ally" of this country. These facts show that it was impossible that any foolish reliance on the friendship and assistance of England could have induced Turkey to enter into the war with Russia; for that war Turkey is alone responsible, and for her perseverance in it she is also alone responsible; in both cases she acted not only without the encouragement but directly against the advice and remonstrances of Great Britain. It may be said, indeed, that although she entered into that war upon the consideration of her own case, and without any such reliance upon Great Britain, still it should have been the policy of this government to interfere actively to prevent the disastrous issue of the war. Here I must say, as indeed has been already said, that before England is induced to second a war of that nature, it becomes her first to ask the question whether the proposed hostilities are just and necessary. In the Hatti-scherriff, which was the cause of the aggression of Russia, three declarations were publicly given:—First, a religious appeal was made to all Mahometans to take up arms against Russia; next, there was a positive statement that Turkey would only enter into negotiations with Russia to deceive her and to gain time, the better to prepare new means of resistance; thirdly, that she had signed the treaty of Ackermann with the intention of violating it, and that she never would fulfil any of its conditions.—Therefore, not only were we not responsible for the conduct of that power in engaging in the war, but if we had undertaken her defence, we must have undertaken it upon grounds which no honest minister could approve. Whatever importance we might attach to the integrity of Turkey, and whatever wish we might entertain to see an amicable settlement of the matters in dispute, I must protest against the notion that England ought to be bound by the rashness or folly which might influence the councils of others. The conduct of England in attempting to mediate was perfectly consistent with wisdom ; but there was no obligation, express or implied, of treaty, of good faith, or of policy, which could induce or justify her in actively interfering by means of war with the issue of the pending contest. Still, notwithstanding that war, and notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances in which England and France were placed as neutral powers, having to execute the treaty of 6th July with Russia, a belligerent, we felt it so important to Europe, and above all, we had contracted such obligations to Greece, that we were compelled to overcome every minor difficulty, and to persevere in the attainment of the objects of the treaty. I am happy to say that we have succeeded : that treaty is on the eve of its final accomplishment ; peace has been preserved ; and whatever may have been the original intentions of the authors of the treaty, I will venture to say that in the result it will be found that the three great parties to the Protocol never at first contemplated any settlement so favourable to Greece as that which, I think, consistently with justice to Turkey, we have been enabled to make. Let me remind the House that by the treaty of the 6th July, nothing more was contemplated than the establishment of that sort of qualified independence which would have left the state of Greece the vassal to the Porte, and subject to the payment of a considerable tribute : the Porte would even have had the power to interfere in the nomination of the Greek governors. By intervening events and by negotiation, we have been able to establish the complete independence of Greece. She no longer holds the rank of a mere vassal dependent upon the Porte, but she will take her place among the independent nations of Europe. Having effected these objects, notwithstanding the difficulties opposed to us, I apprehend it will be felt, from what I have stated, that there has been that degree of harmony and good faith in the councils of the "three great powers, Great Britain, France, and Russia," which will at least induce the House to suspend its judgment until the promised papers can be laid upon the table. Surely there is nothing in the course of these transactions to justify suspicion. I concur with the noble lord, that it must be the policy of this country to see that a new State thus formed is placed in a situation in which it can be prosperous ; and I join with him heartily in the earnest wish he has expressed, that the Greeks of the present day may recover from the torpor of long slavery, and be enabled to emulate the glory of their predecessors, while, at the same time, they enjoy all the advantages that arise from the progress of knowledge, and from the establishment of those institutions which, in happy countries like this, are calculated to insure the possession of civil and religious liberty.

In reply to Lord Palmerston, Mr. Peel said, I am extremely sorry, that when I stated that his Majesty's government had been able to execute the treaty in the spirit in which it had been conceived, and even to carry it further, any one should suppose that I thereby intended to draw a contrast between the present government and the original framers of the treaty. I said that we had carried the treaty further than Mr. Canning, but that has been because events have arisen which Mr. Canning was not able to foresee. But, Sir, I think that I have a right to complain of the manner in which my noble friend has called the attention of the House to the subject ; there were first addressed some questions to me, and when they were answered, the noble lord (Palmerston) has risen to found a statement upon them ; I therefore think that I have a right to complain, because I certainly did not conceive that these answers would form the groundwork of the unpremeditated impromptu delivered by my noble friend. What a situation am I placed in by answering these questions ? Was it fair on such a ground to enter into the description of boundaries—was it proper to enter into the discussion of attaching Candia to Greece. Can I in reply state and argue upon all those circumstances of which the House is not yet in possession ? Can I enter into the reasons why, because there has been a rebellion, not only England, but all the other powers have forced Turkey to a submission, to which, under other circumstances, they would not have consented ? But, Sir, even if my noble friend shall succeed in procuring a majority for the noble lord's motion, it will still leave the government unfettered as to Candia, for the noble lord's motion has nothing to do with that : and I protest that I will not be drawn to enter into the discussion by the course pursued, trusting the House will feel the situation in which I am placed, and that the time is not yet arrived for that discussion. I feel that I cannot in fairness enter into that discussion, and I will not enter into it ; but I trust that the House will not from this resolution of mine, draw any unfair conclusion. My noble friend has stated, that if England would consent to enlarge the limits of Greece, he was pretty sure that the other powers who have joined in the treaty would not be opposed to such extension. Certainly this is a statement which I did not expect to hear from my noble friend. I do not, however, know in whose confidence he may be, or whom he may undertake to represent in making that statement, unless he comes to that conclusion from having been in office at the time of the execution of the treaty. This, however, at all events, I can state to the House, that the most perfect harmony on the question of boundaries exists between the contracting powers; and that the arrangements will be found worthy of the sanction of parliament.

Lord Palmerston having explained, Mr. Peel also spoke in explanation.—I can assure my noble friend that I admit his perfect right to express his opinions, and to have them considered expressly as his own; and if I had objected to it, I should have been justly subject to censure. But I was not speaking of opinions, but of facts. Neither did I impute to my noble friend any improper disclosure of the information he obtained while in office; all that I stated was, that having made a speech, I was placed under a disadvantage when my noble friend entered into details. The fact to which I referred was this—that my noble friend stated certain circumstances in such a manner as must have led those who heard him, to suppose that he spoke from authority, and that he was in possession of the negotiations between the powers, thereby leading those who heard him to conclude that England stood alone on the question of limits; and that if she would waive her objections on that head, there was reason to believe that the other powers would also waive theirs. For this reason I thought it necessary to state that the three contracting powers were agreed upon this point, and that there was no such want of harmony as my noble friend would have made out. It was for these reasons that I made the observations I did; and I beg to assure him, that in making them I did not in the least intend to impute to him any improper disclosures.

Lord John Russell having declined to divide the House on his motion, it was negatived without a division.

FEES PAID BY PERSONS ACQUITTED.

FEBRUARY 17, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move for leave to bring in a bill—by which, however, he did not feel quite satisfied that the immediate object which he had in view would be gained—namely, a bill to abolish all fees heretofore payable by persons on their acquittal or other discharge from any criminal charge. In 1818 a bill had passed that and the other House of Parliament, the intention of the framers of which must certainly have been to abolish all such fees, for it enacted that no fee should be paid on the acquittal of any prisoner charged with felony or misdemeanour. The construction which had been put upon that bill, however, was that it was applicable only to persons retained in custody, tried and acquitted, and not to persons who were only held to bail, and afterwards tried and acquitted. The object of his bill was to relieve all acquitted persons, whether they had been in custody or only held to bail, from the payment of fees upon acquittal. At present, a person so circumstanced was liable to pay 13s. 4d. to the clerk of the peace, 2s. to the crier of the court, and (which was the most extraordinary fee of all) 12s. to the jury on every traverse. On grave consideration, however, it appeared to him that the bill for which he was about to move would not go far enough. It would only relieve the person acquitted from the payment of fees, but he would still be subject to the payment of different fees for the formal processes of the court. Among other charges there was drawing up the record, for which the person tried had to pay a shilling a folio; amounting in some cases to five or six pounds, and in many to two or three; although in numerous instances no record whatever was drawn up. Since he had given notice of his bill, the hon. member for Cumberland had expressed his intention to move for the appointment of a committee to enquire into the amount of fees receivable by clerks of the peace, and the authority on which those fees were demand. He (Mr. Peel) highly approved of the proposition, and if that committee were appointed, he would not press his bill upon the attention of the House until the result of its enquiries were known. He understood that last year it was a question with many country gentlemen whether granting compensation for fees were desirable, very large sums having been demanded on that score. The act of 1815, to which he had before alluded, provided compensation for the officers whose fees it took away, and subjected the county to the payment of that compensation. He confessed, however, that he did not see the justice of rendering the county liable at all times; although, with respect to fees, he was certainly inclined to think that on the termination of all existing interests it might be advisable that they should cease. The whole subject was one of great importance, and as he understood the hon. member for Cumberland would take an early opportunity of moving for the committee to which he had alluded, he would merely now move for leave to bring in the bill, but postpone any further proceeding on it until the committee had enquired into the subject. The right hon. gentleman accordingly moved for leave to bring in his bill.

In reply to an observation by Sir T. Baring,

Mr. Peel said, he had abstained from giving an opinion as to whether all officers in those courts to which his bill had reference should be paid by salary or by fees. All he asked was, whether, when an individual was discharged, he should be called on to pay for that which was not essential to his defence. He did not say that he meant to do away all fees and substitute a fixed salary. That was a point of grave importance and required much consideration.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

LAW REFORMS.

FEBRUARY 18, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL rose to make the motion of which he had given notice respecting the reform of the courts of law. Before he proceeded, he begged that so much of the royal speech at the opening of the session as related to the measures for the improvements of the courts of law might be now read.

The clerk of the House then read as follows:—"His Majesty commands us to acquaint you that his attention has been of late earnestly directed to various important considerations connected with improvements in the general administration of the law. His Majesty has directed that measures shall be submitted for your deliberation of which some are calculated, in the opinion of his majesty, to facilitate and expedite the course of justice in different parts of the United Kingdom; and others appear to be necessary preliminaries to a revision of the practice and proceedings of the superior courts. We are commanded to assure you that his majesty feels confident that you will give your best attention and assistance to subjects of such deep and lasting concern to the wellbeing of his people." The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to say, that in moving, pursuant to notice, for leave to bring in a bill for ascertaining the fees and emoluments of officers in the courts of common law, he thought it might be convenient and advantageous to the House that, at an early period of the session, he should avail himself of an opportunity of presenting to it a general outline of the measures connected with the improvements in the administration of the law referred to in his majesty's gracious speech from the throne at the commencement of the present session. He was quite aware that each of these measures would require a separate and deliberate consideration, but still he considered it of importance, that previously to entering upon the separate consideration of each of them, the House should be in possession of the views and objects of his majesty's government in a connected form, for the purpose of enabling it to form a judgment with respect to the general scope and tendency of the proposed measures. He was convinced that his majesty's confidence in the House (which he had graciously expressed in his speech from the throne), and his reliance upon the disposition of the House to lend every attention and assistance in the progress of these measures, had not been misplaced, and would not be disappointed. He was himself confident, whatever shades of difference might exist in the opinions entertained by members of that House upon political questions, however different their views as to the precise extent of the distress mentioned in the speech from the throne, and which was unfortunately more or less prevalent throughout the country—whatever difference might exist on the subject of our foreign or domestic policy, he was confident, however the attention of the House might be occasionally occupied with these considerations, that hon. members would not be so exclusively engaged in them as to allow such matters to withdraw their attention from the perhaps less interesting and animating discussion of legal improvements, which were, however, far from being of slight consequence to the permanent welfare of the country. He alluded to the intended measures for the improvement of the general administration of justice. He felt confident that members would indulge him and favour him with their attention while he stated the general outline of these measures. He had no doubt that they would make allowances for his want of professional education and professional experience, a circumstance that might render some of his explanations less intelligible than they would otherwise be upon such a subject. He was also satisfied that the House would take into account the necessary occupation of his time in other matters, which the peculiar duties of his office rendered still more pressing than the present subject (important as it was), and that they would overlook any errors or oversights which he might commit. The technical details of the subject he left to the discussion of others who were better qualified than he was, by their habits and education, to deal with them; but he considered it to be a part of his duty to present to the House, in a popular form, the great and general principles of the improvements to be proposed, so as to render them intelligible to others who, like himself, did not possess the advantage of professional knowledge and experience. The House was aware that, some short time since, his Majesty, in compliance with an address of the House, had appointed two commissions of enquiry—the one for the purpose of enquiring into the practice and proceedings of the superior courts of common law—the other to enquire into the state of the law relative to real property. He must give credit to the hon. and learned gentleman opposite for a great share in the appointment of those commissions which he had suggested in the able, learned, and comprehensive speech delivered by him in the session before last, upon the subject of legal reforms. Though there was a qualification of the proposal with which that speech concluded in the course subsequently taken, it was apparent that the object of the speech was the appointment of commissions of enquiry into the state of the law, with a view to its improvement. The House was aware that reports had been made by each of those commissions, which in each case did the highest credit to the views of the gentlemen who composed them, and to the mode in which they proceeded to fulfil their duties and accomplish the intentions for which they had been appointed. With respect to the report of the common law commissioners, it embraced several matters of the highest importance to the due administration of justice and to the despatch of business in the superior courts of common law, and the increased activity of those courts. The second report of the common law commissioners would be presented to his Majesty in a few days. It was a report embracing objects of much higher consideration and importance than the first. From the communications he had had with the commissioners of enquiry into the practice of the common law he could inform the House, that the second report, which he trusted shortly to have it in his power to lay before the House, would embrace—First, the expediency of investing the superior courts with new powers of a summary and equitable kind, calculated to economise time and money in legal proceedings, and prevent the too frequent resort to the aid of courts of equity. The second point adverted to by the commissioners was a subject of great importance—it referred to the verification of written documents before trial. The third recommendation related to compulsory arbitration in matters of accounts. The fourth to an abridgment and simplification of the obsolete and useless forms of pleading. There were also other matters introduced in the forthcoming report, which were of scarcely less importance to the due administration of the law, but he had mentioned these, deeming them of the highest consequence. The commissioners appointed to enquire into the state of the law of real property had also made one report, and he trusted he should be able to announce at an early period the production of another, in continuation of their labours upon that important subject.

With respect to both commissions, every member, who had turned his attention to the subject, would freely and readily admit the great importance of our being enabled to consider the whole question of legal reform simultaneously, and in a systematic manner. We ought not to attempt partial reforms, but endeavour to effect a general improvement in the practice and administration of the law. The whole subject of the law—the subjects of enquiry before each commission—were so intimately connected and interwoven together, that until we were in possession of the entire views of the commissioners in relation to them, it would be desirable to postpone partial reforms in the law, and wait till we had the whole question fairly before us. Perhaps there were parts of the system, which, under circumstances of peculiar urgency, we might venture to touch; but, generally speaking, the whole was so interwoven, the several branches of enquiry were so closely connected, and the inconvenience of partial legislation was so great, that he fully concurred with the commissioners in deprecating the adoption of partial and isolated measures, and in waiting till we could deal with the whole subject at once. He must advert to another commission that had been recently appointed, not in consequence of an address to the crown, but directly on behalf of his majesty; it was instituted for the purpose of enquiry into the present state of our ecclesiastical law, with a view to revising the proceedings had in suits in the ecclesiastical courts, from the commencement of a suit till its close. So much for what he might call the preliminary proceedings that had been adopted for the furtherance of legal reform. He purposed, at a future period, to present to the legislature the views and opinions of the commissioners—the results of the enquiries of those intelligent, disinterested, and dispassionate men, on the subject of the superior courts—of the laws of real property—and of the practice and proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts. The immediate object of the bill which he was then about to ask leave to introduce was, to facilitate the future promotion of legal improvement—to lay the groundwork of reform in the practice and proceedings of our courts. Its principle would be to regulate the appropriation of fees now received by individuals holding patent offices for life, or a specific term of years. His experience of legal reforms had satisfied him that the existence of patent offices formed one of the greatest obstacles to improvements in the law. It therefore became absolutely necessary to look at the whole question, and devise a measure by means of which the establishment of vested interests in courts of justice should be brought to an end. In almost every attempt to introduce partial reforms in the law, we were met by vested interests, which impeded our operations. The usual course in such cases was to provide the means of compensation for the holders of patent offices; having enacted the abolition of their fees, we ascertained their value, and gave the parties a claim on the consolidated fund for their amount. But it frequently happened that the effect of taking away the fees of one officer in a court was directly and materially to increase the fees receivable by another officer; and when, at a subsequent period, we came to deal with the interests of the second officer, a claim was raised for compensation, not only to the amount of the original value of the office, but to the extent of the increased profits which he had derived in consequence of a previous reform. He feared that this had been the case more particularly in Ireland, in consequence of the adoption of partial measures of reform. The public had thus been exposed to considerable inconvenience and great pecuniary loss. He was therefore for looking all at once at the whole question of vested interests, with a view to provide a mode by which, without any act of individual injustice, officers should in future hold all legal situations of a subordinate nature in dependence upon those by whom they were appointed, so as to enable parliament to proceed to legal reforms and alterations, without giving to individuals who might be affected by them a claim to compensation. The immediate object of the bill he meant to introduce would be to provide, in the first instance, that no officer who should be appointed after an early day, to be named, should have any claim to compensation, on the ground of proceedings in parliament to alter or amend the practice in courts of justice. As for existing vested interests, he proposed to provide for them in the following manner. He proposed, that commissioners (say those already appointed, in order to save expense) should be empowered to institute enquiries to enable them to ascertain what had been the amount of fees received in a given number of years by the several patent officers in courts of justice, and by those possessed of vested interests in legal offices, either for life or a term of years. He would confine the enquiry to the amount of legal fees (without committing himself to matters of detail) which had been received for the last ten years, believing that to be the fairest period upon which to take an average: for if we took a shorter period—say one of seven years—the increase which took place in some species of fees in 1825, in consequence of changes then made, would swell the average beyond what it ought to be. Having ascertained the amount of legal fees accruing to the holders of patent offices within the last ten years, he proposed, in future, to have all such fees received on the public account, and that those individuals having a vested interest in the offices from which they arose should be paid respectively according to the average of their receipts for ten years. When we came to the consideration of alterations in the practice and proceedings of our law courts, we might see whether the amount of fees now receivable might not be materially reduced in several branches of those proceedings. Still it would be open to parliament to decide whether it would be expedient, in consideration of the fees now paid, to provide a fund sufficient for the compensation of persons who possessed vested interests in offices—that would be a subject for after consideration. At present he merely proposed that the fees in question should be received on the public account, and that they should constitute a fund for the payment of the officers in the manner suggested. He saw no reason for imagining that such a fund would not be sufficient to discharge the claims of these individuals, estimated upon an average of ten years. In 1828 the number of causes tried in the superior courts considerably exceeded the average of the preceding five years, from 1823 to 1827, both inclusive; so that there was a probability of an increase rather than a decrease of fees. The question of fees once set at rest, parliament would be at liberty to deal with every question of legal reform in future according to its own merits, without being influenced by other considerations. He had brought in a bill to facilitate the recovery of small debts, by improving the mode of process in county courts, and reducing the charges upon legal proceedings for the recovery of such debts. That was a measure which he considered one of very great importance; but it became necessary to investigate the situation of certain officers, whose interests would have been injured by the operation of the bill, and he was afraid to provide a compensation for these parties, lest, by so doing, he should increase the profits of others, and so throw an impediment in the way of future reforms by affording such individuals grounds for claiming additional compensation upon another occasion. Among the measures which it appeared to him possible to adopt, without waiting for the period of full and final reform, was one which at a former period had excited much attention in the House, and in those parts of the country to be immediately affected by it—he alluded to the proposed abolition of the separate and local jurisdiction in Wales, and the assimilation of the jurisprudence of that country with the legal practice and proceedings of the English courts. He was satisfied that those gentlemen who felt most desirous of upholding the independence and dignity of Wales, would enter upon this consideration calmly and dispassionately, for the purpose of discovering whether the time had not arrived when, for the accomplishment of the great object of assimilating the legal jurisdiction of the two countries, and for the interest of Wales as well as England, the English system might safely be introduced into Wales. There were four separate and independent jurisdictions in Wales, and eight judges to administer justice, who enjoyed judicial offices, which might be held in conjunction with a seat in that House, and who were further enabled to practise as barristers in this country. It was also the custom that the Welsh judges should be attached permanently to one circuit, instead of varying the places of administering justice, as in England. He was aware that at present there was only one Welsh judge who occupied a seat in parliament, and he was also aware that it would be impossible to name any one who possessed more honourable or independent feelings than that gentleman, but at the same time he thought, generally speaking, that it would tend greatly to the maintenance of the dignity of the judicial station, if our salutary, wise, and prudent distinctions between the political and judicial character were adopted with respect to the Welsh judges. It would also be a great improvement in the jurisdiction of Wales to prevent the same judge from going permanently and invariably the same small circuit. He had the highest degree of confidence in the honour and integrity of the Welsh judges, but it was impossible for any gentleman to avoid forming local and personal connexions when he was in the habit of going the same circuit for several years: sure he was that such local and personal connexions would not be allowed by these gentlemen to act on their conduct or character unfavourably to the due administration of justice; but the House might depend upon it, that it was not enough that the administration of justice should be merely impartial—it was important to prevent the existence of any impression to the contrary—it was important to establish a conviction in the public mind that no personal motives could by possibility influence a judge in the discharge of his duty. He therefore thought that it would be of the greatest advantage to Wales, and to the general administration of justice throughout the country, that the judicial institutions of Wales should be placed upon the same footing as those of England [hear]. Heretofore there was a question whether the legal proceedings of Wales were not more economical in some respects than ours. Doubts had been entertained on the subject; and it was said that there existed in Wales a form of action more economical than existed in this country. If there were, we could have no difficulty in adopting it [hear], provided the change seemed advantageous. If there were any process, by which, following the example of Wales, we could expedite and cheapen justice, there could not be a fitter consideration than that relative to its adoption—we need not deprive Wales of any advantages which she enjoyed at present, at the same time that we conferred additional benefits upon her. The whole object of the law commissioners was to curtail every merely formal proceeding, every practice which was obsolete, antiquated, and purely technical, and not necessary to the right administration of justice. The extension of similar advantages to Wales would hardly be objected to. There was another point to which he wished to refer: on account of the present augmented state of business in the courts of common law, it was his decided opinion (adopted upon considerations wholly apart from the situation of Wales), that it was necessary to add to the number of judges in the superior courts, with a view to prevent the continuance of the present arrear of business. The commissioners proposed not to add to the number of judges who sat together in banco in each court, the present number of four appearing to afford great advantages over every other number that could be adopted; because, in a court where the majority was to decide, there could be no better majority than that of three to one. They had also considered the inconvenience which would result from multiplying the number of the judges in the same tribunal, and it was not their wish to make the number of judges five. In proposing, therefore, to add one judge, they did not intend to add to the number sitting in banco, but to make him sit as a judge by himself, who should preside over the trial of such matters as might be committed to one judge. But if, on grounds apart from the administration of justice in Wales, an addition were made to the judges, the House would be in a condition to consider whether, when a part of the judges were unoccupied, the eight Welsh judges should be retained. To retain both would be to entail a great expense upon the country, on the supposition that the increased number of judges could perform the Welsh business. These two considerations, therefore, must be combined. If it could be shown that the judges could perform the Welsh business, then, no doubt, considerations of economy were in favour of such an arrangement. The salaries of the eight Welsh judges were £9800. Looking towards the assimilation of the jurisprudence of Wales to that of England, in the last appointments to Welsh judgeships, it had been notified to the individuals nominated, that they would have no claim to compensation in the event of the legislature revising or abolishing the offices they held. By this means there would be an ultimate saving of £9800 a-year to the country, and, to Wales, an ultimate saving of the four separate judicial establishments attached to each circuit. The saving thus effected would very nearly provide for the salaries of the new judges who would be appointed, if the House should agree to the proposition which would be made on that subject. Again, in that spirit of economy in which he trusted the House would give the ministry the credit of looking at this, as well as at every other subject that came before them, they had adverted to the act by which the salaries of the judges had been raised to £5500. They had taken into their consideration the objections which had been urged against that statute, considering that it was perfectly open to public men to review and to reconsider any measure, whatever part they might have taken in it. The result of their consideration was this—that a salary of £5000 for all judges hereafter to be appointed would be quite enough to provide for the maintenance of the dignity of the office, and apportion the salary to the retiring allowance. It was the intention of his majesty's government, therefore, to bring in a bill which would fix the salaries in future at £5000 a-year. He mentioned this circumstance only for the purpose of showing that there was no unwillingness on the part of the government to assign due weight to all practicable propositions for reduction. And now, as he was upon the subject of the administration of justice, he might, perhaps, be allowed to avail himself of the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to a matter which was not immediately connected with the bill which he was then moving for leave to bring in. With the permission of the House he would state the amendments which it was proposed to make in the criminal law. This subject had now for some years occupied the attention of the House. In 1825, an Act passed, the object of which was to consolidate the laws relating to criminal offences. This act, among other things, removed many technical difficulties, regulated the expense of prosecutions, as well as rewards for the apprehension of offenders, and it regulated the proceedings in estreating recognizances. This was followed by four other Acts. The first abolished what was called "benefit of clergy," and certain other forms, and provided that a pardon under the sign-manual should have the same effect as a pardon under the great seal. The next consolidated the laws relating to burglaries, to embezzlement, and to other criminal acts against property. The third consolidated and amended the acts relating to malicious injuries to property, and regulated actions brought against the hundred. The fourth related to offences against the person. Thus considerable progress was made in the amendment of our criminal jurisprudence. By the Acts which he had introduced, he had the satisfaction of stating, that no less than two hundred and seventy-eight acts had been repealed, and that all the provisions of these two hundred and seventy-eight acts worth retaining had been included in eight acts. He thought he might say, that, practically, no inconvenience had resulted from the repeal of these two hundred and seventy-eight acts, and the substitution of the eight in their place. In the present session he hoped, with the assistance of his right hon. friend the master of the mint, to introduce a bill which would consolidate and amend the laws relating to the coin of the realm, in which it was his intention to propose the removal of the penalties of high treason from the offence of coining. He should also introduce a bill consolidating and amending the laws relative to the office of justice of the peace; and a bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to forgery. If these bills should meet with the approbation of the legislature, and pass into laws, he thought that he should not be overrating the progress that had been made in the amendment of our jurisprudence, when he said that nine-tenths of the cases which came before the courts would have been brought within the laws consolidated since 1825. There was only one other subject to which he was anxious to call the attention of the House. It related to another part of the kingdom. The House would recollect that, in the last session of parliament, a measure was proposed which had for its object to increase the salaries of the Scotch judges. At that time it was impossible not to perceive that it was the general wish of the House that the consideration of the subject should be postponed. There appeared to be an impression that other measures relative to the jurisprudence of Scotland were called for; that such measures ought to be speedily brought forward, and that they should be disposed of before any steps were taken to increase the salaries of the judges in Scotland. Since the period at which that debate had taken place, much of the time and attention of the government had been devoted to a general review of the Scotch jurisprudence; and he trusted that he—or, he should rather say, his learned friend, the lord advocate—would be able, in the present session, to propose measures which would materially improve the administration of justice in that country. It was their opinion, an opinion which had met with the concurrence of the highest legal authorities, that the time was now arrived at which the jury courts should be abolished, and trial by jury, in civil cases, transferred to the court of session. In proposing the transfer of jury trials to the court of session, the object was to facilitate the adoption, and to secure the maintenance of trial by jury. The time must come at which trial by jury must be ingrafted on the administration of justice in Scotland, and, in their opinion, the present was the best time. The jury system had been tried now for fifteen years in that country, under the chief commissioner of the jury court, and, so far as he could form an opinion on the subject, he thought that great advantages had resulted to Scotland from that mode of trial. On the abolition of the jury court, the present chief commissioner would be entitled to a large proportion of his salary, as a retiring pension; and they proposed, therefore, to retain his services, by transferring him to the court of session, to give his assistance in civil trials. The next alteration they proposed to make was, to abolish the separate jurisdiction of the admiralty court in Scotland. They proposed to transfer to the court of session all the civil part, and to the justiciary court all the criminal part of the jurisdiction at present exercised by the admiralty court. They thought that the sheriffs might perform all the duties of the admiralty court, and that by these arrangements no inconvenience could possibly result from the abolition of this court. They also proposed to alter the consistorial court. The proposition was, to reduce the number of judges in that court from four to one, and to send the original jurisdiction, now exercised by that court in cases of legitimacy, marriage, and divorce, to the court of session. By these alterations in the admiralty court and the consistorial court, it would be seen that the business of the court of session must be considerably increased. In the court of exchequer, two alterations would be proposed. They should propose that the number of barons in that court be reduced by two. They thought it in the highest degree desirable to retain that court, not only in conformity with the articles of the union, but in consequence of its acknowledged utility; but at the same time, they were of opinion that two judges, instead of four, would be quite sufficient to transact the business of the court. From these reductions it would be seen, that ultimately a very considerable saving would be effected, and yet he hoped that the reductions would not stop at this point. Notwithstanding the vast increase of business which would be thrown upon the court of session, in consequence of these alterations, he hoped—but he would not pledge himself on this point—he hoped that they should be able to effect a reduction in the number of the judges of this court. He hoped that they should be able to reduce the number of the lords of ordinary from seven to five. He trusted, therefore, that in consequence of these reforms and reductions, the House would not oppose the proposal for an increase in the salaries of the Scotch judges, since he apprehended that the effect of the meditated alterations would be a saving to the country of many thousand pounds. He must also add, that he trusted he should be enabled to reduce the number of principal clerks in the court of session by two. He believed that he had now presented to the House in a general manner all the subjects which at a future period would be submitted to them in detail. He had purposely abstained from entering into detail on the present occasion. Avoiding all technical expressions, he had endeavoured to offer a popular view of these matters, and to give such an outline of the proposed alterations as would be intelligible to those who had not had a professional education. The time would of course come at which all the proposed measures must be discussed separately and in detail. He trusted he had said enough to show that the government had considered these subjects solely with a view of making the administration of justice equal, impartial, expeditious, and as little expensive as possible [hear]. Whatever might be our attachment to the free institutions of the country, sure he was, that there was no part of those institutions more intimately connected with the comfort and happiness of Englishmen than that which enabled individuals to protect the rights which belonged to them, and to obtain redress for the infliction of wrongs. The earnest desire of the government was to secure comfort and happiness to individuals, and prosperity to the country; and when they approached the administration of justice in the country, with the view of amending it, he thought they could not give greater evidence of the sincerity of that desire, than by making justice as cheap and as expeditious as possible. He had now only to move “for leave to bring in a bill for regulating the payment of fees to officers in the superior courts of common law.”

Having been complimented by Mr. Brougham, Mr. Ferguson, and others, Mr. Peel, in reply to Mr. Hume said, that he had avoided going into any detail as to the construction of the Scotch Courts, but referring to what fell from the hon. member for Aberdeen, he should have no objection to such returns as those for which he intended to move, but he feared that the returns of the number of hours which the Scotch judges sat in the court of session would not go far to establish the hon. member's case—that the number could be reduced to half. Their attendance in court would not show the amount of the business they had to perform. Great part of the business of the Scotch courts was done in writings; and, besides the hours of attendance, the hon. member should know how much of the time of the judges was occupied out of court in examining those written documents. Besides, it should be borne in mind that the Scotch courts had much business in law and in equity, and that many matters connected with elections were brought before them. If, therefore, the hon. member wished to see the whole extent of the business of the Scotch judges, he should alter the form of the returns for which he had expressed his intention to move. He would say a word on what fell from the hon. member for Clare, and he must say that he was glad to hear the tone of temperance and moderation with which he had adverted to this important subject. The hon. member had acquired fame and popularity by his conduct elsewhere; but he could assure him that he might acquire greater fame and greater popularity by giving his efficient aid to reform the state of the law of the country. With respect to the hon. and learned member's suggestion about special pleading, he must observe that he was not prepared to go so far. This, however, was a subject into which he would not enter, as it was one with which he was not sufficiently acquainted. However, much information on that point would be derived from the report of the commission on the common law courts. The suggestion of the hon. member as to codification, was one in which he could not go with him. It was no doubt very popular, but the hon. and learned gentleman should consider what had been the result where it had been adopted. Let him only see what had been the extent of the comments on the Code Napoleon. In short, the more concise any legal code was made, the more its interpretation was left to the discretion of the judge. Now, he had often heard it objected to English judicial administration, that too much was left to the discretion of judges; but the more we allowed general rules of law to form our code, the more we must necessarily leave to the discretion of judges, and thus the adoption of a code would be open to one of the hon. and learned member's strongest objections—that of an ex post facto law for a new case in the discretionary interpretation of the judge. There was a medium to be observed between the system, too much in practice in former times, of making a specific act for each case as it arose, which produced that mass of legislation that we were now endeavouring to consolidate, and that of making a code which would be too concise to embrace more than general principles.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

FEBRUARY 18, 1830.

The Marquis of Blandford having moved for leave to bring in a bill to restore the constitutional influence of the Commons in the Parliament of England, and Mr. Hume having seconded the motion, a debate of considerable length ensued, in the course of which,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he was unwilling to give his vote unaccompanied by a few observations, lest he should be deemed to be acting disrespectfully to the noble marquis who had brought the motion forward. But as he disapproved both of the object which the noble marquis had in view, and of the mode in which he sought to accomplish it, he should imitate the fairness of the noble marquis himself by declaring that he should give his most decided opposition to this bill in its very first stage. He certainly did not expect to have had a general discussion that evening on the question of reform; and he thought that the desultory speech of the hon. member for Westminster was a sufficient proof that it was not convenient to have such a subject thus irregularly discussed. The bill had a most extraordinary title; it professed to be a bill, not for preventing but for regulating abuses in the elections of members to serve in Parliament. The House then was called on, not to put down but to regulate and preserve abuses by the noble marquis's bill. The speech made in support of it by the hon. member for Westminster was particularly open to the objection that there was in it "eloquentiæ satis, sapientiæ parum," [a laugh]; for though there was in it of declamation much, of argument there was less than he had ever heard in any former speech of the hon. baronet. If he had stepped into the House accidentally, and without knowing the subject of the debate, he should have supposed the hon. baronet to have been delivering an eloquent speech, not in favour of, but in opposition to a reform in Parliament. The hon. baronet admitted, though the House was improperly constituted, that it contained men of the greatest talent in the country—individuals whose respectability in private life could not be questioned—members who, to use the hon. baronet's own phrase, were addicted to all the qualities which were calculated to raise the character of the country, and who were equal to any others in any part of Europe. It was an important admission, coming from the hon. baronet, that the present system of representation assembled men of eminence, talent, and private virtue, [Sir F. Burdett nodded assent,] actuated by the purest views; [Sir F. Burdett, "No, no;"] and what rendered this admission the more extraordinary was, that the hon. baronet concluded it by contending that the mode in which these eminent, and able, and virtuous men were sent here, vitiated all their good qualities, and rendered them noxious and dangerous! When the hon. baronet entered into a history of the constitution of the House, his arguments were all in favour of the small boroughs. The hon. baronet was one of those individuals who would go down to posterity as one of the most distinguished men of his day: and yet he had told them, "When I was first returned to this House, I was returned for a small borough, owing no obligation to the party who returned me;" and he had then proceeded to contrast his election for that small borough with his election for a populous county. He said, "I was a candidate for the representation of a large county. I carried my election at a large expense; and yet," he added, twice over, "for the honour of representing that county I would not give twopence." Under such circumstances, seeing that the hon. baronet valued his election for a small borough more than he did his election for a populous county—seeing that Mr. Pitt, whose talents the hon. baronet admitted to have been sufficient to render him, if he had been properly disposed, the saviour of his country, had first entered Parliament for Appleby, and that many other eminent men had made their first Parliamentary début in a similar manner—seeing that Mr. Fox, when excluded from the representation of a large town, found refuge in a small borough—he thought that the hon. baronet and the House ought to weigh well the practical good effected by the existence of these small boroughs before they involved them all in one sweeping condemnation. As to the motion of the noble marquis, he was quite certain that the House would never agree to it. The noble marquis moved that the House should devolve on a committee of twenty-one members, chosen by ballot, the power of destroying all the boroughs which that committee should suppose were incapacitated by corruption, or otherwise, from sending members to Parliament. He would never be a party to that wholesale depreciation of the elective franchise; and he would never give his assent even to the first stage of a bill which conferred such power upon any committee. A committee so constituted might inflict great wrong and injustice. It might be a ministerial, it might be an opposition committee—but be it what it might, he would never consent to allow any committee to report to any Secretary of State, that a borough had forfeited its privilege, and to order him to give notice in the gazette, that such a borough had forfeited its share in the representation. Next he objected to the noble marquis's plan for paying members of parliament. They had that night been occupied in discussing the propriety of reform; and yet the bill which was to effect that reform contained a proposition, enabling them to appropriate to themselves £250,000 annually—a very modest proposal, and one well calculated to recommend the House to public confidence! The noble marquis was for allowing two guineas a-day to every borough, and four guineas a-day to every county member; thus showing that he estimated a county member at double the value of a borough member. Now, taking three guineas as the average sum paid to each member, supposing the House to sit six days in every week, and the session to last for twenty-five weeks, the sum annually paid to six hundred and fifty-eight members would amount to a little more than £250,000 ["hear," and laughter.] On these grounds, and thanking the noble lord for the manly and straightforward manner in which he declined proposing the appointment of a committee for the purpose of catching a few stray votes—thanking him for having openly declared his plan of reform—he would state, with equal fairness and equal sincerity, that it was his intention to take the sense of the House on the motion, and that he was opposed to bringing in the bill.

Lord Althorp moved, “That all the words after the word ‘that’ be omitted, in order to insert the following:—‘It is the opinion of this House that a reform in the representation of the people is necessary.’”

The House then divided on the question “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question,” when the numbers were—for retaining the words, 160; for omitting them to make room for the amendment, 57; majority, 103. The original motion was then negatived.

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCES.

FEBRUARY 19, 1830.

Mr. Stanley called the attention of the House, and of the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department, to a petition from an individual very peculiarly circumstanced. The particulars of the case are shown in Mr. Secretary Peel's reply.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that he believed the hon. member had correctly stated all the facts of the case, as far as the petitioner was concerned. The petitioner, whose name was Wild, was capitally convicted in the year 1824, under Lord Ellenborough's Act, of stabbing his uncle, in whose employment he was. He (Mr. Peel) would purposely abstain from detailing the evidence on which the petitioner had been convicted, in order that he might not create a prejudice against him. Sentence of death having been recorded against the prisoner, the judge before whom he was tried afterwards entertained some doubt whether he were sane at the time of the commission of the offence. That judge, as the hon. gentleman had stated, was Mr. Justice Bailey, whose complete knowledge of the law, and whose great humanity in the administration of it, every one must acknowledge [hear, hear]. Under the influence of the doubt which he had described, Mr. Justice Bailey determined not to leave the petitioner for execution, but commuted the punishment to imprisonment for life with hard labour. The hon. member said that was illegal. He (Mr. Peel) did not think that its perfect legality could be questioned. He entertained this conviction, because he had received eight or ten letters on the subject from Mr. Justice Bailey himself; and he was sure that if the learned judge had entertained any doubt of the legality of his proceeding, he would have conferred with the other judges on the subject, and would have communicated the result of that conference. Capital sentence having been passed upon the petitioner, he (Mr. Peel) could not understand why to commute that punishment for imprisonment for life was illegal. He had submitted the case to the law-officers of the Crown; and they entertained no doubt of the legality of the commutation of the punishment of death for any punishment of less severity. In treating of the general doctrine of pardons, it was observed by Blackstone, “A pardon may also be conditional; that is, the King may extend his mercy upon what terms he pleases; and may annex to his bounty a condition either precedent or subsequent, on the performance whereof the validity of the pardon will depend; and this by the common law.” He believed, therefore, that the sentence was a perfectly legal one. He had referred the whole of the facts to the hon. and learned gentleman who was then the attorney-general and his learned colleague, and they never had a doubt as to the legality of the proceeding. But they stated, that after a judge had commuted a punishment, it was not in the power of a Secretary of State to make a further commutation. The hard labour, however, had been remitted. A word on general cases of this kind.—No situation could be more painful than that of a man acquitted of a crime on the ground of his insanity; and the present was a case similar in its character. If so acquitted, he still became a prisoner for life. He regretted to say, that many unhappy persons were in that condition. Now, a man might be acquitted of murder, or some other capital offence, on the ground of his being insane at the time, and might be imprisoned in consequence; but he might afterwards become perfectly sane, and apply for his discharge. The Secretary of State had then a very painful duty to perform; a duty which required the exercise of much caution. He remembered the case of a woman tried for arson, and acquitted on the ground of insanity, who was released from confinement by his predecessor in office, on its appearing that she had become perfectly sane. The first thing, however, that she did after her liberation, was to return to the place where she had committed the offence for which she had been tried, and in the most extraordinary and deliberate manner again set fire to the same premises. Another, who had been acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity, and afterwards liberated when it was presumed that he had become sane, had been detected in a contrivance to murder three persons. A person in confinement might appear perfectly in the possession of his senses; but when he returned into the world, and was exposed to all the irritation resulting from mixing in society, his insanity might return, as frequently happened. In his description of his own case, the petitioner stated that he had formerly been wounded in the head, and that when he took a little liquor he did not know what he was doing. Some caution was necessary before such a person was again let loose upon society. He (Mr. Peel) had applied to the prosecutor for his consent to the liberation of the prisoner; but the answer was, that he had a wife and nine children, and that he should not consider his life safe if the prisoner were released. He (Mr. Peel) would most willingly have commuted the imprisonment for transportation for life, had such a commutation been legal, but having consulted the law officers on the subject, they decided that he had no authority to do so. He had intimated to the prisoner, that although he could not commute his sentence, yet that if he could obtain ample security that the prisoner would immediately embark for New South Wales, and would remain there, he would consent to such an arrangement. No man, he added, was in any danger from the prisoner, except an individual against whom he entertained some particular feelings of revenge. The House, he trusted, would pause before they asked for papers in a matter so exclusively belonging to the prerogatives of the Crown.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

FEBRUARY 22, 1830.

In a committee of supply Sir H. Hardinge moved, "That a sum of £3,015,333 2s. 7d. be granted to his majesty for defraying the charge of the land forces at home and abroad (excepting the regiments employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company), from the 25th of December, 1829, to the 24th of December, 1830."

Colonel Davies entered his protest against the extravagant character of the estimates.

In the debate which followed, Mr. Hume spoke at considerable length, and concluded with moving as an amendment, to substitute the sum of £2,550,000, for the sum of £3,015,000.

On the amendment being put from the chair,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he had no doubt but his right hon. friend the secretary at war, would be enabled to give the committee a satisfactory explanation with respect to the details comprised in the latter part of the speech which had just been delivered by the hon. member for Montrose. But in the preceding part of that speech the hon. member had indulged in some observations of a very different nature, which he could not listen to without emotion and astonishment, as they were of a character such as had been never before uttered, within his recollection, in that independent and honourable assembly. When he heard the extraordinary language employed by the hon. gentleman, he could not help thinking that the speaker stood before them in the uneasy character of a disappointed prophet, who desired some compensation for his inconsiderate declaration that he expected no reduction whatever from the present ministry. He had found, however, that the prodigal ministry, so vituperated, had made reductions to such a considerable amount, as to cover him with confusion at the discovery, and he sought to regain his usual complacency in the manner which they had that night witnessed. In this awkward attempt to conceal the failure of his prognostics, he had, however, expressed himself in terms which the hon. member, he felt assured, would in cooler moments regret. As to the estimates, against which he now directed such a vehement opposition, he ought surely to call to mind that they were lower than in the year 1804, and might have had the candour to acknowledge the subsequent reductions. Indeed, comparing the whole amount of the present estimates, including extraordinary and all the other items of expenditure, he had himself no hesitation in pronouncing these to be less than those of 1794. But, said the hon. gentleman, why not reduce the estimates to the state in which they stood in 1822? This triumphant question could be readily answered, by stating for the information of the querist, that the estimates then under consideration were lower than the estimates of 1822 by at least £150,000 [cheers and laughter]. The hon. gentleman admitted that he had been absent, forsooth, at the commencement of the debate, as he supposed that the House would have been occupied by the discussion of another motion which stood amongst the notices for that day, and which, it was understood, would have taken precedence. But wherefore had the hon. gentleman advisedly absented himself on such an occasion, aware, as he must necessarily have been, that the motion referred to was no less condemnatory of ministers than his own? [hear.] What could have been his reason for an absence so inopportune, if he really believed the ministers in truth guilty of the unthriftiness or profligacy which their opponents had imputed to them? Did he mean to waive the arguments of both sides, and betake himself to his post at the fug end of the debate, only for the deliberate purpose of voting the condemnation of his majesty's advisers, without hearing a syllable of their defence? [hear, hear.] Such a course of conduct, he submitted, was scarcely accordant with candour and fair dealing. But the hon. gentleman did not stop here, for he took upon him to impute corrupt motives—and that, too, in no very niggardly terms—to the majority who had voted in support of government on Friday [hear]. This invidious and most unjustifiable assumption he deprecated as equally unbecoming and untrue. Many gentlemen who voted with ministers on the division alluded to, were generally adverse to government, as every individual who heard him well knew; and such gentlemen, although they had the misfortune to differ from the hon. member for Montrose, were in all respects as conscientious, and upright, and independent, as himself [hear, hear]. It was assuredly too much for any member of that House, not only to censure and condemn the conduct of others, but to asperse them individually, to charge them with corrupt interested motives, to describe them as actuated by unworthy personal views of aggrandizement, when there in the open exercise of a public duty [hear, hear]. He, it appears, would propose a reduction in the army of ten thousand men, and so compute it at seventy-six thousand instead of eighty-one thousand, whilst others would leave it at eighty-one thousand. Now it was rather hard that for such a difference of opinion imputations of so foul a character should be cast on the motives of those who, in common with the hon. member, availed themselves of the privilege of judging for themselves. Those votes, he contended, were as honestly given as any which had ever emanated from opposition, being influenced neither by a desire that relatives should continue in the receipt of public pay, nor by any other personal interest whatever. Such was the uncourteous conduct of the hon. gentleman to the members of the House of Commons, and it were well if he had been content with depreciating and vilifying his opponents within doors. But a part of his speech, he lamented to perceive, was addressed to another class of the community, and evidently uttered in a spirit little calculated to elevate the speaker in the opinion of the rational and dispassionate. The hon. gentleman had made an appeal, intended to operate without the doors of that House; he had actually made an appeal to the physical strength of the country, under circumstances which should have induced him to suppose that it might not fall entirely ineffectual from his lips; under circumstances, moreover, which reflected the deepest discredit on the source from whence those perilous counsels had originated [hear, hear]. Was it, he fearlessly asked, the part of a wise or a humane man to play with such instruments? [hear]. How could that hon. member reconcile to his conscience this endeavour to incite a population which he described as in distress, and even starving, to rebellion; for his inflammatory language amounted to nothing short of that deplorable extreme? It was truly bold advice which had flowed freely from the hon. gentleman, but how had he put it? Was he himself willing to encounter the dangers which he was so forward to excite;—did he intend to participate in the storm which he so valiantly invoked? No: far from it. His exhortation was conducted in a very different tone, and might rather be paraphrased in such language as the following:—"I, who instigate you to rebellion—I, who invite you to take up arms, am myself safe from the penalties of treason, and not even the attorney-general can lay hold on me, sheltered as I stand behind the shield of my privileges" [cheers]. Such, it must be acknowledged, was not the language of the hon. baronet who represented Westminster. That gentleman—be his counsel what it might—had the manliness to take upon himself the entire responsibility, and abandon the screen of parliamentary privilege, by stating that he would abide by his opinions within doors or without, and publish what he had said, avowing himself the author [hear, hear]. This was at least frank, candid, and straightforward; but the hon. member for Montrose was content to wrap himself round with his privilege as a member of parliament, most unfeignedly disclaiming participation in such chivalry. Ministers, the committee might be assured, deeply lamented the distresses of the people, and sympathised in their sufferings—sympathised with them the more on account of their moderation and forbearance under the pressure of calamity: but what was the counsel of the member for Montrose? Don't be moderate, don't be temperate,—have recourse to arms! But will the hon. gentleman assert himself the champion of those whom he thus addresses—will he put himself at their head? Oh no! he will stand upon his privilege, but adds that he will be glad to hear of their resistance [cheers]. Those, he confessed, were not the exact words employed by the hon. member, but he had expressed himself to exactly the same effect in substance.

Mr. Hume, interrupting the right hon. secretary, disavowed the inference which the right hon. gentleman drew from his remarks, but he repeated that he was not inclined to retract a syllable of what he had said.

Mr. Peel professed himself unable to understand what the hon. member had intended to convey, if his interpretation were erroneous. He had certainly stated "that when ministers, as in the late instance, were capable of procuring a corrupt majority, no other resource remained for the people except an appeal to arms." Language such as this was, in his opinion, open to no inference but one. But if that address to the passions of a suffering people should be answered by their raising the standard of rebellion, what alternative, he demanded, would remain for government but that of meeting it with prompt, powerful, and successful resistance? In that event, he apprehended, the hon. member could hardly reconcile to his own conscience his declaration from his place in Parliament, that he should rejoice to hear of such resistance [hear hear]. In the present excited state of his feelings he found himself quite unable to enter into the details of the subject before the Committee, and would accordingly leave that task to his right hon. friend. But he could not conclude without expressing his belief that the hon. gentleman would find little support in his inflammatory appeal to the people, who, he was sure, even under their present adverse circumstances, were too generally conscious of the advantages derived from the Government and Constitution to listen for a moment to those dangerous and intemperate suggestions. Nevertheless, if any portion of the population, however inconsiderable, should prove so infatuated and misguided as to hearken to that pernicious counsellor, and undertake a hopeless, a ruinous, and he would add, a wicked resistance, he could not envy the responsibility of him who had excited it [hear].

Colonel Davies said, he had always heard that a total loss of temper indicated a consciousness of a defective cause, and he could not refrain from applying the observation to the right hon. gentleman, who had made such an unwarrantable attack upon him; for he understood that he also was included in the animadversions directed against the hon. member behind him. In justification of what he before said, he could only repeat that he had argued as the people of England would argue, when they heard of the majority who had opposed themselves to any enquiry into the present distressed state of the country.

Mr. Peel disclaimed having made the slightest allusion to the speech of the gallant officer, as he was not present on the occasion referred to, and might not have remembered it even if he had been [laughter].

In reply to a further speech by Mr. Hume,—

Mr. Peel said, that he had before felt satisfied that the hon. member would, in his cooler and more candid moments, disavow or explain what fell from him. The event had shown that he had not made a false estimate of the hon. gentleman's right feeling. He did not discuss the question of responsibility; he did not put any case hypothetically, but he thought he heard the hon. gentleman say, that the vote of Friday night was one which justified an appeal to physical force. It appeared that the hon. gentleman's meaning was different. He begged distinctly to declare that he had never used the words coward, or rebel—he was not in the habit of using such language, and he should much regret to hear such terms applied to the hon. gentleman after his explanation of the words physical force.

The Committee then divided,—For the Amendment, 27; against it, 159; majority, 132.

The Resolution was then agreed to.

BOROUGH OF NEWARK—DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

MARCH 1, 1830.

Mr. Poulett Thompson brought up a petition from the inhabitants of the Borough of Newark, complaining of undue influence exercised by the Duke of Newcastle, as the lessee of certain Crown lands, in the election of members of Parliament for that borough. In the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that the first question the House had to decide was, should the petition be brought up? the next question was, should it be referred to a committee? The discussion had better be confined to the first question; and he should so confine it, as conforming to what he thought was the general sense of the House. His principal object in rising was, to prevent its being supposed that he supported the petition. He meant to decide the question without making it a political question. He had read the letters of the noble duke, and he saw no reason why, from the profession of the noble duke's political tenets, he should be favourably disposed towards him; but he saw no reason, at the same time, why the petition should be considered in a different light from other similar petitions, and he should go to a vote on it on the principles of common sense and reason. There were two questions involved in the petition in relation to the Crown-lands—one, whether a case had been made out to call for the interference of Parliament; and the other, if the House, after establishing the interference of the duke, should take any other step: and with respect to the Crown-lands, the case was, he thought, a complete failure. The hon. member who had said he was vehement because he represented a populous place, had admitted that he had found all the Commissioners of Woods and Forests courteous and attentive. [Mr. Hobhouse: undoubtedly he had always found them very civil.] Well, civil and attentive to the interests of the hon. member's constituents when he had occasion to call on them. The hon. member who spoke last, and represented the borough of Southwark, must know that the Crown had a considerable property in that borough, and yet it had not interfered with his election. He would say the same of Dover. If the hon. member who presented the petition, and represented that place, had found any such interference, he would, no doubt, in a parenthesis, have managed to inform the House of it. He had found no disposition to exert the influence of the Crown in his election. So much for the influence of the Crown over elections. With respect to the property which the Duke of Newcastle held under the Crown, he had received the lease in 1806, and it was to run for thirty years. At the period of granting the lease, it was not said that any larger tender than that offered by the noble duke had been made. It was not said that the Crown required less of the duke than it could obtain from other persons. When the lease was renewed, the sum was raised to £2,000. Lord Grenville was then First Lord of the Treasury, and as he was opposed to the noble duke in politics, the House might be certain that no favour was shown him, and that the lease was not renewed but at its full value. The lease was granted in 1806, and it was granted in the interest of the government. It was the duty of the commissioners to attend to that. In fact, the Crown was quite unfettered, except as to the duration of the lease, and it had been granted on the same principle as governed the granting of all similar leases. He could say also, that there were no negotiations pending for the renewal of the lease; no engagement had been entered into, and there was no implied engagement between the Crown and the Duke. His noble friend had also stated, that it was the duty of the department over which he presided to consult the interest of the Crown, and let the Crown-lands to the greatest advantage. If, for example, the ground could be built on so as to yield a larger sum than that given by the noble duke, it would be the duty of the Board to let the ground on a building lease. There would be no difficulty in such a case, he believed: but that the House of Commons should address the Crown to affix a brand and stigma on the Duke of Newcastle, to say that he is not to have the lease of these lands, was what he could not consent to. The duke was in this respect entitled to the same privileges as others, and must be left capable of taking lands from the Crown like any other person. He apprehended that the property of which the duke had a lease for thirty years could not be distinguished from his other property, and it was no breach of the privilege of that House for him to use the influence which that property gave him. It was impossible to preserve any distinction between the property leased from the Crown and other property. The duke might let it to tenants at will, or for a term of years, and might deal with that as with any other property belonging to him. There was on this ground no reason for the House of Commons to interfere. Then it was said, that seven individuals had received notice to leave their houses [Forty!—several voices called out]. No; he begged leave to say only seven. What had been proved to show that the duke made any improper use of the property held under the Crown? The petition went to pray, that, having made an improper use of this land, his lease might not be renewed. He believed that the House would not think it necessary that he should make any excuses for the privileges which were derived from property over which the Crown had no control, and which were exercised in the same way. The Duke of Newcastle had a right to use his property, whether hired from the Crown, or derived from any other source, as he liked.—The hon. member (Mr. P. Thompson) founded his argument for the interference of the House on the ground that these persons were dispossessed because they had refused to vote for their landlord; but he did not see that there was any proof of that—nor was there any proof that menace had been employed in order to make them vote for the Duke of Newcastle. The hon. gentleman had, however, assumed that there was some menace, and that they were required to vote; for if it were not so, why, he asked, were they dispossessed? Now, supposing that such was the state of the case, and that the Duke of Newcastle had used improper and unconstitutional means to procure the return of the member he fancied, was it not the duty of those who felt aggrieved by such conduct to proceed in that course which had been provided by the House for such grievances? Was it not their duty to present a petition and complain of an undue return at the election? If they had adopted that course, then the whole expense of the petition would have justly and properly devolved on the parties who had an interest in the question which the committee would be called on to decide. But what would be the consequence of the adoption of that motion brought forward by the hon. gentleman? Why, by applying to Parliament at this late period for the appointment of a select committee to enquire into the merits of the petition, the whole of the expense would be thrown on the public. If the House were prepared to maintain the inviolability of that jurisdiction on the subject of election petitions which he thought admirably qualified for the accomplishment of all the purposes it had in view, he was of opinion it should scrupulously abstain from any interference, or, at all events, that it should be well satisfied of the imperative necessity of putting these disappointed parties in possession of such a power, after so long a time had elapsed, and after they had abstained from having recourse to the measure which Parliament had provided as a remedy for such complaints [hear]. He would beg the House to observe the peculiar distinction between the two courses to which he had alluded. If the parties had appealed by the ordinary method of petition, Parliament had provided a tribunal before which the merits of that petition are tried, and the parties examined to the truth of all allegations on their oath. But then, on the other hand, he would beg them to look at the consequences of adopting the motion for a Select Committee to enquire into the merits of the Petition. The consequence would be, that they would send the facts to be enquired into before a tribunal where the evidence could not be taken on oath, and where the whole of the proceedings were likely, therefore, to be subject to great objections. If they consented to adopt such a course at the present moment, and in such a case, they at the same time would go far to supersede that peculiar jurisdiction which, in his opinion, the House ought, by every means in its power, to fortify and defend. He was not prepared, with the limited information he possessed, to say, whether the Duke of Newcastle had or had not dispossessed any of his tenants in the manner which the hon. member had been induced to state. That the duke had treated his tenants in that manner, he repeated, he was not prepared to admit or deny, although, perhaps, from the fact of there being several untenanted houses, it might be presumed that those who had occupied them were ejected by their landlord. He confessed, however, that there was a question connected with that subject which appeared to him even more important than any thing connected with the privileges of the House. The right of property in every man, whether a Peer or a Commoner, was to be held sacred. There was, he repeated, no proof of any menace being used—none that those persons were dispossessed because they refused to vote for their landlord. Seven tenants were, he believed, the whole number who had been deprived of their houses out of seventy. But passing over that, if the House were prepared to say that those who exercised on such occasions their just right of property were to be subjected to the interference of Parliament, whenever it pleased the parties to come before it, it would place itself in a situation equally embarrassing and inconvenient, and lay the foundation of a very dangerous precedent. He would say, they could not do any thing more dangerous or prejudicial than to leave it to be inferred, that a tenant who refused to vote for his landlord had a right to remain in possession of that landlord's property in defiance of his wishes. Henceforward every tenant who chose to vote against his landlord would answer when he was called on to leave that landlord's property, "Oh, you wish to make me a martyr to your party prejudices in this case. I recollect what was done in the case of the Duke of Newcastle and the people of Newark, and I shall bring you before the House of Commons." So far, therefore, from protecting a good tenant, and maintaining the purity of election, they would be giving a premium to a bad tenant to retain possession of his landlord's property, and yet control and thwart his wishes whenever it might suit his prejudice or caprice to do so. While he alluded to this matter with reference to its effects on the right of property, he begged it to be understood that he did not see any material difference in its application, between a Peer of the realm and any great landed proprietor. The hon. gentleman had referred them to a Resolution of the House; but if a tenant owed an obligation to a landlord, he was bound to repay it; and if the hon. gentleman hoped, by any means he could devise, to exclude the duty owed by the tenant to the landlord from operating in the disposal of his vote, he was confident he would be disappointed; and standing in his place in that House, he was not ashamed to avow that he hoped he would be disappointed [hear]. He thought that property, whatever might be the nature or extent of the constitutional part of the question, ought to have a due influence in the State, whether the possessor were a Peer or a Commoner; and he could not bring himself to believe that the Resolution of the hon. gentleman had alluded to was intended to exclude that species of influence. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman observed, that he was not prepared to give his vote for a committee which never could properly determine the question at issue, independent of all the objections which might be taken to its appointment. That committee never could determine either the motives of the Duke of Newcastle in ordering the ejectments, or the facts which preceded it, and therefore, upon principles of common sense and reason, and divesting the question of all private or political prejudice, he should feel himself bound to give his vote against the motion for referring the Petition to a Select Committee.

The Petition having been read, Mr. P. Thompson moved that it be referred to a Select Committee.

NAVY ESTIMATES.

MARCH 1, 1830.

In a Committee of Supply, Sir George Clerk moved, "That 29,000 men be employed for the service of the present year, including 9000 royal marines." The aggregate amount of the estimate was £5,595,000; and the aggregate saving, as compared with last year, was £282,930.

Mr. Hume moved as an amendment: "That the number of men proposed should be voted, not from the 1st of January, 1830, to the 1st of January, 1831, but from the 1st of January, 1830, to the 30th of June, 1830."

MR. SECRETARY PEEL, in reply to Mr. Maberly, said he always felt pleasure in communicating any information he could, consistently with the proper performance of his public duty as a Minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman who had just sat down wished government to make out a case for the increase in the number of men in the naval service in 1830, as compared with the number in 1817. It would be admitted that it might not be consistent with the interests of the country for Ministers to state in detail the particular reasons of a given increase in a particular year. Was it not obvious that there might exist reasons connected with our naval power, which would justify an increase in that department, and at the same time dictate silence on the subject? However, so far as his duty permitted, he would give the information required. The hon. member took the year 1817, and asked why in 1830 should our naval force amount to 29,000 men, when in 1817 it was fixed at 19,000? This question imposed upon government the task of accounting for an increase of 10,000 men. In 1830 we had 3,000 marines more than in 1817. The House had discussed the policy of keeping up an effective establishment of marines, and it appeared to be admitted that there was something so peculiar in the constitution and character of that force, that it was necessary to keep it up in its present state, if he wished to have an effective navy. The marines at present amounted to 9,000 men, of whom 4,500 were afloat, and 4,500 on shore. These divisions alternately replaced each other, and each thus became qualified for the full discharge of the peculiar duties of such a force. The 4,500 who remained at home were occupied in mixed naval and military duties; and it appeared that even those who were ashore were only two nights out of three in bed; so that their duties were not trifling. He felt the full force of observing principles of economy in time of peace as far as was consistent with the public safety; but he asked, whether we were not adopting a large and wise economy, and adding to the chances of continued peace, by keeping the naval power of the country in a good and effective state? Without saying any thing of the jealousy of other powers, and giving them full credit for peaceful intentions, he declared it to be his opinion, that the consciousness of a country's strength would be to rivals and opponents the best incentive to peace. We were called upon to adopt a decided tone in our foreign policy: how could we do so, except we were prepared to act, as well as to speak if necessary? There was a peculiar reason why, even in reference to the maintenance of peace, we should keep up our navy, and be prepared to make vigorous demonstrations if necessary. If a country were called upon suddenly to build and man ships for war, it was admitted that two years must pass (and those the most valuable and important years in a naval contest), before she would be able to defend herself with effect from a vigorous adversary, or to attack an opponent with advantage. Under the head of marines, he had accounted for an increase of 3,000 men in our naval force of the present year as compared with 1817. He might here observe, that since 1817 events had occurred in the Mediterranean which were not foreseen at that period, and which consequently were not then provided for. He would add, that our naval force must partly depend upon that of other powers; and that last summer Russia had six sail of the line, France six or seven, and England eight sail of the line in the Mediterranean. Surely our proportion was not too much for a great maritime power to maintain under such circumstances. It was not too much when it was considered that Russia had assumed a belligerent aspect towards Turkey. But government had taken the earliest opportunity of reducing its force, as far as it could consistently with the public interest and safety. In the last summer (although the government had asked for only 30,000 men for the navy) it was necessary to employ 32,000. Thus the actual reduction of men in the present estimate was not merely a reduction to 29,000 from a previous force of 30,000, but from 32,000, giving an actual reduction of 3,000 men in the department of the navy. The squadron in the Mediterranean would account for an addition of 5,300 men as compared to the force of 1817; 5,300 being employed in the Mediterranean in the summer more than at the beginning of the year. Adding this increased force of 5,300 to the 3,000 marines, he accounted for an increase of 8,300 in 1830 above the estimate of 1817. Then came the whole of the coast-blockade, which did not exist in 1817. It was perfectly true, that the coast-blockade was not to be considered as merely belonging to the navy—it was a guard against smuggling, and was prepared to perform a double service should it be required: in any exigency the men of the coast-blockade would man our ships. The coast-blockade accounted for an increase of 2,200 men; which, added to the preceding items, gave an addition of 10,500 (so accounted for) to the force of 1817. It only remained to mention the packet-service, which was, however, merely a transfer from the post-office to the admiralty. It accounted for an increase of 700 men in the navy. We had thus an increase in the present year as compared with 1817, of 11,200 men fully and satisfactorily accounted for, and government might have fairly added to the navy by that amount; but so great an increase had not been made; a reduction of 1200 men was made in some other respects, so that the total increase of 1830 upon 1817, amounted in the naval department to 10,000 men: the difference between 29,000 at the present, and 19,000 at the former period. Looking at the events of the last two years, at the station which we ought to hold as a maritime power, at the occurrences in the Mediterranean, at the dissensions in South America, which might by possibility affect our colonies, seeing the collisions between South American vessels and our own, looking at the war between Brazil and Buenos Ayres, at the fact of the new States of America not always adhering very scrupulously to the legitimate laws of warfare—of which they were partly ignorant, to which they were, perhaps, partially indifferent; looking at the nature of the warfare carried on there, considering all these things, it did seem necessary to have a strong naval force to control excesses in one quarter and observe the issue of events in another. If gentlemen were aware of the repeated complaints made at the admiralty, they would think that an increase in the navy was less to be deprecated than a decrease, which would not afford sufficient protection to our trade and commerce. All these circumstances made out a prima facie case for an increase of our naval force. He should not go further into matters of detail, as his hon. friend only proposed a vote for the number of men upon that occasion. Neither did he wish to fight a by-battle upon other matters, as had been done by hon. gentlemen opposite. When the question came on as to the office of treasurer of the navy, he should be able to show that no censure could be justly cast upon government, notwithstanding the motion of the hon. baronet the member for Cumberland. He trusted that the hon. baronet would persist in his vote of censure upon Ministers, of which he had twice given notice, in order that they might take the sense of the House upon it. It would then be seen if government deserved public reprobation for making an immediate saving of £1,000 a-year, by separating the offices of president of the Board of Trade and treasurer of the Navy, and for arranging a prospective saving by these means of £2,200, by doing away with the contingent salary of paymaster of the navy. He could not refer to the alteration without regretting the opportunity that gave rise to it. It increased the attachment and regret which he felt for his right hon. friend the late president of the Board of Trade, when he recollected that it was by his assiduous attention to the discharge of his public duties and labours that his health became unfortunately reduced to that state which rendered it impossible for him to continue longer in office. A man of his experience, activity, and talents, found himself by the labour of the two offices of president of the Board of Trade and treasurer of the Navy, such a victim to over-exertion and anxiety, arising out of his attention to the duties of them, that he was obliged to press upon his colleagues, against the will of every one of them, the necessity of his retirement. He could not conceive a more powerful proof of the necessity of separating those two offices, as government had done. Nothing could have been more easy for Ministers than to fill up the offices as before. If they had done so there would not have been one word of complaint, but they separated the offices because the joint labour was too great, and because they wished to effect a public saving. He hoped when the House came to take into consideration the hon. baronet's motion, that it would take a liberal and enlarged view of the subject, that it would recollect what had been the consequence, within the last few years, of subjecting public men to excessive labour and exertion. As a proof of the spirit of economy which actuated the government, he should mention that the comptrollership of army accounts had become vacant by death, and, instead of showing a wish to appoint any body to the office, Ministers allowed it to remain vacant, thus effecting a considerable saving for the public. He might also take this occasion to state a circumstance which reflected infinite honour upon the present lord-lieutenant of Ireland. That noble person, taking into consideration the amount of the salary of his high office (£27,000), and that it had been raised since 1797, as he assumed, in consequence of the increased price of articles of consumption and the diminished value of money, of his own accord submitted a proposition to government to reduce his allowance from £27,000 to £20,000 a-year, making a reduction of £7,000 per annum upon the salary of one office alone [hear, hear]. Under such circumstances he trusted, when the House came to dispose of the vote of censure upon government to be proposed, and which had been twice postponed, by the hon. baronet, that they would bear in mind the reductions that had been made, the whole course of policy adopted by Ministers, and above all, that they would not forget, whatever were the amount of expenditure of the present year, that government had manifested no disposition to retain any part of the expenditure connected with patronage.

In reply to Sir J. Graham,—

Mr. Peel said, he had never presumed to advise the hon. baronet on the subject of his motion. The hon. baronet twice gave notice of his intention to move a resolution condemnatory of the mode in which government had filled up the office of treasurer of the navy; and after hearing the explanation offered to night in reference to that transaction, the hon. baronet still persisted in his resolution, and pledged himself to bring the question before the House: let the hon. baronet do so. He repeated, he gave the hon. baronet no advice on the subject: he only expressed a hope that the hon. baronet would persevere in proposing a resolution "condemnatory of government." The hon. baronet appeared to draw a distinction without a difference between a "condemnatory resolution" and a "vote of censure" upon the government. For his own part he could see no difference. He had already expressed a hope that the hon. baronet would bring forward his resolution, which had certainly been twice postponed, and was now glad to hear that the hon. baronet intended to do so. In saying this he was far from attempting to dictate to him, he would not even presume to advise the hon. baronet; he only expressed a hope that the motion would be brought forward, in order to obtain the opinion of the House on the subject of the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers.

The House divided. For the Amendment, 47; against it, 148.—Majority for the original motion 101.

LATE EX OFFICIO PROSECUTIONS.

MARCH 2, 1830.

Sir Charles Wetherell, at the close of a very long speech, moved, "That there be laid before the House copies of the several informations filed ex officio by the Attorney-General against Mr. Alexander, the editor of a paper called the Morning Journal—copies of the several judgments entered against him upon the records of the above informations, and how the same were entered—an exact minute of the words in which each jury pronounced their verdict against him upon each of the above informations—exact minute of the terms in which any of the juries expressed a recommendation of him to mercy."

The attorney-general spoke at considerable length in reply; Sir Francis Burdett followed; and then,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL rose. He confessed, he said, that after the elaborate proœmium of the learned gentleman, he felt considerable surprise at the motion with which he had concluded. After the learned gentleman's three months' gestation and three hours of painful delivery, he was considering with what miraculous conception the learned member was likely to teem; and was surprised when the learned member concluded with a motion for papers, every one of which he held in his hand. He had expected some notice of a legislative proposition, or a grand constitutional assertion of principle. Notwithstanding his learned friend's offer to produce the papers required on parliamentary grounds, a justification might be made out for refusing them. It was quite natural, indeed, the learned gentleman having intimated that at a future period he might possibly found some vote of censure upon those papers with respect to the attorney-general's conduct, that his learned friend should be anxious to produce them. As the papers could be given without material inconvenience, he should not resist their production. The right hon. gentleman proceeded to contrast the conduct of Sir C. Wetherell on this occasion with that of Mr. Brownlow when proposing a resolution relative to the conduct of Lord Plunkett in filing ex officio informations after the rejection of bills of indictment by a grand jury. The hon. member for Armagh proposed a strong resolution—the learned gentleman quite the contrary. The learned gentleman appeared to suppose that there was a design entertained by government to overwhelm Mr. Alexander, because he was the representative of his party. In this conspiracy against the individual in question he had no share, for he had never even heard of the libel in which his own name was mentioned, till he was informed of the prosecution which his learned friend, no doubt upon good grounds, had instituted. The learned member supposed, because the name of the member for Newark stood first in one of the paragraphs prosecuted as libellous, that its prosecution was intended, among other things, as a significant hint to the hon. member, and as a means of heaping obloquy upon him for a supposed privy to the contents of the paragraph in which his name appeared. He denied this altogether. On the whole he was disposed to take much the same view of these libels as the hon. baronet opposite. *The hon. baronet said, he had been more abused than any other public man. Certainly the hon. baronet's political life was longer than his, but, making deductions for that, he could claim to be the hon. baronet's rival in this way. He had been chief secretary in Ireland for six years, and was pretty well abused by one party; since the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill, he had been exposed to attacks from the other, as numerous and violent as any that the hon. baronet himself could have experienced. The previous apprenticeship which he had served to attacks from the other side prepared him for attacks from this; and thus the account was balanced. Excepting the allegations against the Lord Chancellor, and the statements which purported to come from a person holding the situation of chaplain to a royal duke, he should not have felt disposed to prosecute the ordinary political calumnies relative to treachery and apostacy, to which public men were so often subjected: he spoke now for himself—such groundless charges gave him very little pain indeed. He had so much respect for the learned gentleman, and the great and powerful party with which he acted, that he regretted that the learned gentleman should appear to connect himself or his party with the libels of the Morning Journal and Mr. Alexander—that he should speak of Mr. Alexander as the organ and representative of the Tory party.

Sir C. Wetherell—I used no such expression: neither those words, nor words synonymous, nor any thing which a fair man could so construe [order].

Mr. Peel in continuation said, he would give the learned gentleman full power and opportunity of explaining, and if he said he had not used the words, he would entirely and fully believe that he did not mean to use them. But that such words fell from his mouth in the heat of debate, was certain, and he would appeal to the recollection of the learned member's friends in confirmation of the statement. The learned gentleman had said that the object of the prosecution was to beat down the powerful Protestant party with which Mr. Alexander was connected, and of which he was supposed to be the representative; and his learned friend the attorney-general, had to consider what effect might be produced by the libels in question on parties in this country and in Ireland. He would give the opponents of the Catholic Relief Bill in Parliament credit for feelings of sincere pleasure if their predictions with respect to the results of that measure should be falsified; he was sure that they would join the advocates and supporters of the bill in rejoicing at that: but studious efforts were making at the period of these libels to unsettle the public mind in Ireland with a view to retard the beneficial effects expected from the Relief Bill, and keep the Protestant mind in that country in a state of excitation by the hope that other influence was about to prevail with the Sovereign over that of his Ministers, and that the Protestant monopoly would be re-established. Whatever might be the effect of those inflammatory paragraphs in this country, they were certainly calculated to be productive of much mischief in Ireland, where parties were so much excited, and where all means of fomenting that excitement were so industriously laid hold of. In the present case the subject matter was invested with a peculiar air of authority, which rendered its probable consequences in the highest degree dangerous and pernicious. It professed to be written by a clergyman of the Church of England, who was described as the chaplain of a royal duke, and dealt the most violent personal attack on the Prime Minister of the Crown. Then it was immediately copied into all the Irish papers, and universally circulated amongst an irritated and disappointed party, where the elements of strife already but too generally existed. The hon. and learned gentleman appeared to have omitted the consideration of some circumstances connected with those prosecutions, which, nevertheless, did not deserve to be overlooked. The defendant Gutch, who had been included in them, and had been found guilty, was permitted to leave the court without any punishment whatever, in consideration of his absence from London and indisposition at the period alluded to. This lenity was exercised at the particular instance of his hon. and learned friend the attorney-general, whose proposition it was, that he should not be brought up for judgment with the others. Was this manifesting a disposition to press unduly the power with which he had been intrusted by his office? Neither personal nor party motives had actuated his conduct; nor had he taken such a step at the dictation of government, but in strict accordance with his own sense of duty, which he had invariably exercised with lenity and judgment. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman in thinking that he who controlled the excesses of the Press was, in reality, the true friend to the liberty of the Press, and that it was by resorting to such means alone that they would secure its proper influence and wholesome control over the conduct of public men. No man was more thoroughly convinced than himself that the Press exercised a salutary control over public measures and public men, but that control would not be increased by private calumny and unrestrained licentiousness. He admitted that it was most expedient in such cases to appeal to the old laws before they created new. It was so represented to government in 1819, when it sought to invest the law with greater power with a view to repress blasphemous publications. On this principle the attorney-general had acted: he had appealed to a jury, and shown that offences of this description were quite within the reach of the ordinary control of common law.

In reply to Mr. Hume, Mr. Peel said, that words were not strong enough to describe the misrepresentation into which the hon. member for Aberdeen had fallen with respect to him. So far from differing with his hon. and learned friend, the attorney-general, he entirely agreed with him; nay, he had not heard one single sentence from his hon. and learned friend in which he did not concur. In what he had said upon the point on which the hon. member for Aberdeen had so strangely mistaken him, he was speaking of himself personally, and of the abuse which had been levelled at him. He had expressly stated that his hon. and learned friend had acted upon no other than the just and proper feeling of preventing the continuance of excitement in this country and in Ireland. He entertained the same feeling, and if he had been told that a chaplain of the Duke of Cumberland had made such a political charge against a Minister, or that any other person had made such a personal charge against the Lord Chancellor, he should have been ready to suggest the institution of a prosecution. All he had contended for was, that there had been no conspiracy to ruin an individual; and he said again, that he did not know that he himself had been mixed up in the libel until the author of the libel had been prosecuted. Knowing the deliberate intention in which these libels were published, he begged to be understood as perfectly concurring in the prosecutions against the author of them.

Sir Charles Wetherell having briefly replied, Mr. Peel said, that if the hon. and learned gentleman supposed that he had intimated that the hon. and learned gentleman had any personal connexion with the Morning Journal he was mistaken.

He had said no such thing; and if he had misrepresented any part of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, he had done so unintentionally.

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE CHURCH OF IRELAND.

MARCH 4, 1830.

Sir John Newport moved a long address to his majesty on the state of the Established Church of Ireland. Mr. Spring Rice seconded the motion.

Sir Robert Inglis moved the previous question.

Lord F. L. Gower moved a counter-address by way of amendment.

After some observations by Mr. Trant,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he presumed that gentlemen who had just entered the House, and had not been present at the debate, must, from the speech of the hon. member for Dover (Mr. Trant) suppose that some formidable proposition was under consideration for the destruction of the Church of Ireland. The course of proceeding that the right hon. baronet proposed was, that the Crown should be advised to appoint a commission to examine into the state of the Church of Ireland, with reference to the union of benefices—that it should enquire into the value of each separate parish, which constituted such union, and into the proceedings adopted to sever such unions, as well as for the purpose of facilitating the appointment of a greater number of ministers of the Church of Ireland, as for the purpose of the better performing the sacred duties of the ministry. It was proposed that a commission, composed of privy councillors, should enquire into the grant of faculties, or dispensations, by which pluralities were held. A further proposition was, that the Crown should not appoint to any benefice in which there was a deficiency of a glebe-house, a church, or cathedral; and that the profits of such benefice should be appropriated to the building of such glebe-house or church, or to the repairs of such cathedral. His noble friend objected to that, and the right hon. baronet had submitted to the validity of that objection; and the whole proposal, as it now stood, was for a commission to enquire into the state of the union of benefices, and to facilitate a greater appointment of working ministers, and to prevent the holding of pluralities. Did the hon. member for Dover, professing his anxiety to maintain the interests of religion conceive that he could impose upon any man by his cry of the "Church in danger?" Did the hon. member not know—was he so totally ignorant of all that was passing around him as not to know that the Crown had already appointed a commission to enquire into the whole state of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of this country? That commission had not yet extended to Ireland. He would venture to inform the hon. member, however, that the Church of Ireland was gaining in strength by adopting moderate and well-considered reformation. For that church he professed as sincere a respect as the hon. member for Dover; and he could affirm, from his own knowledge, that for twenty-five years great efforts had been made by the clergy to improve its condition; and, at that moment, the Church of Ireland could present a ministry, speaking collectively, as devoted to the discharge of its spiritual functions as the ministry of any church or ecclesiastical establishment in any country. If the time should ever arrive when an attempt should be made to deal with the property of the church upon other principles than with the property of other establishments, then would be the time for the exertions of those who dreaded the subversion of that church. The hon. member for Oxford could not mean to push his doctrine so far as others that night had pushed it. He could not mean to say that any part of the revenue of the church, such as the stipends of curates, was beyond the reach of the law. With reference, however, to the appropriation of the revenue of the church, the question ought to be approached with the utmost delicacy, and an enlarged view ought to be taken of the effect of an unequal distribution of that revenue upon the promotion of learning and religion. When any attempts were made upon the revenue of the church, he would resist them; but he would not permit the imprudent sarcasms of the hon. member for Dover to prevent his acceding to a motion which, he believed, was not couched in the spirit of hostility to the church, and which would tend to promote its best interests.

After some farther animated discussion, Sir J. Newport withdrew his motion—Sir R. Inglis withdrew his amendment—and Lord F. L. Gower's counter-address was agreed to as follows:—"That his majesty may be pleased to appoint a commission, to proceed with as little delay as may be practicable, to enquire into the state of the several parochial benefices in the respective dioceses of Ireland, with a view to ascertain how far the same consist of separate or united parishes, or to report, in the case of unions, the authority under which such unions have been effected, and the date thereof: the annual value of the several parishes so united; the contiguity of such parishes to each other, and of the churches or chapels within the same, and the possibility or fitness of dissolving such unions at any future period. That the said commission be further directed, to examine and report how far the salaries required by law have in each case been paid to the several curates residing within the said parishes or unions. That his majesty would be graciously pleased to direct that there be laid before this House, an account of the number of faculties or dispensations which have been in each of the last ten years granted in Ireland, for the purpose of enabling ecclesiastical persons to hold more than one benefice and of the rules and regulations under which such faculties are now granted."

EAST RETFORD—VOTE BY BALLOT.

MARCH 5, 1830.

On Mr. N. Calvert's motion for the House to resolve itself into a committee on the East Retford Bill, Mr. Tennyson moved as an amendment, "That it be an instruction to the committee on the East Retford Bill, that they have power to exclude the borough of East Retford from the right of electing members to parliament, and to enable the town of Birmingham to return two members."

Mr. W. Smith seconded the amendment. In the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that on such an exhausted subject he meant to detain the House but a very few minutes. Both his right hon. friend, the secretary of state for the colonies, and his hon. and learned friend the solicitor-general, had been misunderstood. His right hon. friend never meant to say that he should now vote for the measure simply because he had voted for it before, but because the measure had been five times decided; because he had on every discussion held the same opinions, and he saw no reason to change them on the present occasion. His learned friend had not referred to the House of Peers, except in its legislative capacity. He admitted that the House of Commons was bound to form its own opinions, but his learned friend had alluded to the other House sitting in its judicial capacity, and deciding by evidence taken on oath. He did not mean to discuss the question of large towns, but the noble lord might perhaps think it right to vote for the measure, when he saw that the mover and seconder of the present motion had both voted in favour of the proposition of the noble lord. He thought some gentlemen under-rated the advantage of giving the franchise to the hundred. In looking at our history, he found the advantages of so extending the franchise proved by experience; and it had the merit of having been sanctioned by several great men. Lord Chatham, on the question of the delinquency of Shoreham, when he had held his well-known opinions in favour of Parliamentary Reform, did not scout transferring the franchise to Bramber. On the contrary, he congratulated himself that Shoreham had been separated from India, and united to England. There was an impression that Shoreham was attached to the East-India interest; and Lord Chatham, who was then a reformer, regarded the extending of the franchise to the borough as a great improvement. Mr. Pitt also, who was a reformer, on the question of the borough of Cricklade, was friendly to transferring the franchise to the hundred. Both he and Mr. Fox were of the same opinion. On the question of the borough of Aylesbury, Mr. Fox opposed the transfer to the hundred, because he thought the delinquency of the borough not proved. For himself, he must say, on like considerations, that he did not think that extending the franchise to 2,000 voters connected with the landed interest would be a trifling improvement in the case of the borough of East Retford. If they looked at the cases of Cricklade, Aylesbury, and Shoreham, they would find nowhere a purer set of voters than in those three hundreds. Although he did not think that there was any difference between the landed and commercial interest, though apparent differences might occasionally arise, he was not of opinion that the balance between those interests in that House ought to be wholly lost sight of. When the noble lord formerly proposed that a hundred franchises should be added, he did not lose sight of this balance, and he proposed that sixty of those members should represent counties, and forty the towns. Mr. Pitt, too, when he proposed to add 100 members to the representation, proposed at first that the whole number should be county members. Afterwards he modified this, and intended to give sixty members to the counties, and forty to the towns; and this was a balance which ought to be attended to. If Nottinghamshire, like Cornwall, had forty-four members, there would be less reason for retaining the two members for the hundred, and more reason for transferring the franchise to a large town. Some respect had always been paid to population in adapting our system of representation. There were forty-five members for Scotland, and one hundred for Ireland; and it was a good practical rule to attend to the amount of population. As this question had, however, been debated seven or eight times, he really could not feel himself justified in detaining the House with any further observations. All he should say was, that he did not think there were any circumstances in the situation of the House which called for any other decision than that already so often pronounced; nor was he prepared to admit that the result of the motion of the noble lord (J. Russell) was one which ought to influence his vote on that occasion. Without, therefore, meaning to imply that the giving of a vote on this question was in the slightest degree to influence the vote which he might be called on to give on any larger question, he confessed he saw such a combination of circumstances with reference to the situation of the county of Nottingham, favouring the transfer of this franchise to Bassetlaw, that he felt bound to adhere to the vote he had already given so often on the same question.

On a division, the original motion was carried by 152 against 119; majority, against Mr. Tennyson's amendment, 33. After some remarks from Mr. O'Connell the house went into a committee.

Mr. O'Connell then moved the insertion of a clause, to the effect that the election should be taken by ballot.

Mr. Peel objected to the clause, in the first instance, on the ground that it did not specify how the ballot was to be taken. In justice to his proposition, the hon. member should specify the mode in which the ballot was to be taken. This, besides, was not the proper place to propose such a general principle.

Mr. Hume and Mr. Hobhouse supported Mr. O'Connell's motion.

Mr. Peel said, that was obviously not the time for discussing so great a principle as the learned gentleman had laid down. If the hon. member for Aberdeen would look to the preamble to the Jury Bill, he would see that the mode in which the jury was to be elected by ballot was specifically detailed there. He was decidedly opposed to the principle advocated by the hon. and learned member for Clare, being sure that such a principle, if adopted, would be productive of far greater abuses, and of more hypocrisy than at present prevailed [hear]; and he doubted that it would have the least effect in preventing bribery and corruption at elections. Whenever the hon. and learned gentleman should bring forward a proposition of that kind in a more regular form, he should be prepared to meet him and to oppose it.

In reply to Sir Francis Burdett,—

Mr. Peel said, that the hon. member for Westminster had no reason to be surprised at the paucity of the arguments with which he had supported his objections to this clause, as he had declared most explicitly to the committee, that in its present crude state he did not intend to argue it. He also reminded the hon. baronet, that the present was a proposition which they could only argue upon presumptions, for experience as to its advantages or disadvantages they had none. As to the allusion which the hon. baronet had made to the system of electing jurors by ballot, it bore no analogy, and could have no reference to the system of voting by ballot at elections. Did the hon. baronet know the manner in which a jury was appointed under his bill? As he thought that the hon. baronet was ignorant of it, he would inform him that the names of the jurors were placed indiscriminately in a box, and were taken out by chance by the officer of the court. Now surely the hon. baronet did not intend to propose that the names of the candidates should be put into a box, and that the candidates whose names were most frequently taken out by chance by the electors, should be declared duly elected. Equally inapplicable to the election of members of parliament was the mode in which election committees were struck in that House. Leaving, however, those points out of discussion, as not affecting the real merits of the proposition, he would say at once that he had been always taught to believe that an Englishman felt his privileges to be more valuable, because they were exercised openly and publicly. He had often been told by the hon. baronet that public opinion was the best check upon every species of abuse; but in this case you were prohibiting the expression of public opinion, by calling upon Englishmen to exercise their functions as electors in secret. He greatly doubted whether the influence of the aristocracy would be diminished by adopting the vote by ballot, as the loud clamour for reform might be more easily bribed under such a system than under the present. He had not intended to argue this question at all, for he considered it to be too important to be discussed at eleven o'clock at night in an incidental manner. Still, as he was upon his legs he would take the opportunity of denying that the people had transferred the liberties which they had wrested from the Crown into the hands of a selfish oligarchy. The aristocracy did not deserve the opprobrium which had been cast upon it. In his opinion, the country was under great obligations to the efforts of the aristocracy in the preservation of its liberties. Nothing would be more fatal to the liberties and independence of the country than that there should not be interposed between the people and the Crown a powerful aristocracy, who, by their situation and fortune, were able to despise the menaces and reject the favours of the Crown.

The provisions of the Bill were at length agreed to in the committee.

BOMBAY JUDICATURE.

MARCH 8, 1830.

In the debate (adjourned from the 4th of March) on Mr. Stewart's motion for certain papers referring to the interference of the local government with the administration of justice in the supreme court of Bombay, in the months of August and September, 1828, or at any subsequent period,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he could not allow the present discussion to close without making a few observations. When he considered the great responsibility which devolved upon public functionaries, he had no hesitation in saying, that, when guilty of error, if it were found that they acted at the same time with upright intentions, and were actuated by conscientious feelings, he had not the slightest hesitation in saying that they were entitled to the most indulgent consideration. But if, as in the case of the governor of Bombay, it was found that the parties had acted in a manner the most discreet, prudent, and proper, he thought they had a double claim to be supported by the government; and that claim would, he thought, be recognised by the House. He wished to have it understood, that he desired, like his right hon. friend Mr. Wynne, with whom he concurred, to leave the legal question entirely out of view—they had nothing to do with the legal question. The hon. and learned member for Clare, however, had discussed the legal question; a proceeding which had been rendered altogether unnecessary by the decision of the Privy Council—a tribunal much more competent to decide such a question than was that House. The authority of that decision, he believed, would not be lightly questioned, when it was recollected that two Chief Justices, Lord Tenterden and Sir N. Tindal were present, as also Lord Wynford, and his right hon. friend, whose habits, professional and official, so fully qualified him for assisting in such a decision. He had no doubt the House would feel that it was not necessary to place the independence of Indian judges upon a lower footing than that of English judges; this was not a case affecting their independence, but a question relating to the assumption of authority unwarrantable and dangerous. For the exercise of authority beyond proper boundaries, he apprehended an action of trespass might be brought; but for the exercise of unwarrantable authority within acknowledged bounds, there lay no such remedy; and, should no adequate remedy exist, it must be the business of the legislature to devise one—in doing which it would, of course, be influenced by no considerations but the nature of the case and a due regard to its own character. With reference to the injury our authority might sustain in India by the conflict between the Courts and the Executive Authority, the House should recollect that it was impossible to suppose that the natives of India had the same respect for English courts of justice that we had. The question ought not to be argued as if the Indians had a great respect for the jargon of our laws, which we ourselves did not understand. They could have no attachment to laws administered in a foreign language, and couched in forms which even the inhabitants of this country could not comprehend, and which they regarded as contrary to their customs and religion. They did not like a court before which they were dragged from a distance, and the authority of which they did not acknowledge. The claim which the Supreme Court in India made to extend its jurisdiction created great alarm among all the natives, and even in the executive government, as being contrary to the engagements it had entered into with them. The Provincial courts had, on the contrary, merited and obtained the confidence of the natives, particularly under the government of Mr. Elphinstone. The fact was stated in the valuable work of the late Bishop Heber. Those courts are there described as acting on the principles of jurisprudence with a due regard to the prejudices of the natives, and as doing much gradually to accustom them to our laws. The conduct of the Supreme Court had a great tendency to bring these courts into disrepute, and Sir John Malcolm was bound to uphold them as well as the executive authority. Thinking that Sir John Malcolm had only done his duty, he should be ashamed of himself if he had not supported him, and if he had shrunk from the responsibility of sharing his opinions. He thought that Sir John Malcolm had done quite right in addressing the letter which had been mentioned to the judge; he could not adopt a better course, and it seemed to him (Mr. Peel) the only one that was likely to prevent a collision between the judicial and executive authorities. The letter was intended to prevent any necessity for making known to the public the difference of opinion which existed between them. He believed that the two judges, Sir Charles Chambers and Sir J. P. Grant, of whom he was disposed to speak with all that respect which was due to them, acted on as pure and conscientious motives as Sir John Malcolm. They supposed, undoubtedly, that their construction of the law was correct. With respect to the letter of his noble friend, Lord Ellenborough, a great many erroneous and unjust impressions had got abroad as to its purport and intentions. He conceded to hon. members that his noble friend could not—and he did not claim it for him—shield himself behind the privilege of a private letter. A public man had no right to give instructions in private letters, and then say they were private; but at the same time he was sure that the public service could not be carried on effectually unless public functionaries were allowed to write private letters without having the terms in which they were expressed too severely scrutinized. What he claimed for such letters was, that they should not be exposed to have their terms so severely scrutinized, nor be subjected to such fastidious criticism as public despatches, and he would only claim for the words of his noble friend's Letter some indulgence. He denied that any thing in that Letter implied an intention to destroy the independence of the judicial authority, or make it subservient to the views of the executive government. He would take the two strongest passages; the first was that in which his noble friend spoke of Mr. Seymour being knighted, and where he said that as it would not be proper to leave Mr. Dewar without that honour, he should consider how it might be done; he believed it might be conferred by patent, but perhaps it might be conferred through the governor, in such a manner as to mark the superiority of the executive government over the judicial authority. It would place the governor above the court, and mark him out as the King's representative. By this Lord Ellenborough had no intention to degrade the judges, but to make the people of India aware that the executive government was the supreme power. He objected to the motion, therefore, as implying a censure on his noble friend which he did not deserve. Nothing could tempt him to refer to the language used by Sir C. Chambers and Sir J. P. Grant, in consequence of the letter addressed to them by Sir J. Malcolm, more particularly as one of those judges was now no more. Nothing should tempt him to speak with disrespect of the dead; and he would only refer to Sir C. Chambers's charge in as far as was necessary to do justice to the living. The letter of his noble friend must be misunderstood, without a knowledge of the charges to which it in fact referred. Sir C. Chambers, in his address to the court, spoke of the extraordinary letter he had received from Sir J. Malcolm, in which the court was dictated to by persons who had no right to address it, except in the capacity of humble suitors. "A heavy responsibility," the judge said, "rested on those who, under the pretext of supporting the government and the state authority, used their power to extinguish the exercise of the King's authority, and screen their servants from the restraints of the only authority and power which was able to check that tyranny into which irresponsible power had ever a tendency to fall." Here was a distinction drawn between the King's and the East India Company's authority; and the judges assumed that they represented the King's authority, while the civil government only represented that of the Company. Then the natives were told by the judge, that this letter was a pretext to extinguish the King's authority; against such language and such proceedings he should always protest. His noble friend had stated, that the civil government was above the court, not with any view to interfere with the independence of the judges, but to show that the civil government was the depository of the King's power as well as the court; his noble friend wished to give the president the power of conferring knighthood on the judge, in order to notify to the inhabitants that he represented the King. The other passage of his noble friend's letter to which he would refer, was that which concluded with the comparison of the two elephants. He did not mean to vindicate that manner of speaking of the judges; he did not mean to vindicate the expressions of his noble friend; but he claimed for those expressions the candid consideration which was due to them, as contained in a letter not intended to be published. His noble friend, by those expressions, never intended to degrade the King's judges; his whole official conduct was a proof that he could not mean it; and if he had, he would have been guilty of a great public offence. His noble friend meant nothing whatever derogatory to the character of the judges; but his noble friend was justified in saying that he hoped Sir J. P. Grant would review his decision, and that if he should not come to a different conclusion, then he would be rendered harmless by having with him two other judges who were not likely to join with him in opinion, or be opposed to the civil government. His noble friend had not at first advised the King to recall Sir J. P. Grant, though he believed that he had assumed an authority which he was not justified in assuming; and not wishing to advise his Majesty to recall that judge, he placed two other judges with him, in whom the government could place confidence. Conceiving that the motion was intended as a censure on his noble friend, he should, on the grounds he had stated, resist the motion of the hon. gentleman.

On a division, the motion was negatived by 106 against 15; majority, 91.

EAST RETFORD.

MARCH 8, 1830.

On the bringing up of the Report on the East Retford Bill, Mr. Stewart moved the insertion of a clause to run thus:—"And be it further enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act, any Member who shall be returned to serve in Parliament for the said borough of East Retford, shall, on coming to the Table of this House to be sworn—make a declaration to this effect, 'I, A. B. do solemnly declare, that I have neither given, nor promised to give, nor intend to give, or promise hereafter, any pecuniary fee, or reward of any kind, in consideration of my election as Member for the Borough of East Retford; and I solemnly declare, to the best of my knowledge and belief, that my return has not been procured, or promoted, by the influence or interference of any Peer of Parliament.'"

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, if the same electors as before were to retain the franchise, he should be disposed to agree to the clause, but to them was now to be added

2,000 others, and it would be unfair towards these infant electors to stigmatize their birth by branding them with a suspicion of bribery. Moreover, he thought it would be wrong to make any distinction between the members of that House. They ought all to be placed on the same footing, though he did not mean to say that they ought all to make a declaration of that kind. Seeing no reason for selecting the two members for the borough of East Retford from among the 658 who composed that House, and seeing no public advantage likely to result from the introduction of the clause, he should certainly oppose the motion.

The motion was negatived without a division, and the Bill ordered to be read a third time that day week.

WELSH JUDICATURE.

MARCH 9, 1830.

The Attorney General having moved for leave to bring in a Bill for "the more effectual administration of Justice in England and in the principality of Wales," in the course of the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that the proposition of his hon. and learned friend had not been fairly treated. He had proposed to introduce a measure to alter the jurisdiction of the Welsh courts, and it might have been supposed, as the House had previously been engaged in discussing the twelve propositions of his right hon. friend, that it would, at that late hour, have thought the discussion of one topic at a time enough. The hon. member for Clare, however, was disappointed that the bill did not reform the whole practice of all our courts, and he had indulged in many remarks on that subject. He had himself, as a preliminary measure to such a reform, stated his intention to introduce a bill for putting an end to patent offices, and till that, and the question concerning fees were disposed of, the reform of the courts could not be proceeded with. Measures were in contemplation, also, for an equal distribution of business among the courts, and he did not expect that subject would have been brought under the notice of the House, when it was only called on to discuss the question of the Welsh Judicature. The House had heard also a great deal about the repugnance of the people of Wales to the measure, but he would like to ask on which of the representatives of that principality the House meant to rely? The declarations of two hon. members at least showed that the inhabitants were not universally opposed to the measure. The Welsh had no local tribunal which would be taken from them by the Bill. The judges would go into Wales at different periods of the year, as at present, and when it was said that the Welsh were devotedly attached to their local tribunals, it should be remembered, that at present a great number of causes were sent into England to be tried in order to get rid of local prejudices. It ought also to be observed, when it was said that the Welsh would lose their Equity courts, that, in fact, most of the Equity cases came already up to London to be settled. It was a curious illustration of the Equity courts of Wales, that they were chiefly of use to stay the irregular proceedings of the Courts of Law. That was not, however, the time for discussing those matters in detail, and he would not go further into them. He could, however, assure those who had expressed themselves so anxious for delay, that there was no design whatever on the part of government to force this measure on the people of Wales without giving them abundant time to consider it in all its bearings. Such a disposition, he thought, had been satisfactorily evinced already by his right hon. friend, when he gave notice of his intention so early after the commencement of the session.

The Bill was ordered to be brought in.

AFFAIRS OF PORTUGAL.

MARCH 10, 1830.

Lord Palmerston, at the close of a long speech, moved for the production of a number of papers relating to the affairs of Portugal, the nature of which will be understood from the speech which MR. SECRETARY PERL delivered in the consequent debate.

Mr. Peel said, that in rising upon this occasion, he felt it necessary to ask for more than the usual indulgent consideration of the House. He could not but regret that it had been deemed advisable by the noble lord, no doubt for good reasons, though he could not divine their nature, to submit a motion of this important description to the House, upon a day which was usually devoted to relaxation, and upon which there was a distinct arrangement and understanding among men of all parties that no public business whatever of any consequence should ever be brought forward. His own time had been so much and so incessantly occupied, in consequence of the lateness of the debates during the last two days, that he really conceived he had some claim upon the noble Lord's forbearance, and that he had some right to expect that such a motion as this should not have been brought forward upon this day, which was a sort of parliamentary dies non. He had been detained in the House, by public business, till four o'clock the preceding morning. He was afterwards obliged to devote a considerable portion of the day to the transaction of public business connected with the office over which he presided, and which could not be postponed; and he felt, therefore, that he entered under great personal disadvantages upon the discussion of this question. While his noble friend who brought forward the motion had an opportunity to select his points of attack, he had not considered it necessary to communicate previously to government, and he therefore was called upon, on the part of government, to enter upon an explanation of transactions that were spread over a wide extent of surface, which embraced a considerable period of time, and which did not particularly relate to the peculiar department over which he presided. He mentioned these circumstances, in order that the House might make due allowance, should he fail in giving satisfactory answers to all the accusations of his noble friend, though he trusted, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which he laboured, that he should be able distinctly to refute all his insinuations and charges. In doing so, however, he hoped also that allowance would be made for the peculiar situation in which he was placed, owing to his inability to refer publicly, at present, to the documents and particular facts of the case, which would furnish a complete refutation of the noble lord's charges. And here he could not avoid declaring, that in the whole course of his public life he had never found his private feelings clash so much with those public considerations from which he could not, consistently with his views of the public interest, depart, as on this occasion. If he could refer to all the papers connected with those transactions, they would furnish a most triumphant answer to the charges of his noble friend: they would afford a full explanation of the whole case, and they would show why his noble friend had selected some of those transactions for animadversion, and why he had prudently abstained from referring to others. He was confident that even without those documents, he should be able satisfactorily to vindicate the conduct of his Majesty's government, and of the course which, as a minister of the crown, he thought it most proper to advise in reference to the interests of that country, with the administration of the affairs of which he was charged. The hon. baronet, the member for Westminster, had made a speech which could easily be made, and it would be very easy for any man to make, if it were only conceded to him that he had the right to make, not only his own speech, but the speech of his opponent to which he meant to reply. It was easy to make charges against his majesty's ministers, and then call upon them to answer them, when the expressions to which they had reference were never used by them. His right hon. friend, the Paymaster of the Forces, had however sufficiently answered for himself. When, he would ask, did the hon. baronet hear from that side of the House that the country was unable to sustain the charges of a war? What gentleman upon the ministerial benches had ever said that the country ought to submit to dishonour, or to put up with degradation, or abandon its interests, from an apprehension of war, or from a consciousness that she was not in a condition to bear its expenses? But the hon. baronet had assumed this to be the language of ministers; and this assumption made, he proceeded to argue in its refutation. He conceived that of all the just causes of war, the vindication of the honour of a country was that which was most just. He could conceive few cases in which mere considerations of interest could justify a country for involving itself in war. He concurred most cordially with the doctrine of Mr. Fox, that the best vindication which a country could plead for embarking in war was, that it was necessary to the vindication of the national honour; but making a concession of all these points to the hon. baronet, he still thought that it was matter for legitimate enquiry, whether, when we were invited to enter into a war, there were any engagement, expressed or implied, made by the country; any formal or moral obligation; any consideration of interest which required it to involve itself in that war, or to hold that menacing language, which, if it were disregarded, left us no alternative but to follow it up by the commencement of war? He did not expect that either his noble friend or the hon. baronet would conceive him to be arguing the question unfairly, if, after making these admissions he proceeded to contend that it was our interest not to involve ourselves in war, except for some great and paramount consideration. He thought that his noble friend would not consider him as stating his argument unfairly, when he assumed it to be this:—that his noble friend was of opinion, first, that there were certain engagements in existence which compelled this country to pursue a different course from that which it actually had pursued. His noble friend did not state himself to be an advocate for war, but without being guilty of any unfairness, he must say that his arguments led to the conclusion that we must have war. If war were necessary, let us have it; but if it were not necessary, let us not conjure up such a phantom to deter men from following the dictates of reason. His noble friend, he repeated, did not demand that we should go to war; he was of opinion that we ought to have done something different, though he did not state what that something different should have been; he said, indeed, that we ought to have assumed a different tone in the language which we addressed to the government of Portugal, and enforced certain rights which we possessed by treaty, and which we had failed to enforce. His noble friend had likewise said, for he had taken down his words, “That we have shrunk from solemn and public engagements, that we have abandoned to exile, to beggary, to dungeons and to death, thousands of men, whom a knowledge of those engagements might justly have led to count upon our protection.” Now, if he were not much mistaken, he should be able to show, that if we had basely shrunk from our engagements, his Majesty’s present advisers were not the only persons who ought to bear the disgrace of such misconduct,—that if we had failed to enforce our claims on Don Miguel, the noble lord and his friends were equally implicated in such failure; for the period when the execution of such engagements, if such engagements there were, could have been most effectually compelled was when his noble friend himself held office under the Crown, and at that time he had never heard from his noble friend any of those remonstrances which he had made so vehemently that night. He would admit to his noble friend, that even supposing that there were no express engagements, there might be moral obligations on the country which ought to have the same force. He would, in the course of his speech, consider that question fully, and would enquire whether there were any engagements, expressed or implied, requiring our interference with the government of Portugal, or whether there were any moral obligation possessing the force of a formal contract. He must here stop to vindicate the memory of his late right hon. friend, Mr. Canning, from the imputations which had been thrown on it that night, if the assertions of the hon. baronet opposite were well founded. He must contend that the whole of Mr. Canning’s language in that House, and the whole of his written communications with foreign ministers, which were on record, contradicted the assertion, that there was any thing either in the mode in which the Portuguese charter was granted, or in the mode in which it was conveyed to Lisbon, imposing any obligation upon England to maintain it in full and undiminished integrity. If our troops were, as it was contended, sent to Portugal to interfere with the internal institutions of that country—

AFFAIRS OF PORTUGAL.

Sir F. Burdett intimated that he had not said so.

Mr. Peel understood the noble lord and the hon. baronet to have both said, that the circumstances under which the charter had been carried to Portugal excited expectations there which we were bound to realize. If that were so, how was it to be reconciled with the language held by Mr. Canning? Mr. Canning had not disapproved of Sir Charles Stuart's conduct in bringing the charter from the Brazils to Portugal; as to the granting of that charter, England could not be responsible, and he would therefore leave it out of consideration; but because Mr. Canning had not disapproved of Sir C. Stuart's conduct, his noble friend argued that expectations were raised in Portugal which we were bound in honour to fulfil. Now, that was not the view taken by Mr. Canning of the consequences which were likely to arise from the charter's having been conveyed to Lisbon by a Portuguese agent, who happened to be a British subject. The directions which Mr. Canning sent to Sir C. Stuart were, that he having left the charter at Lisbon with the parties who were commissioned to receive it, should return immediately home to prevent any such impression from being made, either upon the Portuguese people, or upon other nations. That was evident from the language of Mr. Canning's despatch to Sir W. A'Court. On the 22nd of July, 1826, he wrote thus to Sir W. A'Court: "It is the anxious wish of his Majesty's government, that nothing may have been done by Sir Charles Stuart, whether under the commission of the Emperor Don Pedro, or at the solicitation of the Portuguese authorities, which can be liable, either in Portugal, or throughout Europe, to be misconstrued as an authoritative interference in the internal concerns of Portugal. Should any thing of that sort unluckily have occurred, his Majesty's government relies confidently on your Excellency for doing away the impression which it would be calculated to create, by a discreet use of the explanations and declarations contained in my despatches to your Excellency, and in those of which I have transmitted copies for your information." Again, on the same day, Mr. Canning wrote thus to Sir C. Stuart:—"It is the desire and determination of his Majesty's government to avoid, as far as possible, the appearance of any direct interference of British agency in the establishment of the new order of things in Portugal." He did not suppose that any gentleman would contend, that because Mr. Canning enjoined Sir C. Stuart to avoid the appearance of British interference, he intended to authorize him to carry on that interference in a secret manner; by no means: Mr. Canning intended to deny the existence of any desire on the part of the British government to interfere in the establishment of the new order of things in Portugal. Mr. Canning expressly said, that he founded his approbation of the charter on the implied assent of the people of Portugal to it; and in a despatch dated the 17th of July, 1826, and addressed to Sir W. A'Court, he says—"It appears to us, upon the whole, that the best chance of a safe and tranquil issue to the present extraordinary crisis in Portugal will be to be found in an acceptance (as immediate as may be suitable with the importance of the measure) of the charter of Don Pedro, coupled as it is with his abdication of the throne. Any other course must, as it appears to us, be full of danger." But what did Mr. Canning say afterwards?—"But if, nevertheless, another course shall be pursued, we shall not be the less anxious for its peaceable and happy issue, than if it were one which we had ourselves advised." He thought that he had now satisfactorily shown that Mr. Canning had never admitted that he was responsible for the establishment of the charter in Portugal; and that the bringing of it to Lisbon by Sir C. Stuart, who, though a British subject, was a Portuguese agent, was no claim upon England to support that constitution against the wishes of the majority of the Portuguese nation. The next point which he had to notice in the speech of his noble friend referred to the protocol of Vienna. His noble friend, and after him the hon. baronet, had both argued that because the signature of a British minister was attached to that protocol, we had contracted an engagement to see that the engagements into which Don Miguel had entered were faithfully observed. As the House had been told that this motion had been made not so much with a view of obtaining any new documents, as with a view of casting a censure upon his Majesty's government, he hoped that the House would, although it was an unprecedented night for debate, listen to him with patience whilst he entered at some length on the defence of government. The circumstances under which we became parties to the protocol of Vienna were very fully explained in a despatch sent by Prince Metternich to Prince Esterhazy, the Austrian ambassador to this country, and by him communicated to this government. Hon. members would find it at page 29 of these papers. He could assure the House that no instructions had been given to Lord Cowley, the British ambassador at Vienna, to be present at the conference between Don Miguel and Prince Esterhazy, and his lordship only joined the conference at the desire of Prince Metternich. The intention of Don Pedro to constitute Don Miguel his lieutenant in Portugal was known at Vienna, and was communicated by Prince Metternich to Don Miguel. In consequence of the excitation which then unfortunately prevailed in the minds of the people of Portugal, it was thought necessary that Don Miguel should go forthwith from Vienna to that country. Prince Metternich proposed to him to go thither by way of Paris and London. To this plan Don Miguel expressed great reluctance; and this was the manner in which Prince Metternich explained the matters on which he invited the British ambassador to a conference, "Seeing ourselves thus arrested in our progress by the unexpected resistance we had met with from this young prince, I determined at once, confidentially, and in the fullest detail, to make the British ambassador (whom I had previously informed of the object and end of my conferences with the Portuguese plenipotentiaries) acquainted with all that had passed between them and me, and between his Majesty and the Infant. I afterwards invited Sir Henry Wellesley to meet those gentlemen and me, to take together into consideration the means which we could yet adopt, in order to overcome the resistance of the Infant, and in the event of our not succeeding, to concert such measures, as, with the consent of his government, from which we were quite determined not to separate ourselves in this affair, it might be necessary to adopt without delay, in order not to prolong such a dangerous state of things in Portugal." Such were the circumstances, he repeated, under which Lord Cowley had become a party to that protocol. But Lord Cowley never engaged to see that Don Miguel should perform the engagements into which he had entered towards his brother and towards his countrymen. He never gave any guarantee for the execution of those engagements. He was nothing more than a witness to their having been made; and thus he thought that there was an end to the assertion that Lord Cowley, and through him the British government were a party to the arrangements which Don Miguel formally made with his brother and with his people. His noble friend had likewise stated, that there was a protocol in London, signed by Don Miguel previously to his departure for Lisbon, and that such protocol must have been fixed on before Don Miguel's arrival here, as it was alluded to in a despatch written about the same time from Lisbon, by Sir F. Lamb. He did not feel himself at liberty to state to the House the contents of that protocol; for in arguing on official documents, of which he had determined to refuse the production, he did not think it right to describe their contents. Whenever these transactions should be brought to a final issue, that protocol should be published, and then his noble friend would see that there was no engagement, either express or implied, compelling us to prevent Don Miguel from acting as he had done. Much stress had been laid, in the course of the debate, on the appearance of the British troops in Portugal when Don Miguel first landed at Lisbon, and afterwards when he commenced his violation of the rights of his brother, and of his niece. He believed this to be the most important part of his noble friend's speech, and he knew that it was that which had created the greatest impression on the House. His noble friend had stated, that the appearance of our troops in Portugal was a direct interference in its internal affairs. "It mattered not whether it were intentional or not," he said, "but a direct interference it certainly was." It was true that the British troops were at Lisbon when Don Miguel arrived. It was true that instructions were given to our commanders to avoid interfering in the internal dissensions of Portugal, with this proviso, that in case of necessity, they were to grant protection to the members of the Royal family. "Nothing," said the hon. gentleman opposite, "could have been more easy than for us to have retained possession of the forts on the Tagus," and on that point he agreed with the hon. gentleman, that if we were right to go to war with Portugal to support the Constitution, or to control Don Miguel, the time for going to war, or for using those menaces, which, if disregarded, left no alternative but war, was when Lisbon was occupied by our forces. Could there be any question upon that point? The period during which we had 4,000 or

5,000 efficient troops in Portugal, was the period when it would have been most expedient for us to interfere; but when we omitted that opportunity, and directed our troops to withdraw entirely from Portugal, we abandoned all right of interference for the future. It was only right that he should state to the House that the British minister had withheld the order for the withdrawal of the troops, contrary to his instructions, but in conformity with what he considered the interests of his country. The British government, in the instructions which they had given him, had maintained the position laid down by Mr. Canning—that the troops were not sent to take any part in the internal dissensions of Portugal; and thus they were allowed to stay at Lisbon when Don Miguel arrived, and also when he assumed the royal signature, and usurped the throne of his brother. The British minister, from good motives, disregarded his instructions, acting therein with such perfect propriety as to receive for it the approbation of the government at home. His reason for disregarding them was his desire to ascertain whether there were any engagement binding us to correct the extraordinary conduct of Don Miguel, or whether the interest of the country required that a menacing tone, or even war, should be adopted towards him and his intrusive government. All this took place, he ought to observe, after several appearances of an intention, on the part of Don Miguel, to assume the royal authority, and to place himself upon the throne. The decree for convening the Cortes at last came out, having the royal signature, instead of the signature of the King's lieutenant attached to it. The question, whether it should interfere or not, then came regularly before the British government, and yet, though such was the question brought before it, the order that every British soldier in Portugal should be withdrawn was repeated, and, if he were not mistaken, the letter which contained that order bore the signature of William Huskisson. Thus, if the King's government had basely shrunk from the performance of its engagements, it was at the very time that it could have interfered with the greatest effect; and if it were base to shrink from the performance of such engagements, the King's present advisers were not the only persons obnoxious to that imputation. There was another circumstance, to which it was painful even to allude, but to which he undoubtedly must allude, because it formed one of the combination of circumstances which led his noble friend to suppose that we were under engagement to make Don Miguel perform his contract towards his brother and his people, and that was the oath which Don Miguel had taken before the Emperor of Austria, the King of England, and the British government, to stand faithfully by the Constitution. He admitted that such a promise was given in the most solemn, and that it had been violated in the most shameful, manner. God forbid that he should say one word in vindication of Don Miguel's conduct upon that head. He was well aware of the alliance which his noble friend was sure to form with the sympathies of all who heard him, when he had to deal with the engagements of a person upon whose character such reflections could be cast, and cast with justice. He was also well aware that his noble friend had availed himself largely of that natural sympathy which he was certain to excite when he pleaded in behalf of that young person whom we admitted to be the legitimate Queen of Portugal, and whose right Don Miguel had usurped. He (Mr. P.) was bound, as a minister, to consult the great interests committed to his charge, and to decide on the merits of the question, not by listening to appeals to his feelings, but by pursuing the dictates of reason and expediency. It was true, then, that Don Miguel had disregarded the oath which he had sworn to his brother. What were the circumstances under which that oath was disregarded,—how far the violation of it was in compliance with the prevailing feeling of Portugal,—were points into which he declined to enquire, for he was not prepared to vindicate them. He had, however, heard it whispered that the same circumstances had happened before in the same family, and they might therefore entitle him to some allowance, though he admitted that they could not palliate his oblivion of the most sacred engagements. Honourable members could not have forgotten that the Brazils had been separated from Portugal some years before in nearly the same manner as Portugal had recently been separated from the Brazils. He was afraid that it somehow or other had happened that Don Pedro had contracted towards his father engagements similar to those which Don Miguel had contracted towards Don Pedro. He was afraid that it likewise had happened that Don Pedro, relying on the support of the people, had violated his engagements towards his father as decidedly as Don Miguel had since violated them towards Don Pedro. He had some reason to believe that when Don Pedro was administering the government of the Brazils in the name of his father, he took the following oath in a letter he wrote. "John, King of Portugal:—I protest to your majesty that I never will be a perjurer. That if the people of the Brazils were mad enough to think of electing me emperor, the election should not be until I and all the Portuguese in the Brazils were cut to pieces, and that I swear all this faithfully to your majesty, writing in my own blood, this oath to be faithful to your majesty, the Portuguese nation, and the constitution." Circumstances arose shortly afterwards, which proved the value which Don Pedro set upon this oath. The prevailing feeling of the Brazils was so strong in favour of erecting the Brazils into an independent state, and of separating them from Portugal, that Don Pedro felt that he had no alternative but to yield to that feeling, and to declare himself emperor, if he wished to preserve any amicable relations with Portugal. It was true that the cases of Don Pedro and Don Miguel were not analogous; for in the case of Don Pedro there was not even the shadow of an obligation made with England; still there was enough of resemblance between them to show that Britain ought not altogether to disregard the way in which such engagements had been violated by another member of the royal family of Braganza. There was another argument of his noble friend, which might appear to possess some importance—"You repudiate," said his noble friend, "all interference now, though I have shown that all your former course has been a course of interference. I claim your adherence, not to your exception, but to your rule. You have interfered often before in the affairs of Portugal, all I ask of you is to interfere again now." Now this, he begged leave to say, was a fallacious argument. He admitted that England had often interfered with the affairs of Portugal. The relations of England to Portugal were so peculiar, that it was impossible for England not to interfere in them. We had guaranteed in repeated treaties the independence of Portugal; and that guarantee gave us a right to interfere in the management of her affairs. His noble friend had said, "You interfered at Vienna about the separation of the Brazils from Portugal, and also about the appointment of Don Miguel to be lieutenant of that kingdom: why do you not interfere for the restoration of the Charter?" He (Mr. Peel) would tell his noble friend shortly why. We interfered in the case of the Brazils, because under our mediation a negotiation had been entered into for separating the Brazils from Portugal, and for placing the crowns of the two countries on different heads. When Don Pedro, by the death of his father, united the two crowns on his own head, we were compelled, by the treaty which had been signed under our mediation, to interfere in order to compel him to make his election of the crown which he would prefer to wear. The treaty of 1825 rendered it necessary for us to call on Don Pedro to fulfil his obligations under it, and to separate Portugal and the Brazils for ever. Such interference as this might possibly be found by his noble friend in numerous cases; but where could his noble friend find any interference on our part with the internal regulations of the government of Portugal? We had been connected with Portugal for four centuries, and in that time many changes had occurred in the form of government of both countries. There were treaties formed with Portugal in the reign of Charles I., and also in the time of the commonwealth, and by those treaties we were bound to nothing more than maintain her independence against all assailants. When the Cortes met in 1822, and claimed our interference in their behalf, what was the answer given to their application by Mr. Canning? It was this—"We have undertaken to guarantee, and are ready at all hazards to guarantee, the independence of Portugal from foreign powers, but we have nothing to do with, and we decline to interfere in, its internal regulations." He therefore said, that there was no moral obligation, having the force of a formal obligation, arising from our past interference in the affairs of Portugal, which called upon us to interfere at present for the restoration of the Charter. But then came another question,—did any considerations of interest compel us to interfere otherwise than we hitherto had interfered? He really did not understand the course which his noble friend wished the government to pursue. We had taken every other alternative but war, or the menace of war. We had withdrawn our minister from Portugal some time ago, and he was still absent. The English government had, as was generally known, become the guarantee for the payment of a loan made in this country to Don Miguel. The money was sent off to Lisbon, but as soon as Don Miguel refused to take the oath of fidelity to his brother and to the charter, the British minister sent back the first instalment of the loan, which had actually reached the port of Lisbon. On the affairs of Terceira, he did not intend to speak, for it appeared that they were to form the subject of another motion. He knew not to what acts, save those which he had mentioned, England could have resorted, short of war, or the application of such menaces as, if disregarded, would render war a natural consequence. Now, was it for the interest of England, he would ask, to go to war for the purpose of compelling Don Miguel to perform his engagements, or of enforcing on a reluctant people a constitution for which they had no predilection? Under what circumstances, he would ask, was that constitution granted? The House had been told that it was the duty of England to range herself on the side of free constitutions, and against despotic governments; and that she ought, upon that principle, to throw her sword into the balance of parties which were now dividing Portugal. In plain English, the argument of the hon. baronet, and of his noble friend, when stripped of its dazzling rhetoric, was nothing more than this—"We ought to go to war for the Portuguese constitution." Now, whatever the feelings of the people of England might be at present regarding the propriety of such a war, he would venture to predict that two months would not elapse after its commencement, before the supplies for prosecuting it would be withheld. Was, then, that constitution granted with such deliberation and consideration of circumstances as ought to precede the grant of a form of government? It was true that that constitution emanated from a legitimate source. But under what circumstances? Don Pedro received intelligence of the death of Don John on the 26th of April. On the 30th of April he had an interview with Sir Charles Stuart, when mention was first made of the Portuguese constitution. Sir C. Stuart, in his despatch to the British government on the subject, said, "he produced the project of a constitution for Portugal, to the compilation of which he had devoted the greater part"—of what would the House suppose? Of his life? No; Sir Charles Stuart aided, "of a week." This was the manner in which Don Pedro had framed a constitution by which a country 2,000 or 3,000 miles from the Brazils was to be governed! Before this country resolved to go to war, in support of such a constitution, it would at least be material to ascertain how far the affections of the people of Portugal were enlisted in its favour. On the 1st of March, 1828, Sir Frederick Lamb wrote, in a despatch to the British government—"Don Miguel is constantly assailed with entreaties to make himself king. The assumption of sovereign power by Don Miguel is likely to be popular with the majority of the inhabitants of Portugal." In the course of the same month Sir F. Lamb stated, in another despatch—"No party here of any consequence attaches the least value to the charter." These facts being perfectly undeniable, he implored the House to reflect upon the consequences of forcing upon a reluctant people a constitution, however good in itself. It should not be forgotten that an effort had been made in Portugal to oppose the assumption of power by Don Miguel. The army aided that attempt, all the disciplined force of the country was in its favour, and yet the attempt signally failed. The failure of this attempt to dispossess Don Miguel of his usurped authority warranted the assumption that we should meet with no cordial support from the people of Portugal, if we entered upon a war in support of the constitution. It was said that Brazil had proposed to us to enter into a treaty, the object of which was to dispossess Don Miguel of his power and re-establish the constitution; but it was quite evident that this would be merely a nominal treaty on the part of Brazil, and that the whole burthen of the war, if it were undertaken, would fall upon us. Besides, there were good reasons for supposing that even if the government of Brazil were inclined to defray its share of the undertaking, the people of that country would not consent to such a sacrifice in favour of Portuguese interests exclusively. On the ground, therefore, that there was nothing which called upon this country, in vindication of its honour, to go to war, or to pursue any other course than that which had been pursued, on the ground that the interests of the country, apart from considerations of honour, were opposed to war, he would resist the motion, the object of which was to express an opinion in favour of another line of policy. He wished, on his own account personally, and as connected with the administration, that the papers moved for could be produced; but in the present state of our relations with Portugal, he was bound to state his opinion, that it would not be for the interest of England, it would not be for the interest of Portugal, it would not be for the interest of that party with which the sympathies of his noble friend were so justly and so honourably engaged. On these grounds he was bound to state, on his responsibility as a minister of the crown, that it would not be wise to produce the documents at the present moment. The noble Lord had stated, that the papers already produced on the subject were garbled extracts. He denied that most distinctly. He trusted that the House would not be imposed upon by whatever they might have heard with respect to the predilections of his Majesty's government for arbitrary power and despotic institutions, and of its indifference to free institutions, and to the fate of those who had been engaged in maintaining them; he hoped, he repeated, that the House would not allow itself to be led away by vague accusations, that government was insensible to the painful situation of those persons who had involved themselves in difficulties from their adherence to the free institutions of Portugal. He could state with truth that ministers were at the present moment labouring earnestly and solicitously for the protection of the interests of those unhappy persons, and he could assure the House that one of his main grounds for withholding his assent from the motion before them, was his deliberate conviction that the unreserved communication of documents would not promote their interests. An attempt had been made to raise a prejudice against the government by asserting that ministers had insisted that Don Pedro should give his daughter in marriage to Don Miguel. He could only meet that positive assertion by as positive a denial. The British government had never attempted to press the marriage upon Don Pedro since he declared his insuperable and very natural repugnance to the union. Indeed, all communications with Don Pedro on that subject had been made rather with the view of ascertaining his sentiments than any other object. After the explanation he had offered, he was sure the House would bear him out in the assertion that the British government had done nothing to disgrace the honour of England. The government professed no friendship for arbitrary power, it expressed no approbation of the course of conduct which Don Miguel had pursued. He claimed permission to share in the sympathy which was felt for those individuals who were suffering on account of their attachment to free institutions, and their adherence to the cause of Don Pedro, whom they considered their legitimate monarch; but he trusted it was possible to reconcile that feeling with obedience to the dictates of calm and sober judgment. He thought it was the true policy of England to maintain peace as long as it could be maintained consistently with honour, and not for one hour longer than it could be so maintained. In the present instance he was of opinion that the maintenance of peace was perfectly consistent with the honour and interests of England; and let the judgment of the House be what it might, he, for one, never would be a party to a vote, which would have the effect of contravening the policy which the government had hitherto pursued, and of which he believed the House would, at no remote period, have cause to repent [cheers].

Rising after Mr. Huskisson, who had spoken immediately after the right hon. Secretary, in favour of the motion,—

Mr. Peel explained, that his right hon. friend had complained that he had stated that the British army had been recalled from Portugal, whilst he (Mr. Huskisson) was Colonial Secretary, at a time when it was known that Don Miguel had violated the charter. But he had not stated that when his right hon. friend recalled the British troops Don Miguel had taken the title of King, though he had given indications of his intentions to usurp that title. The order was given on the 26th of March; and, previously to giving it, a letter had been received from Sir F. Lamb, stating that the officers of the army had been displaced, and that other steps had been taken, which were the evident precursors of more violent measures. On the 24th of March, Sir F. Lamb notified to Lord Dudley, that the Chamber of Deputies had been dissolved, without requiring that another should be convoked, which was directly contrary to the charter. It was subsequently to the former despatches received from Sir F. Lamb that the order had been used for the recall of the British troops, and he therefore inferred that his right hon. friend concurred in the policy of the British government not to interpose by force for the protection of the Portuguese constitution.

Mr. Huskisson explained. What he complained of was, that his right hon. friend quoted despatches of his which he did not produce, and he challenged his right hon. friend to produce the letter signed by him.

Mr. Peel (with warmth).—"I deny the charge, [loud cries of 'hear.'] I did not quote the letters of the right hon. gentleman. There is an end of all discussion, if I cannot refer to facts. I said that an order was given for the recall of the British troops by a Secretary of State, and that Secretary was Mr. Huskisson. I quote no letters: I relate facts."

On a division, the motion was negatived by 150 against 73; majority, 77.

THE POOR IN IRELAND.

MARCH 11, 1830.

Mr. Spring Rice, at the close of a long speech, moved for a select committee, to enquire into the state of the poorer classes in Ireland, and the best means of improving their condition.

In the course of the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said he was unwilling to permit a question relating so immediately to the domestic policy of one part of the empire, and not very remote from that of the other, to pass without a few observations from him, particularly in consideration of the public situation which he held. He was favourable to the appointment of the committee; for nothing could be more improper than to attempt to legislate upon the subject of providing for the Irish poor, without very mature preliminary enquiries, and nothing could be so unwise as to reject the proposal to legislate after such enquiries had been made. One great part of the value of the committee would depend on the mode in which the enquiry should be conducted. If the committee entered into the general condition of the Irish poor, he would not say that much valuable information would not be collected, but perfectly certain was he that no practical result would ensue. He would advise his hon. friend, who he supposed would sit as chairman of the committee, to make his report upon the few following points:—First, a clear statement to the House, and to the British public, of the existing enactments in Ireland, with reference to the provisions for the Irish poor; the extent to which the land is subject to any pecuniary levy for the purposes of providing for any classes of the poor, mutilated, diseased, or wanting subsistence; next to enquire, whether it were desirable to extend those enactments, and to describe the measures by which they were to be extended, with the machinery by which they were to operate; and lastly, the committee should report on the effect which the system of Irish Poor-laws would have upon the population of Ireland. Nothing could be more plausible and specious than the first appearance of the proposal for assimilating the two countries, or extending the English Poor-law system to Ireland. It might appear that the poor had a natural claim to relief. By poor he meant those that were unable to provide for themselves; and great injustice arose practically from the existence of Poor-laws in one place and from their absence in another. The gallant General who seconded the motion felt the inconvenience of the Poor-laws, and he wished to impose the same suffering on Ireland. He was like the fox who had lost his tail, and who wanted to persuade all other foxes that tails were an encumbrance. He would give the whole of the English system to Ireland. Many gentlemen said—Apply all the good of the English system of Poor-laws to Ireland, and without any of the evil. But even if this could be done, the question was, could they exclude the gradual growth of what was bad? There was an inevitable tendency, in any such a system, to grow into abuse; and if the poor had an acknowledged legal claim to relief, where could the limitation of that claim be fixed? If every man who could not support himself were to have an acknowledged legal claim upon the wealthy, the land of Ireland would be subject to an Agrarian law, and the present possessors of the soil would have to part with their property, and, what was more, without any material, and certainly without any permanent, diminution of the distress. If the right or claim be confined only to those who were diseased, that limitation would not be found much stricter than the other; for if a man were unable to procure employment, and especially if he had a family, the step from poverty to illness was very short. The hon. member for Armagh had said—"We won't have Poor-rates, but we will have a Labour-rate, and nothing shall be raised on the land except to provide for the employment of the poor." The hon. member, by this principle, provided no relief for distress; he excluded the decrepit, and all who could not labour. Was this "Labour-rate" to be applied in the parish in which it was raised? What would this be but a subscription from the rich, and a diminution of their means to employ the poor, and how would this increase the demand for labour? It would pro tanto diminish the means of the prosperous farmer, to be applied to a forced labour, which would not otherwise arise, or be actually necessary; the produce of which being less productive in amount, and in every respect of inferior benefit to the country than the labour the farmers would employ with that capital if it were left in their own hands, there would ultimately be less employment for the labourer, and diminished wages, than if no such Labour-rate were imposed. Before the House consented to the introduction of the Poor-laws, under the name of Labour-rate, let the House consider the practical operation of that system; and they would find in it no material distinction, either in principle or effect, from such a rate as was called the Poor-rate in England. His hon. friend, the Treasurer of the Navy, advocated the Scotch system, instead of the English. Now, what was meant by the Scotch system? for in Scotland the system in the Highlands was perfectly different from that of the Lowlands and manufacturing districts. By the law, the system in every part of Scotland should be the same; but practically this was very different. He much doubted if, according to the decisions of the Scotch courts, there was not a legal claim for relief by every one of the poor who was unemployed. He doubted if the Scotch system were legal as it existed, or if any system of taxing parishes for the support of the poor could check the ultimate evil now felt in this country. It was impossible for him to discuss absenteeism at that time, although he felt all the inconvenience of it; but he would at once reject the doctrine which considered it proper that Parliament should attempt to interfere directly with absenteeism. It might be thought plausible to impose a tax upon absenteeism; but if any man did entertain such a notion, and wished to be converted, or was open to conviction, let him read the letter of Mr. Burke to Sir Charles Bingham. In 1774, when Ireland had an independent Parliament, a tax on absentees was proposed, and a very popular and prevailing impression existed in favour of the tax; but Mr. Burke's arguments were perfectly conclusive, and they had changed the opinions of many of those who were disposed to decide in favour of the measure. But at present, when the public duties called the Irish gentry away from their country, and when so many possessed property in both parts of the United Empire, how could it be consistent with justice to impose such a tax? The question was altogether beyond the direct interference of the legislature. But the most material object to be kept in view by the Committee would be, to satisfy the people of England by its enquiries. There was, unquestionably, a great practical injustice in the working of the Poor-laws at present. Although the greatest abuses existed respecting the passage of Irish labourers into England, he must confess that he felt averse to imposing any restriction on a free passage. His hon. friend proposed imprisonment as a check, he would probably confine all the Irish labourers who came to Liverpool in that town at the expense of the corporation; but, of all checks to immigration, imprisonment would be the most useless and objectionable.

General Gascoyne: I said imprisonment and hard labour.

Mr. Peel continued: Then the passengers would never come again. But it would not be a cheap way of getting rid of Irish labourers, to build a jail and support them at the expense of the rest of the population. The best way would be to find an open market for the poor man's labour, his only commodity; and any laws to prevent the poor man from passing freely from one part of the country to another would be pregnant with injustice. As to large institutions in Ireland, to receive the poor who were unable to provide for themselves, he despaired of any effectual remedy from such a scheme. This was the worst system that could be introduced; for it was providing not only food but lodging, which ought not, he thought, to be done, except in cases of disease, or decrepitude from accident. He much doubted if the introduction of the English Poor-laws into Ireland would relieve the poor of England; for England did not suffer from Irish distress, but from the invasion of Irish labourers. The English farmer had the benefit of cheap labour, by the influx of Irish poor. The Poor-laws in Ireland would increase distress, as they would prevent the building of cottages, and have other injurious effects. They would probably banish from the country a number of persons of small fortunes, who would not like to be subject to the additional annoyance of the Poor-laws. Although he thought it a dangerous experiment to introduce the English Poor-laws into Ireland, yet the proposal ought not to be rejected without the most deliberate enquiry. The Committee, however, would only have to consider the distress which existed among the labourers; and the best means of providing them employment and relief. In that view of it he gave his cordial assent to the motion.

The motion was agreed to and a committee appointed.

THE TREASURER OF THE NAVY.

MARCH 12, 1830.

The Order of the Day having been moved, for the House to resolve into a Committee of Supply, Sir James Graham moved, pursuant to notice, by way of amendment, the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this House, the late vacancy in the office of Treasurer of the Navy afforded an opportunity to save the sum of £3,000 a year, without any violation of existing engagements, and without any detriment to the public service."

In the course of the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, before the House disposed of the proposition now submitted to its consideration, it would not be immaterial distinctly to recall to its recollection the character and principle of that proposition. It was not a motion to reduce an excessive estimate, nor to diminish an extravagant vote, but to visit those who had made this appointment with condemnation and censure. Thus a question of justice was inseparably interwoven with a matter of policy. The House was called upon to pronounce a verdict; it was sitting, not merely in its political, but in its judicial character; and, however highly excited party feelings might be he was certain there were few members who would consent to pronounce that verdict without listening to the evidence, and paying due regard to the intentions of the accused. The animus was always a very main ingredient in the estimate of criminality. Never had he been more satisfied of any thing in his life, than that if the House adopted the proposition of the hon. baronet, it would be doing an act of the most flagrant injustice. Standing in the situation he (Mr. Peel) occupied, appearing as the advocate of the accused, and addressing the House as the judges to decide the question of guilt or innocence, he felt that it would be an insult to require its forbearance and indulgence. In the year 1828, when a schism, to the circumstances of which he could never refer without regret, occurred between the members of the government, his right hon. friend Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald had been appointed President of the Board of Trade and Treasurer of the Navy. Lord Melville and his hon. friend behind him (Sir G. Cockburn) protested against that joint nomination, and they had nothing in view but the efficiency of the service, which they apprehended would then be injured: they contended that the two places should not be united in the same person; and the question was considered at the time with reference to what had passed in the year 1826, when the House had overruled the proposal of government that these offices should be disunited. Ministers, in 1828, thought it right to defer to the sense of Parliament, and Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald was therefore called upon to discharge the duties of both situations. So matters continued, until the health of Mr. Fitzgerald broke down under the weight of his united duties and anxieties, and it then was required of Ministers to consider what arrangements could be made to provide a substitute. To the abilities and aptitude for business of Mr. Fitzgerald he had borne testimony on a former occasion, and it was not necessary to repeat it now; but during the whole summer his health had suffered from his laborious attendance on Parliament, and on the duties of his office, till at length it entirely failed, and when he retired ministers did certainly think that the time had arrived when they might safely depart from what appeared to have been the intention of the House—provided, at the same time, a saving of the public money could be effected. If they had wished to make out a specious case, and not to trust to the good sense and feeling of Parliament in judging of their intentions, they might have filled up the office of Master of the Mint, with a salary of £3,000 a year—have appointed a Treasurer of the Navy, as the office still existed, and have united the situations of President of the Board of Trade and Treasurer of the Navy, with the emoluments which previously belonged to those united offices. Had that course been pursued, not a word of objection would have been uttered; and were not ministers at liberty to save the public £2,200 a year if they could, although they did not, in other respects, adhere closely to the wishes of Parliament? The argument of his right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) had been, that the wishes of Parliament had been expressed, in 1826, contrary to the views of government, and that Ministers, on the recent occasion, ought to have deferred to the Resolution of the House. No doubt, in a matter of indifference, such should have been the course; but if it were found that the health of a valuable and able public servant had yielded to the pressure of the duties of both offices, and if, by departing from that course, £1,000 a year in the first instance, and ultimately, £2,200 a year could be saved to the public, with a relinquishment, besides, of patronage, was it consistent with the principles of common justice to visit government with a vote of censure and condemnation? Ministers had thought that they might review the circumstances of the appointment, and they had decided that the best arrangement was not to make the deputy principal, but to secure to a great national establishment the services of a public man of ability, while, at the same time, his salary was reduced. The hon. Member for Montrose had asked how the Treasurer of the Navy could discharge his official duties, be present in his place in Parliament, and attend also as a Member of the Wexford Committee? He (Mr. Peel) wished to know how the same man could be Treasurer of the Navy, President of the Board of Trade, be present in his place in Parliament, and attend also on the Wexford Committee? Surely, if three were incompatible, à fortiori, four must be incompatible also, according to the very showing of the hon. gentleman. But before the House became parties to this vote of condemnation, he implored it to attend to the opinion it had expressed by its committee. From the year 1788 to the present time, various enquiries had been instituted into the office of Treasurer of the Navy, and no committee had yet ever suggested the fitness of abolishing the office. Several had complained that the duties were performed by deputy; and hence, an opinion was implied that, for the sake of the public service, it ought to be made a substantive and efficient appointment. Upon this point, he would not go farther back than the Finance Committee of 1817, of which the President of the Royal Society (Mr. D. Gilbert) had consented to act as chairman. What was the report of that committee? Before ministers filled up the post, they had referred to all the reports; and if they had erred, they had erred with authorities in their favour, which, in mere justice, would prevent Parliament from joining in a vote of censure and condemnation. The Report of the Finance Committee of 1817 was, that the salary of the Treasurer of the Navy was much too large. A deduction was therefore recommended, and it was proposed that the office and its salary should be placed upon the same footing as that of the Paymaster of the Forces. At that date, the salary was, £4,000 a year; and the committee added, that it was not for them to determine whether it should be lowered to £3,000 a year, or to any other sum. Thus it was evident, that ministers had not acted in precise concurrence with the suggestion of the committee, because they had gone beyond it, and had lowered the emolument of the office of Treasurer of the Navy below £3,000 a year. They had reduced it to £2,000 a year, and had put it precisely on the footing of the Paymaster of the Forces. If, after this recommendation, and this conduct founded upon it, Parliament were to turn round at once, and pass a vote of censure upon ministers, he must say, that reports of committees, instead of being beacons to guide, would be converted into false lights to delude. The value of reports would be at an end—“Bring me no more reports—let them fly all”—since it would be far safer for ministers to act on their own responsibility and discretion than on the recommendations of committees. In filling up the recent vacancy they had adopted the very advice of their political opponents, and they felt satisfied that it was utterly impossible for men on any side of the House to object to the arrangement. And here, he must say, although he had had some reason to be prepared for opposition from his right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson), he was, nevertheless, utterly astonished by his speech. He had referred to the Nestor of the Cabinet (Lord Bathurst), and to the example of Mr. Rose in 1807, observing, that he himself was the only man in the House who had held the united offices of President of the Board of Trade and Treasurer of the Navy: he therefore hoped that the House would confide in his authority. At present, his right hon. friend held neither office, and he might say with Macheath—for, although he now argued that another appointment ought to be added to that of Treasurer of the Navy, in his speech on the 7th of April, 1826, he contended that the duties were more important than they were generally supposed, and that they could not be properly executed by an individual who was also President of the Board of Trade. Mr. Huskisson then said:—

“How happy could I be with either”—

But in 1826, when doubly burthened, he added, like the same gallant captain, another line to his song—

“Were t’other dear charmer away;”

“He also was relieved from the necessity of saying any thing relative to what some gentlemen called an useless office,—the Treasurership of the Navy. After what had been stated by his right hon. friend near him, and by the right hon. gentleman opposite, it was scarcely necessary to add, that the business of that department had very considerably increased, as well as the importance of the duties connected with it, since the transfer to it of the management of seamen’s wills. It was quite erroneous to suppose that the business of that office was a mere matter of paying money. So far from that, the Treasurer of the Navy was called on to exercise his discretion in the instance of every demand made on him for money. He was obliged to sift the grounds of each claim, and to decide on the merits of the applicant. With so many branches of public duty to be performed, the Bank could not be expected to execute them, or to exercise any discretion on the different cases submitted to the consideration of whoever might be placed in the superintendence of that department. Whether from his not having that capacity of mind which the discharge of such duties undoubtedly required, or from whatever other cause, he confessed he did feel considerable hardship arising out of the union of the two offices of President of the Board of Trade and Treasurer of the Navy. He felt not only the difficulty attendant upon a due discharge of the duties of both, but the anxiety which proceeded from the great pecuniary responsibility which attached to one of those offices; the weight of which was, in no inconsiderable degree, augmented by the duties arising from the frequent complaints from the Navy-office, the Victualling-office, and other departments of the public service connected with it. He declared that, united as those offices were in him, he could not satisfy his mind that the duties of the Treasurership of the Navy were, so far as he was concerned, duly and adequately performed.”

“In answer to what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman, with reference to whether or not he had time enough to discharge the duties of both employments, he certainly could not reply that he had not time enough; but he could most truly declare, that to whatever cause it might be owing, he was not able to do the duties of both offices with that satisfaction to his own feelings with which he thought every public duty ought to be performed. Beyond question, the country was fully entitled to his best services, and to all his services; but so long as he remained unable to divest himself of the feelings to which he had adverted, he was convinced that it was any thing rather than a public service to continue in possession of both offices without being able adequately to discharge the duties attached to them.”

“The right hon. gentleman opposite had told the committee, that when he held that office he contrived to do other duties of a public nature. Doubtless, a man of his powers and diligence was capable of holding such an employment with advantage to the public, and also to discharge other duties of importance; but this could not be accepted as a proof that the burthensome duties at the Board of Trade were compatible with those at the Navy-office. The further consideration of this question he would now leave in the hands of the House, so far as he was personally concerned." This opinion, which his right hon. friend then gave, of the duties of the two offices, was, in his view of the matter, a correct one, and it had been confirmed by the failure of the health of Mr. Fitzgerald; and ministers were, therefore, led to believe that the plan they had recently adopted was advisable, not only on the score of public economy, but because the duties of the office could not otherwise be efficiently discharged. The Presidency of the Board of Trade had been united with the Mastership of the Mint, because the right hon. gentleman who occupied those two places was, at least, not new to either of them. It ought not to be forgotten that the proposal of 1826 was to add £2,000 a year to the public burthens, while the plan ministers had pursued saved more than that sum to the public. He did not know that he could say more on this subject, for he would not enter into the details, resting confidently upon the justice and equity of the case to produce their due impression upon the House, without any bias from party feelings or personal resentments. He would put it to all who heard him, whether the general conduct of the present government—that of the Duke of Wellington—was such as to justify a vote of censure. He was sure that the House, sitting as judges, would not only consider the wishes of the hon. mover, but the intentions and the acts of the government. The great advocate for economy (the hon. member for Montrose), to whose motives posterity would do justice, however annoying and persevering his opposition, had repeatedly acknowledged, that, comparing the present Cabinet with any that had preceded it, he thought that it had evinced a more sincere desire than any other to spare the public purse. It did not, indeed, go as far as the hon. member wished; but still he had felt bound, in justice, to admit, that it had gone a great way. The hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham) had urged that it was necessary to reduce this office, in order to lessen the number of that band of pensioners who were called upon, on every occasion, to overwhelm the sense of the independent portion of the House. The hon. baronet and the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Hobhouse) were at issue, in some sort, upon this point, as the latter had said, in a recent debate, that he preferred a bad strong government to a good weak one. It became important, therefore, to consider the present amount of government influence, compared with the better periods of our history, to which the hon. baronet had referred with such apparent satisfaction. Some time since returns were called for and laid on the Table showing the number of members of Parliament who held office, place, or pension in the first Parliament of George I.; a similar return was made for the first Parliament of George II.; and a third return of the members of Parliament who held offices at the pleasure of the Crown, or other places, in the first Parliament of George IV. In the first Parliament of George I., instead of the fifty or sixty placemen now in the House, they had 271 members of Parliament holding situations at the pleasure of the Crown. In the first Parliament of George II., there were 267 members also holding offices at the pleasure of the Crown. This was a much greater number than at present. Perhaps it would be said that those offices were so skilfully divided, that a few situations were spread over a numerous body of placemen. What, however, was the fact? So far from a few offices being made to serve a great number of holders, the skill was exercised in accumulating upon the heads of individuals a number of offices, which, by persons less adroit and able than were the dispensers of Crown patronage in those days, would have been considered utterly incompatible. At the time that there were 271 servants of the Crown, holding their situations during pleasure, sitting in that House, Mr. Craggs was, by the singular dexterity of that period, enabled to hold the offices of Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, Lord Warden of the Stannaries, Comptroller of the Household, and Governor of St. Paul's. Another member of the Parliament was Secretary of State, Secretary at War, Clerk of Deliveries to the Ordnance, and a Lord of Trade. A third member was a Secretary of State, Comptroller of the Household, a Lord of the Treasury, and Ambassador to Spain. The present number of members in that House was 658; the number at the time of which he was speaking, was 558—there then existed an Irish Parliament—and it was pretty generally acknowledged that that body possessed an adequate supply of parliamentary offices. It was quite clear, therefore, in comparing the influence of the Crown at present with those days of whig constitutional purity, that the balance was greatly in favour of the present time. The hon. baronet by whom the motion was made contended for the reduction of the influence of the Crown by the reduction of the office against which his speech was directed; but he thought it had been made pretty well manifest that the influence of the Crown was undergoing a most rapid reduction. Without dwelling further upon those topics, he should call upon the House to review the general conduct of the Duke of Wellington's government. His hon. friend near him, the Secretary to the Treasury, stated not long since, that during the summer the noble duke at the head of his Majesty's government had been occupied in effecting every possible reduction consistent with the interests of the public service; and the effect of his having so long and so assiduously directed his attention to that subject was, that from that time to the present it had not been in his power to bestow any office of sufficient value to be worth the acceptance of any person holding the rank of a gentleman. The fact was, that so limited was the number of offices now in the gift of government, that the patronage of the Crown might be considered as mortgaged for several years to come. He would ask, had the Duke of Wellington supported his government by a prostituted or lavish expenditure? On the contrary, it might, with perfect truth, be said, that, with very few exceptions indeed, he had not conferred any civil distinction since he came into office. Other governments preceding his, might have found it necessary to avail themselves of the prerogative of the Crown, even to an extent that might have been called a lavish expenditure of public honours. The Duke of Wellington had in no instance availed himself of that branch of the royal prerogative, of the exercise of which former administrations had been so lavish. Upon enquiry it would be found, that in no one case had he conferred any civil honours since his accession to office. In the days of Mr. Pitt, perhaps, a different course might have been found necessary. But he was mistaken in saying "in no one instance;" there were some few exceptions—one or two perhaps—but they were not cases in which any influence could be exercised over that House. His noble friend had, with these exceptions, never felt it necessary to recommend the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in that respect; not that he undervalued that patronage, but that he had not found it necessary for the purposes of government as it was in former administrations. The present administration looked for support to public opinion, and they felt that, relying upon that, and steadily pursuing that course which they considered most likely to deserve it, the influence of such patronage might be dispensed with. Greatly indeed should he be disappointed if the vote of that evening should convince him that they were mistaken in such reliance, and that they required such influence. The House would no doubt exercise its own discretion as to the motion before it, and if, after what the ministers had already done, it should think proper to adopt the proposition of the hon. baronet, they would bow with submission, but they would still have the satisfaction of thinking that they had not deserved the censure. He must observe, however, that if the House passed a censure on the ministers who had done most in the way of economy and retrenchment, it would hold out to their successors the folly of relying on public opinion, in lieu of that patronage which other administrations had so profusely exercised.

On a division of the House, the motion was negatived by 188 against 90; majority, 98.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

MARCH 19, 1830.

Mr. Edward D. Davenport moved (on the 16th instant) "That the Petitions complaining of distress in various classes of the community be referred to a Committee of the whole House, with a view to enquire into and report upon the causes of that distress, and the remedy thereof."

On the third night (March 19) of the debate on this subject,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he felt the full force of the observations of the honourable Mover, on the importance and extent of the enquiry; and he agreed, also, that each branch of the subject demanded the most patient investigation. Of the various topics introduced by the hon. baronet, the member for Cornwall (Sir R. Vyvyan), there was one which he (Mr. Peel) begged altogether to exclude—he meant the reference made by the hon. baronet to party considerations. He declined following him upon that point, because he was anxious to enter upon the consideration of the sufferings of the people, without that temper of mind which party questions were likely to produce. In steering his course through the crowded chart of facts and arguments adduced, he felt the want of a meridian line by which he could be directed, and perhaps, therefore, it would be better for him to pursue the track of those who had preceded him in debate. Acting then upon that view of the question, he had not the slightest hesitation in urging that it was the imperative duty of the legislature to review all the means calculated to mitigate the existing sufferings of the country—taking especial care that they adopted none which were not perfectly compatible with the real and permanent interests of the whole community. Deeply lamenting, as he did, and as no man in the country of just feelings could help doing, the existence of the public distress, which he admitted to exist, though not in the degree, and to the extent which some hon. gentlemen asserted—deeply lamenting, he repeated, the existence of that distress, he was most anxious to do all that could be done for its mitigation. He once more repeated, that admitting its existence, he most decidedly differed from hon. members, as to the nature and causes of that distress. But before he proceeded with any more general observations on that point, he wished to call the attention of the House to a statement made by his right hon. friend, the Member for Liverpool, a speech, as able as it was candid, and the temper and moderation of which he should be proud to imitate; the statement to which he alluded was respecting the Savings' Banks; the deposits made in them, and the degree in which those deposits might be supposed to indicate the nature and extent of the prevailing distress—which, if the statements of his right hon. friend were borne out by the facts, must be considered a degree of distress universal and overwhelming. He stated that the deposits in the Savings' Banks had materially diminished in the year 1829, as compared with the year 1828. In 1828 the deposits amounted to £945,000, and the sums withdrawn amounted to £678,000. In 1829, the deposits were £449,000, and the sums withdrawn amounted to £1,445,000, and these facts his right hon. friend regarded as a conclusive evidence of general distress. Now, could the facts not be accounted for in a manner the most complete and perfect, he should certainly agree in the conclusion which had been drawn from that statement. But he should have no difficulty in satisfying his right hon. friend that those circumstances did by no means warrant such an inference, or furnish the degree of proof sufficient to sustain the alarming position for which his right hon. friend contended. It would afford him also, he was sure, sincere pleasure to hear the satisfactory answer which might be given to that argument; and as the House must feel a deep interest in any thing so materially affecting the condition of the poorer classes, he begged that it would grant him some indulgence while he entered into the detail of the subject. In the year 1828 a law was passed, the operation of which had a most material bearing upon the deposits in the Savings' Banks; and that law was quite sufficient to account for the disproportion between the deposits and withdrawals of the one year and the other; namely, 1828 and 1829. The operation of that law commenced in November, 1828. Previously to that time the interest allowed at Savings' Banks was threepence per diem, being £4, 11s. 3d. annually. In November, 1828, the date of the statement he spoke of commenced, and it would be found that the period at which the diminution began exactly coincided with the time when that law came into operation. The interest on deposits was changed from 3d. to 2½d.; and it was further enacted, that in one year the amount of deposits should not exceed £30 from each individual; and that when the deposits, interest, and principal should amount to £200 from that time forward all interest should cease. It must be obvious to the House, that the immediate effect of such a law must be, that considerable sums would be withdrawn from those establishments. He was sure his right hon. friend would be glad to hear that the persons making small deposits in 1829 were much more numerous than those making small deposits in 1828. He had lately obtained returns of the number of deposits in and near the metropolis, and in other parts of the country, distinguishing those who had deposited under £20 and above it; those who had deposited £50 and under £100; above £100 and under £150; above £150 and under £200. He found from the return, that in 1828 the number whose deposits amounted to above £20 was 2,273, and in 1829 they were reduced to 1,850; but in the latter year the number of deposits under £20 had most materially increased, so much so, that the total number of one year was upwards of 4,000 above the other. In 1828 the total numbers were 66,240, while in 1829 the numbers were 70,150. He should make no apology for occupying so much of the time and attention of the House in details so minute, for he was assured that they could not fail to feel that deep interest in any thing affecting the labouring classes which their condition called for, and which at all times the House of Commons was forward to manifest. This subject was one on which much stress had been laid by his right hon. friend, and from which he was sure, when the real state of the case was known, his right hon. friend and the House would draw a different conclusion from that to which he had come. He would therefore state to the House the names of some of the places in which an increase of the deposits of the sums last mentioned had taken place, and he would do this to show that the improvement of which he took it to be a proof was not confined to one town, or one district of the country. He had returns from Liverpool, Norwich, Panton-street Haymarket, Shrewsbury, Sheffield, Southampton, Truro, Warwick, Worcester, Exeter, and Leeds, and in every one of those places the number of depositors under £20 had increased. Hence it was evident that the inference of his right hon. friend had no foundation—for the total increase of 1829 over 1828 was 4,000 depositors, and the diminution in the amount of deposits was fully accounted for by the law of which he had just spoken. No man could feel more strongly than he felt the imperative necessity which then existed of consulting the interests of the labouring classes, and no man could approach the consideration of those interests with a more earnest desire to promote them than he should. He thought it one of the first duties of the legislature to do all in its power to excite a taste in the humbler classes of society for those comforts and those enjoyments—those luxuries, he might add—of civilized society, the desire for which, and the habitual possession of which, would form the best guarantee for their good conduct, and the best guarantee that the higher classes could have for the possession of their property and their power, as at present enjoyed. It was urged, and with perfect justice, that the remission of taxes was amongst the means by which that most desirable object could be chiefly effected; and he would ask, had not the government of the King proposed the remission of taxes to a great amount? The noble lord opposite (the Member for Northampton) had given his Majesty's government credit for the selection of taxes which they made for the purposes of repeal—for having made that selection more with a view to the real interests and necessities of the people, than to any thing which might promote the influence of their own administration in that or the other House of Parliament. That was testimony of a satisfactory kind, and upon which he set considerable value; but the facts spoke for themselves. Their best vindication would be found in a reference to the taxes actually repealed. His right honourable friend seemed to recommend a more extensive commutation than had yet been thought of, and the levy of taxes too, on something else, in lieu of what, for the relief of industry, might be repealed. The House could not fail to observe, that his right honourable friend most skilfully avoided the enunciation of what that something else was to be; but his drift was not to be concealed. The House might naturally suppose that amongst the various subjects connected with the finances of the country, which had occupied the attention of government, the question of a property-tax had not escaped them; it was one of those that they had most seriously mooted. It was a question which, if they had not most maturely deliberated on, they should ill have discharged their duty as exercising the executive power of the State. They had most attentively considered the bearing of such a tax as affecting the commercial, the professional, and the landed incomes of the country; and also the question, if such a tax were resolved upon, what might be the effect of confining it to the landed incomes, and excluding the other two classes. After those mature deliberations, then, the conclusion at which they arrived was, that they should best discharge the duty they owed the country, by repealing this year £3,400,000 of taxes—that was the measure which to their minds appeared best calculated, in the way of reduced taxation at least, to relieve the necessities of the people. In doing that, however, and in making these observations, he begged to be understood as giving no pledge upon the subject of a property-tax, or making no assertion with respect to it one way or the other—standing in the situation in which he did, it would be extremely injudicious in him to restrict himself by any pledges whatever on either side. The course which they had adopted pretty plainly proved that they had not resolved upon submitting to parliament any proposition for a property-tax. Another subject which had been touched upon by his right hon. friend was the system of banking, and what might be done with a view to its improvement. This also was a topic which he thought could not be adverted to by him with too great care and delicacy. He was not one of those who underrated the value of the important services which bankers rendered to the country. Indeed, in looking to the utility of the whole as a body, he thought they were too apt to overlook the general advantage derived from them, and to dwell on individual cases of abuse. He, however, was not of this number, and he did hope that it might be possible, in any improvements that might be made in the system, to reconcile the interests of the body to which he alluded with those of the public. Upon the nature of any improvements that might be made in the system, he was not then disposed to enter; but he must say, that to throw open the banking system to every adventurer,—to consent to the establishment of Joint Stock Banking Companies, with only a limited responsibility, while the responsibility of the private banker extended to his entire property, were measures which ought to be considered with great caution. He would now approach some of the remarks made by the hon. member who last addressed the House, and he must own that the speech of the hon. member confirmed him in what he had all along feared,—that whatever might be the views of the hon. member who brought forward this motion, those of very many by whom it was likely to be supported would be directed to some enquiry, which would go to a revision of our Currency system, and also to that of Free Trade. If he might take the hon. member's speech as an indication of the general intentions in this respect, there could be no doubt on the subject; and he was glad of it, for he did hope that their discussion of that night would put an end to the Currency question. He knew the hon. member could agitate it again and again, if he pleased, but he was willing to believe that this, the seventh or eighth decision of the House upon it, would put an end to all further doubts upon the subject, and that they would now debate it for the last time, by showing that it was their firm determination to adhere to the system already adopted with respect to our currency. But the hon. member (Mr. Attwood) asked with great force of declamatory eloquence, “Will you abdicate the functions of Parliament by refusing to enter into an enquiry on a question so important to the country?” He (Mr. Peel) would answer, Yes. Parliament had now discussed the question so frequently and so fully, that members were already in possession of every thing which could be known respecting it. Did the hon. member, by the proposed enquiry, mean that the standard of value should be altered, or was there any great error which he would wish to have corrected in the measure of 1819? If he did, he hoped the House would now pronounce its opinion upon both points. As the author, in a great degree, of the measure of 1819, he begged the House would indulge him while he offered a few remarks in support of its principle, and the more particularly as he trusted they were now discussing the question for the last time. The two questions he would ask the hon. member were—had there been an error committed in the measure of 1819, and in what way were they to correct that error? Let the House bear in mind that ten years were now elapsed since the adoption of that measure, which had since been farther confirmed by repeated decisions of that House. Upon that adoption, and its subsequent confirmation, a variety of contracts, mortgages, and other pecuniary engagements, had been entered into, on the faith that the measures of parliament would be strictly persevered in. He asked, then, was it advisable that the whole of those engagements should be given up?—that the faith of parliament, pledged for the measures in which they were founded, should be broken? But what course would the hon. member take? Would he have a paper currency convertible into gold? Would he alter the standard of value, or would he have an inconvertible paper currency? If any one of those were the measure he would point out, and to some of which, in his own declamatory mood, he had alluded, why should not he, who knew so much on the subject, provoke a discussion by the introduction of a short bill? A single sheet of paper would contain a bill for any of those objects: why then not introduce it at once? But as the hon. member had shrunk from such discussion, he would not then enter minutely into it, but would make a few observations on the facts brought forward by the hon. member. The hon. member stated, that we had £800,000,000 of debt, which had been contracted for in a currency depreciated more than twenty per cent below that in which it was to be paid. But if the hon. member looked to the real facts of the case, he would find that this was not so. Let him consider that a large portion of this debt was contracted in a currency nearly as high as that in which the public creditor was now paid. But suppose the public creditor were to be paid only in the currency in which the debt was contracted, he would ask the hon. member to discriminate who were the parties to whom the depreciated rate of payment was to be made? A great majority of the original contractors had passed away, and since 1816 a vast portion of the public funds had got into the hands of persons who did not pay for it in a depreciated, but in an improved currency;—not in the value which the hon. member would set upon it, but in the improved mercantile value. Surely the hon. member would not turn round on those parties and say to them, “You must be the dupes of your confidence in the resolutions of parliament, which state that faith should be kept inviolable with the public creditor!” When the hon. member deducted from this £800,000,000 the amount standing in the names of those who purchased at a rate nearly equal to the present value, and those who had since purchased at a full value, he would find that this sum would be reduced to a very small amount indeed. He would now come to the alteration in the standard of value. It had now existed for eleven years, and under it a variety of contracts and obligations had been entered into. Would it not, then, he would ask, be a greater evil to depart from the system, than to persist in it as it is? If the hon. member thought not, he would again tell him that his best mode of bringing the question to an issue would be to introduce a measure by which he might show, if it could be shown, that no inconvenience would result from the alteration. Referring again to the bill of 1819, however unpopular the assertion, or to whatever degree of obloquy it might subject him, he would affirm that the introduction of that bill was no error. No doubt many hon. members then in the House, who had taken an active share in the discussion of that measure, would be ready to relieve him from any degree of personal responsibility attached to it, by stating that it was one in which they also had joined. Indeed, when he mentioned that it was a measure that had been sanctioned by the legislature, he might relieve himself from all equitable or legal responsibility. But without sheltering himself under that, he would then contend, that in that measure parliament had pursued the wisest and safest course for the welfare of the country, and nothing could be more grossly incorrect than the assertion that it was not so. It was said, that this change in the currency had depreciated the value of commodities more than twenty per cent, and in fact every degree of distress, every depression of trade, every panic or commercial revulsion that had since occurred, had been attributed to that bill. Now, it might not be unimportant to ask whether there had been no convulsions, no panics, no depression, before it became a law? Let him beg of the hon. member to consider what had taken place in 1793, just at the commencement of the war. What was the situation of the country in 1797, when we had restricted the issue of gold, and had substituted a paper currency? What was the state of the country in 1810, when there was not even a whisper of intention to return to cash payments? Why, in that very year, a committee was appointed to enquire into the distress, and it reported that credit had been destroyed in the country, that many of the commercial transactions of the country were carried on at a loss of from sixty to seventy per cent., that a number of manufacturers continued their men in employment only to afford them a precarious subsistence, and to prevent the injury to their machinery which inaction occasioned. Every symptom of the country at that time was much worse than at present, and yet there was then no appearance of a return to payments in gold. He would next direct the attention of the House to the year 1816, and he begged, in doing so, to remind the hon. member for Essex, that he then brought forward a resolution affirming that agriculture was, at that period, in a state of very great distress. He did not know whether the hon. member had lately referred to the able speech which he then delivered on the causes of the distress, or whether, if he had, he might not think that the different circumstances of the country since then would be a just ground for having altered his opinion. In that speech, the hon. member attributed the agricultural distress to a fall of prices, and he argued very powerfully to show, that an inconvertible paper currency would have a prejudicial effect on the value of the produce of home tillage. The hon. member had also then argued that a paper currency was the effect, and not as it had been since asserted, the cause of high prices. He (Mr. Peel) was willing to admit, that at the time when the hon. member made his speech, the Bank of England had given some intimation of returning to cash payments. This induced him to revert to another point connected with the subject—namely, the decline in prices. He would admit, that great distress was occasioned by that decline, but he did not believe that one tenth of that distress could be fairly attributed to the resumption of cash payments. While he was on this point, he begged to say one or two words to rescue the memory of the late Mr. Ricardo from an imputation which had been unjustly cast upon it. Mr. Ricardo was stated to have said, that the difference between the prices before and after the resumption of cash payments was only from three to four per cent. Now, Mr. Ricardo said no such thing. What he did say was—that the great difference between prices before and after the resumption of cash payments was a difference—he (Mr. Peel) did not know at what amount Mr. Ricardo stated it—not referable to the change of currency, but referable to the change from war to peace; but he said that the amount of reduction of price in consequence of a return from paper to gold was not more than from three to four per cent. Now, when he (Mr. Peel) admitted that a great change took place in prices after the resumption of cash payments, he must look to other causes for that change. Let him refer to the war, which was of thirty years' duration, and let him look at the prices to which all articles were raised during that war, and he would ask whether it would be possible, under any system of currency, to have kept up these prices in time of peace. To the return, therefore, from war to peace must be attributed the difference of prices, and not to any change in the currency. Now, going to the period of the French war, which he would not stop then to defend, he would only say, that in his opinion—and he agreed with an hon. baronet who said it was a war for the support of existing institutions—that it had tended to promote the (he hoped) permanent settlement of Europe. Now, if he divided that war into two periods of fourteen years, in the first of these, the expenditure of the country exceeded its revenue by £189,000,000. In the second period, the excess of expenditure above revenue was £236,000,000, making an excess in the two periods of £425,000,000. After such an extraordinary expenditure as that, could it be expected, he would ask, that the country should resume its ordinary condition without great depression, and whether the same high prices could be continued as in war? It was with a nation as with an individual: if he had, for some cause, whether necessary for his credit or not, made a large anticipation of his income, he could not return to his former condition without great weakness being apparent in his resources. Another cause of this great difference in prices was, that by the system which Napoleon obliged us to adopt with respect to our colonies, we became possessed of the monopoly of the trade of Europe, and of course that monopoly raised the price of every article here, and of the value of the labour expended in its production. That system was now at an end, and of course the high prices ended with it. It had been repeatedly said, that the transition from a state of war to one of peace ought to have been over before this; but no mistake could be greater than that under which those persons laboured who entertained such an opinion. They should have recollected that it was not possible for countries on the continent of Europe to enter all at once into a competition with England, the seeds of manufacturing industry were so completely blighted every where amongst them by the long continuance of hostilities. In fact, immediately after the cessation of the war, our manufactures received an impetus rather than a depression; but gradually, as continental industry resumed its tone, we were driven to the necessity of struggling to maintain that pre-eminence which we had before uninterruptedly enjoyed. And who could now shut his eyes to the conviction that we should be obliged and compelled to regulate our prices by theirs, if peace continued, and capital increased in the hands of our competitors, and machinery should be introduced among them, which we, even if that were desirable, had it not in our power to prevent? We should be obliged, he repeated, to regulate our prices by existing circumstances, altered as they were to our prejudice, and to abandon those which we could exact in the days of our monopoly during the war. Was it fair, then, to load the authors of the Bill of 1819—he could not say with calumnies, because no personal charges had been made against him, but—with accusations of being the causes of evil which was referable to circumstances over which neither they, nor Parliament itself, could have any possible control? Even from the battle of Leipsic, from the first symptoms of the downfall of Napoleon's power, the real causes began to operate; nor were they long in operation before they exhibited their effects. It would be found, by a reference to dates, that the fall in the price of wheat, for example, was not coincident with changes in the circulation. On June 1st, 1812, for example, the price of wheat in the country was 164s. per quarter; on the 1st of July it had fallen to 141s.; on June 1st, 1813, it was 113s.; on the 1st of November, 1814, it was 76s.; and on July 1st, 1815, the quarter of wheat which in the same month in 1812, had fetched 140s., was sold for 53s. This depression was not produced by any alteration in the currency, for no alteration took place. It arose from general causes, which were then coming into operation, and the effects of which still continued. On those subjects which, he regretted to say, were but little understood, hon. members would derive much valuable information from a perusal of the many able works which had been published in order to put political men in possession of the facts and arguments necessary to a proper knowledge of what was allowed to be so important. But he more particularly alluded to the labours of Mr. Tooke, to whose abilities and information he was happy to have an opportunity of bearing testimony. No man felt sincerer or more cordial sympathy for the landed interest than he had always entertained. From political considerations alone he should deeply lament their permanent depression, as he thought it necessary to the welfare of the State, and the proper balance of society, that those who were possessed of incomes amounting to from £1,200 to £1,600 a-year should be upheld in their station, and it was at all times painful to his feelings to be a spectator of their depression or decline. After the re-toration of the peace, however, it was unreasonable to expect that they could maintain the old prices which had existed in times so different from the present. There was one cause of the distress now complained of by agriculturists, which was certainly beyond legislative control, and which, at the same time, appeared to him to be greatly underrated—he meant the improvement in steam navigation, and the mechanism of modern machinery, which certainly brought the bad land of this country into competition with the richest land of Ireland and Scotland, which imported agricultural produce into England with a facility of conveyance unprecedented hitherto. A steam-vessel was incessantly employed in transporting the produce of the most fertile districts in the west of Ireland to Liverpool, whence it was as rapidly transmitted to Manchester, where the cargoes were immediately disposed of. In short, the effect of this introduction of Irish produce on the agricultural resources of England was precisely similar to that occasioned in the West India islands, by the annexation of the rich land of Demerara to the British Crown. The causes which he had mentioned would continue to operate, maugre all our anxiety to remove them or to neutralize their necessary effects. He had taken leave of the Currency question, and did not intend again to resume it. The hon. member opposite, he perceived, shook his head on his saying this; but he hoped that he would not shake it again during the session, if the gesture were indicative of a resolution to bring the subject again under their consideration. In reply to those declaimers who had so vehemently condemned the bill of 1819, as ruinous to the country, he should not deal in counter-declaration, or answer their vague assertions and inconsequent conclusions by a similar mode of defence, but would rather confine himself to a few facts, which he submitted were quite sufficient to confute their misrepresentations. He had endeavoured to ascertain the bearing of this obnoxious measure in several of the large manufacturing districts, by enquiries into the condition of the population now, as compared with what it was at the period of its introduction. In the town of Manchester a very animated controversy, the House was probably informed, was at present going forward, as to whether the inhabitants were distressed or not; some contending that they were, and some that they were not; nor was it probable that the contest would ever know an end until circumstances should decide the question by their indisputable authority. He should, then, pass over Manchester, and likewise Liverpool and Leeds, as there were others better entitled by local knowledge to speak as to the existing state of those places than he could pretend to be, but he would select the fairest example, where he could meet the hon. member on fair grounds, as he might himself be said to represent the district to which he alluded, and could contradict him in any statement he should advance if it were incorrect or erroneous. Birmingham was the part of England he would select; and he did so more particularly, as it was the nucleus of a certain political union, which had extended its ramifications elsewhere, originating in Birmingham, he presumed, on account of the pre-eminence of suffering among the inhabitants over their fellow sufferers in distress. Most willingly would he give the hon. member his choice of a test or criterion of prosperity, and by his own selection he should abide. His object was, to compare the circumstances of the inhabitants in 1818 with those under which they were so loudly complaining in 1830, in order to ascertain how far the bill of 1819 had operated as a cause of their depression. And first as to the population. In the year 1818, there were 18,000 premises, including warehouses, in Birmingham; whereas, in 1828, it contained no less than 22,000 inhabited houses, exclusive of warehouses. The hon. member's arguments went to prove that the alteration in the currency had depressed the value of property, but he was assured that there was, nevertheless, in Birmingham, a great increase in its value since the bill had been introduced. Three acres in the neighbourhood of the town had been purchased in 1827 for £600, which were since sold for £2,426; and ground rents, where forty years remained unexpired, were disposed of at 100 years' purchase. Land which had been sold in 1826 at £3,500, was bargained for in last November at £4,200. The number of licensed traders amounted in 1820 to only 198, but might be estimated in 1829 so high as 1,150. Then with respect to the consumption of the luxuries of life, there was an increase in exactly the same ratio. The four-wheeled carriages which were charged with assessed taxes in 1819 were only 38; in 1822 they were 44; in 1824 they reached 94; in 1826 they amounted to 106; and in 1828 to 157. The hon. member might say that four-wheeled carriages were the vehicles of the rich, he would descend therefore to those of the poor: the number of two-wheeled carriages in Birmingham in 1819 was 301; in 1822, 321; in 1823, 386; and in 1828 no less than 471; so that whether the House looked at the vehicles of the poor or those of the rich, the result was equally a proof that Birmingham had increased in prosperity since 1819. Horses which were charged assessed taxes in 1819 were in number 923; in 1822 they amounted to 971, but in 1823 and 1825, when the tax was taken off, there were no means of ascertaining the progressive increase. In 1828, however, they might amount to 977. The manufacturing activity, he thought, would be best estimated by the amount of tolls on the roads in the vicinity of Birmingham; and here also the same increase was manifest; for the tolls on the Holyhead, Stourbridge, and London roads had been let, in 1822, for £1,200 a year; but in 1829 they brought £1,767. The tolls on the Kidderminster-road, likewise, were let, in 1820, at £1,100 a year; whereas in 1828, they were raised to £1,655. The tolls on the Bromsgrove and Birmingham roads let in 1822, for £1,164; in 1824, for £1,556, and in 1828, for £1,722. A like increase took place in the item of canals. The custom on the Worcester and Birmingham canal, in 1821 and 1822, averaged at £100, and in 1828 and 1829, its relative prosperity was marked by the average of £165, making a difference of 65 per cent. The old Birmingham canal in 1821 and 1822, averaged at £93, and in 1828 and 1829 at £105. These facts, in his opinion, clearly established the conclusion, that the bill of 1819 had not been productive of that overwhelming distress which was described as the consequence of its operation. Touching the subject of that night's debate, which, after all, had no very considerable share in the discussion, he could not see what they were to do with the motion of the hon. member for Shaftesbury, who had proposed that the House should resolve itself into a committee to consider of the causes of that general distress complained of in the petitions, and endeavour to devise a remedy for the same. On his asking the hon. member, at a quarter to six, what was the precise motion which he intended to bring forward, the hon. gentleman replied, that he was too old a soldier to give him any information upon the subject. The result, however, of a fortnight's deliberation, was a motion for a committee of the whole House, instead of a Select Committee, and he thought that the hon. member had judiciously preferred framing his motion as he had done. But the hon. baronet, the Member for Shoreham, had certainly not treated him well. He had not paid the originator of the first motion that deference and respect to which his zeal, assiduity, and long cogitation upon the subject had so deservedly entitled him. The motion of the Member for Shaftesbury he considered by much the better of the two. If such distress as was described did in reality exist, it was greatly preferable that an enquiry should be conducted by a committee of the whole House, where all members were on a fair equality, and where the public was thoroughly acquainted with their proceedings. But the hon. baronet proposed the appointment of a committee of twenty-one members, who were to sit and enquire by oral evidence into the extent and causes of the distress, and also to suggest a remedy. Was it possible (he put it to any dispassionate man) that such a committee, with such a subject before them, could present a satisfactory report during either this or the ensuing session? He hoped that the House would reject both motions, not because most of those who supported them would desire to have an alteration in the currency, but from a conviction, that if an enquiry of this nature were instituted, large classes in the country would immediately infer that a depreciation of the standard, or some measure affecting the currency, was contemplated. Certain indications of a return to prosperity were at present beginning to exhibit themselves, and he had received, no later than that very morning, letters from Manchester and Leeds, which induced him to believe that we had already reached the lowest point of depression. Hon. members had observed, that we were entitled at this peculiar season to witness a revival of our manufactures, if the distress were not entirely irretrievable, and he concurred with them in thinking that the breaking up of the severe and long-continued frost ought to produce such an effect as they anticipated. But he feared the disease less than the remedy. The hapless fate of a patient under the joint superintendence of three physicians was adverted to in the progress of the debate, and he should entertain similar fears for the nation, whether submitted to the doctoring of 658 of the faculty, as proposed by one gentleman, or to twenty-one as suggested by another. He did not like to trust the constitution of the country to either of those hon. members, with their bundle of prescriptions, which only excited in him an involuntary shudder when they were produced. In refusing to assent to both propositions now submitted for their adoption, they were not abandoning their duty, but acting consistently with the true interests of those whom it was intended to relieve, shunning an enquiry which would only cause fruitless anxiety and excitement, and awaken hopes that were doomed to disappointment ere they were formed.

After some farther discussion, the debate was again adjourned.

UNION WITH IRELAND.

MARCH 22, 1830.

Mr. O'Connell presented a Petition from certain inhabitants of Drogheda, praying for a Repeal of the Act of Union, through which, they alleged, that Ireland was suffering incalculable mischief.

Several members having briefly spoken on the subject, and Mr. Lockhart having moved, as an amendment, that the debate on the Petition be adjourned till Wednesday next,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL confessed he did not feel much surprise at the doubts expressed by the hon. member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Lockhart), and the hon. member for Plympton (Sir C. Wetherell) respecting the propriety of receiving a petition in support of a project so mad and so absurd—so utterly destructive of the propriety of Ireland, and so much calculated to injure the integrity of the Empire—as that of a repeal of the Act of Union. He repeated, he was not surprised at the opinions of these hon. members, but at the same time he doubted whether it would be proper to depart from the general Parliamentary rule, and refuse to receive the petition. He did not apprehend that the petition proposed a diminution of the Empire, or a separation of Ireland from the control and government vested in the sovereign of this country. Ireland was a portion of the British Empire; the King of England was also the King of Ireland before any Act of Union was thought of: and the petition, he supposed, merely prayed that the two countries should be placed with respect to each other in the same situation as they were before the Act of Union was passed. He doubted, therefore, whether they could, according to the forms of Parliament, reject the petition; but while he gave his vote for the reception of the petition, he could not find terms strong enough to express his reprobation of the prayer of that petition, or his sense of the renewal of attempts to disturb the minds of the ignorant portion of the people by a representation of advantages to result from the possession of a Parliament in Ireland. The sentiments of the people of both countries had been freely and fairly expressed in the formation of the Union between the two countries. That Union was finally consolidated by the repeal of all those disabilities under which the great portion of the inhabitants of that country laboured, in comparison with those of England; and he repeated, that he could not find terms to express the strong disgust and reprobation with which he viewed the attempts made to separate them. When all good men were congratulating themselves on the return of that tranquillity which they sought to promote, and which had followed the healing measure of last year, when all denominations of Irishmen were allowed free access to every department of the State; when advantages had been conferred on them, such as they never before possessed, it was too much that all the old feelings of discord were to be revived for the gratification of some individuals, by such injurious and incorrect assumptions as formed the basis of that petition. At the same time that he could not too strongly express his abhorrence of its prayer and its object, he saw no reason for refusing to receive the petition.

Later in the evening,—

Mr. Peel, in explanation, denied that he had ever contended against the right of the people to express their opinions on that or any other subject. On the contrary, he had contended for that right. But while he had admitted the right, he had also declared that he could not find language strong enough to express his reprobation of the doctrines which the petitioners maintained. With respect to what the hon. and learned gentleman had said of the separate legislatures of Jamaica, Halifax, and Canada, it must be remembered that, although they had separate legislatures, they were still parts of the United Kingdom. He wished to ask the hon. and learned member for Clare, if he knew any thing of the names that were affixed to the petition? They appeared to have been signed in a moment of conviviality rather than at a serious meeting of freeholders. For instance, there was the name of "Paddy Bray," followed by that of "Billy Powder Bray."

Mr. O'Connell said, that those were the names of two of the registered freeholders of the town in which the meeting was held.

Mr. Lockhart, yielding to what appeared to be the general feeling of the House, withdrew his amendment.

The Petition was ordered to be laid on the table.

LAW REFORM.

MARCH 22, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL presented a message from his Majesty, which was read by the Speaker. It was to the following effect:—"His Majesty having taken into consideration the report made to his Majesty by the Commissioners appointed by his majesty to enquire into the practice and course of proceedings in the superior courts of Common Law, is desirous with a view to improve and expedite the administration of justice in England and Wales, to be enabled to add to the number of Judges in the superior courts; and his majesty relies on the liberality of the House of Commons to make such pecuniary allowance to the additional judges as may be suited to the dignity of the judicial station and the duties attached to it."

On the motion of Mr. Peel, an Address was ordered to be presented to his Majesty, thanking him for his most gracious Message, and assuring him that that House would take it into their most serious consideration.

NAVY ESTIMATES.

MARCH 22, 1830.

On Sir George Clerk's motion in committee, "That £32,033, 1s. 6d. for the salaries of Officers and contingent expenses of the Navy Pay Office for the current year be granted to his Majesty,—

Mr. Vernon Smith moved an amendment, to the effect that a reduction of £1,200 be made in the salary of Treasurer of the Navy.

Several members having taken different views with reference to the two offices of Paymaster and Treasurer of the Navy,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL observed, that out of the five speeches that had been made against the item, four of them contained different and distinct propositions as to the two offices. This was of itself sufficient to prove that it was a matter of extreme difficulty for his Majesty's Ministers to bring forward a proposition with respect to this situation that was at all likely to produce unanimity. He denied that there was any difference in the language held by ministers on the present, and on the former occasion. They asserted that there would be an immediate saving of £1,000 a year, and that eventually the saving would amount to £2,200 per annum, and they said so still. Their object was, to continue the office of paymaster, until some provision might be made by the falling in of a situation connected with the patronage of the Crown, for the person who now holds it, instead of saddling the country with a pension. He thought it would be very unjust to remove a distinguished naval officer from the situation, without granting him an adequate provision. The estimates had been for some time in the hands of the members, and therefore it could not fairly be urged that the House was not aware that the vote was to be proposed. Neither was it just to insinuate that the government were taking this step for the purpose of keeping up its patronage; because in this case, they were providing for an individual whose brother, his right hon. friend the member for Liverpool, had voted against them on this very question, the object of which vote, had it been successful, would have been to have turned the ministers out of office. They therefore might be wrong in judgment, but was it possible to say that they were acting from any corrupt motive? He would give the House this assurance—that the office of the Paymaster of the Navy should never again appear in an estimate. They had never contemplated its appearance there; but when the motion was made the other night, he did expect that parliament would make the provision for one year. If within two months an opportunity of a vacancy should occur, the government would take advantage of it, and in preference to any political claim, would give the appointment to this officer. But it was possible that no such vacancy would occur, and he therefore trusted that the House would not compel them to turn this individual out of office without any provision whatever.

In reply to Mr. Hume,—

Mr. Peel lamented that his argument had not penetrated the understanding of the hon. member, who must be extremely pugnacious if he were disposed to quarrel with the very modest proposal of ministers. The experiment he wished to try was, whether the office of deputy could not be abolished—the principal being required to discharge the duties. If it should turn out that the experiment failed, he would undertake that, in the estimates of next year, only £2,000 should be taken for the salary.

On a division, the original motion was agreed to, by 155 against 69; majority, 86.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

In the adjourned debate on this subject,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL, rising after Sir Francis Burdett, said, he wished to notice a most extravagant misconception of the hon. baronet opposite. The hon. baronet had charged him with having said, that it was a part of his policy to depress the landed interest. Every one who had heard him, except the hon. baronet, must know that he had said nothing of the kind. His statement was, that during the war a great portion of inferior land had been brought into cultivation in this country, and that now, by the application of steam to navigation, and by the circumstance of the good land of Ireland and Scotland being better cultivated, the produce of the inferior land of this country was likely to be injured in the market. He had stated this as a fact; and he had added, that whatever might be the benefit to the country, he could not but view the consequences with the utmost pain, so far as they affected those individuals who would suffer from them. The hon. baronet had entirely mistaken him in supposing that he had stated it as part of his settled policy to depress the landed interest.

Mr. Davenport, in reply, expressed his intention to withdraw his original motion in favour of the amendment, which, on the first night of the debate had been moved by Sir C. Burrell, and seconded by Mr. Alderman Waithman, "That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the cause of the present distress, and into the remedies for that distress."

The Speaker informed the hon. gentleman, that if the original motion were withdrawn, there would remain no question before the House, as an amendment upon a motion which was withdrawn could not be put.

Mr. Peel suggested, that they should divide upon the amendment, with the understanding that that division was to decide the whole question. The original motion was accordingly negatived without a division.

On the amendment the House divided, when the numbers appeared—for the amendment 87, against it 255; majority against the amendment 168.

INJUDICIOUS TAXATION.

MARCH 25, 1830.

Mr. Poulett Thompson, at the close of a very long speech on the subject of taxation, moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of making a revision of the taxes, so that the means of paying the sums voted by the House, and all other charges for the public service, may be provided for with as little injury as practicable to the industry and improvement of the country."

Colonel Davies seconded the motion.

In the course of the debate which ensued,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that at that late hour he should address himself to the considerations of paramount importance arising out of the question before the House, and thereby should disembarass himself of the details into which the hon. member for Dover had entered. The proposal was,—a proposal made for the first time in Parliament,—that a Select Committee should be appointed for revising and considering the whole system of the taxation of the country. It was something wonderful that it had never occurred before, that the whole power of the government and of the parliament should be thus delegated to a select committee of twenty-one. It was a practice founded on good sense, that the House should reserve to itself the power which the hon. member wished to devolve on a select committee; that the House, possessing ample information upon all the necessary points, should not transfer to any delegated portion of it those powers which a House of Commons ought to exercise of itself. And let it be recollected that the House of Commons had fought the battles of taxation against ministers upon former occasions without committees. Even in the time of Sir Robert Walpole the Excise tax was rejected by the House without any enquiry in a committee. The Shop-tax, proposed by Mr. Pitt, had been defeated without any committee. In 1807, Lord Henry Petty proposed a duty on iron, which had been defeated in that House. In 1817 the House had defeated the intention of the government to continue the property-tax; and with respect to this tax, he would advise the House, whether a property-tax were desirable or not, to start fair on the question, and not have it decided in a select committee. He would give no opinion on the expediency of a property-tax; but he advised gentlemen in that House, and those of the landed interest especially, to reserve this question to themselves, or at least to throw the responsibility of proposing it upon the government, and not permit it to screen and shelter itself from responsibility under a select committee. Almost all those who had advocated the appointment of the committee had contemplated a property-tax as a necessary consequence of it. The hon. member for Dover, indeed, did not (to use a homely phrase) let the cat out of the bag; but he suffered a little kitten to escape, which showed pretty well what the cat would be. He proposed a legacy duty on real property, which, he said, would add £1,500,000 to our present revenue. If there were any Irish members present, he would beg to advertise them that Ireland had been exempted from the property-tax; and supposing that there should be a fair proportion of Irish members in the committee of twenty-one, Irish members would perform their duty to their constituents by rejecting the proposal of a property-tax, leaving such a proposal to the government. He (Mr. Peel) could not conceive how a Parliamentary committee could discharge the duties which the hon. member proposed to impose upon it. Was the committee to make a report recommending a remission of taxes in the present session or in a future session? If in the present session, the consequence of that would be, that there would be a second budget, founded, not on the opinions of his Majesty's government, but of the select committee. Hitherto it had been considered that proposals for the imposition of taxes belonged to the Crown, and that it was an encroachment on the privileges of his Majesty's ministers to interfere in that province. Besides, the committee would not be a committee of secrecy, and every member could divulge what took place there. Witnesses would be shrewd enough to perceive the bias of the committee; the effects which the enquiry would have on trade would be serious; every one connected with trade would be pressing forward to be examined in order to serve his own purposes. The members of this committee of twenty-one would be, in fact, the most powerful men in the House, and their power would pro tanto diminish that of every other member. If the House adopted the motion of the hon. member, it would be abandoning to twenty-one of its members some of its most important functions. On every ground, therefore, he objected to this delegation of functions properly its own; and although the hon. member for Dover disavowed any hostility to government by his motion, he must put it to the sense of the House whether his Majesty's ministers would not be degraded by its being carried. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would be virtually superseded; for, whilst he sat in Downing-street, with powers which were intrusted to him for the public good, much diminished, and with a broken staff of office, a Chancellor of the Exchequer, backed by a select committee, would be exercising his functions within the purlieu of that House. If the intention of the vote were to show a distrust of his Majesty's government, it should be expressed in a manner less prejudicial to the public interests. The ministers of the government should be upheld in the exercise of their just influence and power: it was no longer a government when, although in possession of place, it was discredited in the estimation of the public. He would ten times rather support the pretensions of the hon. member for Dover to fill the situation of Chancellor of the Exchequer, appointed by the Crown, than consent to remain in office a nominal servant of the Crown, but merely registering the edicts of a select committee.

On a division, the motion was negatived by 167 against 78; majority, 89.

PENSIONS FOR THE HON. R. DUNDAS AND THE HON. W. L. BATHURST.

MARCH 26, 1830.

On the proposed vote for £174,584, 9s. 4d. to defray the superannuations granted to Commissioners, Clerks, &c., formerly employed in the civil departments of the Navy, Sir R. Heron moved, that the proposed grant be reduced, by deducting from it the sum of £900.

Towards the close of the brief debate which ensued, Colonel Dundas expressed himself aggrieved by certain personalities in which, he conceived, the hon. baronet had unnecessarily thought proper to indulge, with reference to the Dundas family.

[Sir R. Heron and Mr. Peel rose together, but the latter gave way.]

Sir R. Heron, in explanation, begged to say, that when he called the late Lord Melville a sort of Viceroy of Scotland, he alluded to an office and to duties which no longer existed. As to the expression "equivocal services," he could assure the hon. member, that he had no intention of hinting at the circumstance to which the hon. member had alluded. Indeed, that circumstance never once entered his mind. But his meaning was, that the late Lord Melville belonged to a particular party, and his services, however approved by that party, were equivocal to the rest of the nation.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he was glad he had given way to the hon. baronet, whose explanation, he was sure, must be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman, who had expressed himself on the subject with a degree of warmth that the circumstances undoubtedly justified. The hon. member for Westminster was mistaken in supposing that he disapproved of the proposition; but he could assure that hon. member, that he was not insensible to the value of that independent support which, the hon. member truly said, the present government had received. Most sorry should he be to lose such support; and never, to the latest day of his existence, could he forget the conduct pursued by the gentlemen on the other side of the House on the great measure of last session. The manner in which the gentlemen opposite gave their support to the government at that time could never be forgotten by him; and he thought that the conduct pursued by those gentlemen on that occasion reflected the highest credit on the political parties of this country. With respect to the present proposition, he agreed with the hon. member who spoke last as to the nature of it. It was only a proposition made by the government, which the House would reject or allow as it thought fit. It was a mere estimate, which, if the House thought improper, it would be its duty to reject. He begged of hon. members, however, to consider what the real nature of the proposition was, before they came to a decision upon it. It was a proposition which arose out of a revision of the establishments of the country which the government had thought it their duty to make. The course which had been pursued in this case by his Majesty's ministers had been to take away the youngest officers, and instead of a salary of £1,000 to give them £450, until some other employment offered for them. But the main question was the intention of his Majesty's ministers in the measure, and he would read to the committee the official correspondence which had taken place respecting it. The right hon. gentleman here read the following letters:—

"ADMIRALTY OFFICE, March 20th, 1829.

"SIR—I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you that their lordships have given directions for praying new patents for the Navy and Victualling Boards, the effect of which will be the immediate reduction of two members of the former, and one of the latter boards, and the further reduction of a third member of the Navy Board, on the death, removal, or resignation, of Mr. Tucker or Sir Robert Seppings, the present joint-surveyors of the navy. The two commissioners of the navy who are reduced are Captain J. M. Lewis and the Hon. Robert Dundas, the former of whom will be appointed to Sheerness and Chatham Yards, in the room of commissioner Cunningham, who retires; and the reduced commissioner of the Victualling Board is the Hon. W. L. Bathurst.

"My lords command me to request you will state this arrangement to the lords of his Majesty's treasury, and inform me whether their lordships are of opinion that any retired allowance, and to what amount, should be granted to Mr. Dundas and Mr. Bathurst on the abolition of their offices, which have usually been deemed hitherto as held during life or good behaviour. Mr. Dundas has held the office four years, having been one year previously attached to the British embassy at Madrid and Lisbon; and Mr. Bathurst has held his situation nearly four years.

"Their lordships think it right to add, for the information of the lords of the treasury, that Mr. Dundas is eligible to two of the reserved commissionerships of the Navy; but that as all the members of the Victualling Board, except the chairman, are professional, Mr. Bathurst would not be eligible to any seat at the board, unless as chairman.

"I am, &c.

(Signed) "JOHN BARROW.

"TREASURY CHAMBERS, April 30th, 1829.

"SIR—Having laid before the lords commissioners of his Majesty's treasury your letter of the 20th ult., respecting the amount of superannuation allowance to be granted to Mr. Dundas and Mr. Bathurst, on their removal from the Navy and Victualling boards; in consequence of the reduction in the numbers of the commissioners of those respective boards, I am commanded by my lords to acquaint you, for the information of the lords of the admiralty, that they observe with satisfaction that their lordships have made an arrangement for employing in another situation Captain F. M. Lewis, one of the reduced commissioners of the Navy, and have thus superseded the necessity of raising any question as to any provision for him. And my lords have no doubt that the lords of the admiralty will be equally anxious to adopt a similar course with respect to Mr. Dundas and Mr. Bathurst; and my lords, therefore, consider that any allowance to be made to them is purely of a temporary nature, to continue only during the period which may elapse before they can be again employed in some civil situation connected with the civil departments of the Navy. My lords, therefore, see no objection to assigning to them a temporary allowance of one-half of their respective salaries from the period when they ceased, being the proportion allowed to other officers reduced on abolition of their respective offices, under the minute of this board of February 2nd, 1825, it being distinctly understood, that Mr. Dundas and Mr. Bathurst are to succeed to the first situations which may be at the disposal of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, for which they may be qualified.

"I am, &c.

(Signed) "J. STEWART."

These letters showed, the right hon. gentleman went on to observe, that these allowances were in conformity to the rule of former governments—they were not the result of any special rule of the existing government, nor any job. The rule might be wrong, but it was established long before. It did not originate with his noble friend the Duke of Wellington and his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it was established when Lord Liverpool and Lord Goderich were in office. The treasury minute of February 2nd, 1825, referred to in the letter he had read, related to the Board of Customs; and the rule it laid down was, that the lords of the treasury would grant to those officers who had not served ten years, one half of their official salaries. The general rule was the material point of the question; and it was a positive hardship on the sons of cabinet ministers, that they only should be liable to animadversion when they are treated according to this rule. The committee would allow he had not attempted to bias its opinion by any appeal to the passions; but he must say, that considering the difficulties attending the making reductions, it was not quite right to embarrass the government when it attempted to effect them. He hoped he had said enough to convince the House that his Majesty's ministers had not been influenced by any corrupt motive in this transaction.

The question being loudly called for; the committee divided, when there appeared—for the amendment, 139; against it, 121; majority against ministers, 18.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.

MARCH 29, 1830.

On Mr. S. Perceval's motion for referring the Ordnance Estimates to the Committee of Supply, Sir J. Graham moved, as an Amendment, that the proposed vote for £85,025 be reduced to £83,825, to strike off the salary of the office of Lieutenant-general of the Ordnance.

In the debate which followed,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, no man was more disposed than he was to give full credit to the hon. baronet who moved the amendment, for the most perfect sincerity, yet he was sure, that the hon. baronet would not desire to be exempt from that ordinary rule of debate, by which all that was said by one party was not taken for granted by their opponent, but submitted to that close examination, which was necessary to the investigation of truth. The hon. baronet had proved himself a most skilful advocate, for with all his professions of sincerity he had contrived to press into his speech every argument, connected or unconnected with the subject, which might produce an impression unfavourable to the government—the influence of the Crown in that House; and the opinions of Lord Beresford in Portugal; the condition of the Portuguese confined in Terceira; and lastly, Ajax himself! All this might be very well by way of ornament, but did not seem to have much connection with the object which the hon. baronet professed to have in view,—namely, to prove that the office of Lieutenant-general of the Ordnance was an unnecessary one. The hon. baronet first attempted to throw on government the blame of treating with marked disrespect all committees, and particularly the Finance Committee, and called upon the House to support that last-mentioned committee. Now, what were the facts of the case? The Finance Committee made four very able reports, containing several suggestions as to the most proper mode of carrying on the public service, and, with the single exception of the office of Lieutenant-general of the Ordnance, the recommendations of that Finance Committee had been acted upon, or attempted to be carried into effect, by the government. If the House recollected, the first report of the Finance Committee referred to the mode in which annuities were granted, and pointed out how a saving might be effected by an alteration of the system. That suggestion was immediately assented to by the government, and carried into effect by the bill which was brought in by his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The second report referred to the Ordnance, which for the present he would not notice. The third report recommended an alteration in the mode of granting superannuation allowances; and, if that recommendation were not carried into effect, it was certainly not owing to any fault of the government. His right hon. friend proposed a measure to carry into effect that recommendation, but he did not meet with that support from the House which he felt himself entitled to expect. The fourth report of the Finance Committee reviewed the general financial system of the country, and among its recommendations was the abolition of a nominal and delusive sinking fund. That recommendation was carried into effect, and a bill was brought in to appoint a surplus revenue for the purpose of forming a sinking fund. The second report of the committee referred, as he had said, to the Ordnance department, and every one of its recommendations relating to the reduction of the salaries of the officers had been attended to. The government could not, therefore, be charged with treating with disrespect the recommendations of that committee. They had given practical proofs of their desire to carry into effect the improvements suggested by the Finance Committee. But how was it the duty of public servants to act? If a man in the situation of the Duke of Wellington were conscientiously convinced that it was for the interest of the State that a certain office should be maintained, was it his duty to act contrary to his conviction, and propose to the House to adopt the recommendation of the Committee of Finance, or appeal to the House from the report of the Committee, and give effect to that, which in his conscience he believed would tend to promote the interests of the public service? If a Minister of the Crown, whom the Constitution made responsible for his conduct, were not to act on the well-considered deliberation of his own mind,—if the Duke of Wellington, responsible as he must be for the efficiency of every branch of the military service, but above all of that particular branch over which he presided for so many years, was not at liberty.—nay, if it were not his sacred duty to appeal to that House (for that was all he claimed a right to do) in support of what he believed to be most advantageous to the public service,—the responsibility and the duty of ministers became a perfect mockery. The noble lord had said, that the Committee of Finance had a right to reject the opinion of the Duke of Wellington. He admitted that they had, and he hoped at the same time the noble lord would concede to ministers the right of differing from the committee, and of submitting to Parliament what they conceived to be best for the public service. And who were the individuals who entertained the opinion that the continuance of the office in dispute would tend to promote the public service? They were those who had followed up the example set by their predecessors, and who, having filled the office of Master-general, had been constantly occupied in endeavours to reduce the expenditure of the establishment. None had laboured with more zeal and greater success in this way than the Duke of Wellington, who, during the period when he was Master-general, was so far from manifesting a disposition to encourage superfluous expense, that the Ordnance Estimates had been reduced in amount by £1,000,000; and there never was a case in which so much perhaps even necessary establishment had been reduced, and so much patronage lost to the government. Much had been said with respect to the discontinuance of the Finance Committee, but he was sure that many of those gentlemen who regretted its non-existence were aware that government was more able to examine thoroughly into the different departments of the State, and propose reduction. Indeed, a Finance Committee, in consequence of its being unable to examine into details, might become an authority to government for expenditure rather than reduction. Among the recommendations of the Finance Committee was one, that enquiry should be prosecuted by the government, as it could do more than any Finance Committee. Had the government disregarded that recommendation? On the contrary, it had shown every respect to the Committee of Finance, and since it had closed its labours, great reductions had been made in the civil establishment of the Ordnance, as advised by the Committee. By the labour of officers in that department reductions had been effected to the extent of £27,800. Further reductions to the amount of £4,500 were in contemplation, and would be carried into effect before the next Estimates were brought forward. Having stated these facts, he was relieved from the necessity of saying any thing further on the charge which had been brought against the government, of treating the Finance Committee with disrespect. The committee had not been continued, in order that government might examine into every department of the State. It was not therefore from any desire on the part of the government to shrink from enquiry, but from a desire to undertake enquiry, that the committee was not reappointed. The hon. gentleman had said that there was some inconsistency in his (Mr. Peel's) declining to adopt the recommendation of the Finance Committee with respect to the office of lieutenant-general, when he showed himself so strict an advocate for the opinion of a committee respecting the Treasurership of the Navy. But this hon. gentleman must see that his argument partook of a fallacy. The hon. baronet proposed a vote of condemnation against the government for retaining the office of Treasurer of the Navy with a salary of £2,000 a year. That proposition he had met with the argument that it was not fair to visit the government with a vote of condemnation, when it adopted the recommendation of a Finance Committee, which was the best guide by which it could learn what was the opinion of the House. By adopting that recommendation of the committee, he showed no inconsistency between the course he was now pursuing and that which he pursued on a former occasion. Since the discussion in 1823, the House had not adverted to the saving of expenditure effected in the Ordnance department, and the additional duties imposed. Since that period the Comptroller of the Barracks, with a salary of £1,500, had been abolished, and by the duties which had been transferred to the Ordnance department, a saving of £4,680 had been effected. All these alterations had added to the duties of the lieutenant-general, which were various. They related to the recruiting department, to the examination of cadets and other subjects. The hon. baronet had said, that in the present distressed state of the country, the lieutenant-general, being a useless officer, ought to be dismissed. If he were a useless officer, he ought to be dismissed at any time, whether the country were distressed or not; but if by dismissing him the efficiency of the service would be impaired, the government would not be justified in abolishing the office in order to court popularity in a time of distress. The question for the House to consider was, whether or not the office were a proper one. But the hon. baronet inferred, that government defended the present vote on the ground of preserving the influence of the Crown in that House, and had accused him of casting a longing eye to the times of Sir Robert Walpole and Mr. Pelham, when 270 servants of the government filled the benches of that House. The hon. baronet had accused him of having expressed an opinion in favour of a return to those good old times, but he had only referred to them to show what was the state of the influence of the Crown in the House at that time. The hon. baronet said, this office was maintained for the purpose of increasing the influence of the Crown. In enumerating the illustrious names of those who had filled the calumniated office of lieutenant-general of the Ordnance, he appealed to the House to decide, whether those appointments were more likely to have been the result of a desire to court the favour of Parliamentary influence, or from a desire to enlist in the military service during times of peace those officers who had rendered themselves most conspicuous by their exertions and character during war. When the office became vacant in 1822, the first offer of it was made to Lord Hopetoun. The situation would be accompanied, as his lordship was told, with incessant labour, and almost perpetual residence in London. On these grounds Lord Hopetoun refused the situation. The next officer to whom it was offered on the same conditions, and by whom it was on the same grounds refused, was Lord Hill. The third offer was made to Lord Beresford, and accepted. On its resignation by that noble lord, it was filled for a short time by his right hon. friend, Sir George Murray, whose exertions in war, and whose glorious campaigns had so greatly distinguished him. When the office was resigned by him, it was offered to Sir W. Clinton; on Sir William Clinton's quitting the office [hear hear!]¹—he was surprised at the sneer which had followed his mentioning the retirement of Sir William Clinton—he was surprised at its coming from the part of the House which it came from, and from which he should least of all have expected any condemnation of the determination of government to be unanimous on the question to which that retirement referred—he had thought the House had heard enough of imputation on Mr. Pitt in former times, with reference to the Slave-trade, and on other governments engaged in important measures, for allowing themselves to be defeated by the votes of persons connected with them in office. Of this he was sure, that if government had been defeated in their proposition last year by the votes of persons holding office under them, he should have received from the hon. baronet a lesson on the subject in terms of no very mild a nature. But to return to the point from which his attention had been for a moment diverted: it had been said that this office was filled by men of great family and much parliamentary influence; but he thought it was rather a subject of congratulation that the best blood of England should have been shed in those fields of glory where its honour had been so bravely asserted; and if such men had so distinguished themselves, was the fact of their connexion with high and noble families to deprive them of their well-earned reward? Miserable, indeed, would be the fate of those hon. and gallant officers, if, after all their great services, his noble friend at the head of the government were to say to such men as Lord Hopetoun, Lord Hill, Lord Somerset, and those others of his gallant companions in arms,—“ ’Tis true you have distinguished yourself by most heroic efforts in the service of your country,—’tis true you have, in times of peril, appeared as the intrepid assertors of her honour,—’tis true you are entitled to reward, and are eminently qualified to be placed in a situation where your country may derive still farther benefit by your military skill,—but it is also true, that you are descended from great families, connected with much parliamentary influence, and I must not recommend you to an office of which you are every way so worthy, lest I should incur a sneer at having made the recommendation with a view to that influence.” Such language would be unworthy of his noble friend, and unworthy of the country in whose service he and his gallant companions so honourably distinguished themselves. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman expressed a hope that the vote of that night would not have the effect of declaring that this office was kept, not as a reward for military merit, and he had not put it on that ground, but was retained for the purpose of the influence which might be gained by a single vote.

On a division, the numbers were, for the amendment, 124; against it, 200; majority, in favour of ministers, 76.

TRIAL BY JURY IN SCOTLAND.

APRIL 1, 1830.

The Lord Advocate closed a speech of considerable length, by moving for leave to bring in "A Bill for uniting the benefits of Jury Trial in civil causes with the ordinary Jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and for making certain other alterations and reductions in the Judicial Establishments of Scotland."

In the consequent debate,—MR. SECRETARY PEEL, rising after Mr. Hume, said he was happy to find the system so good, that the hon. member could find out nothing else to blame but that the Judges of Scotland mixed with other classes of society, and engaged in some other business. Among the employments to which the learned member objected was the being appointed on the commission to enquire into Academical Instruction; and he stated as an aggravated offence that they were the presidents of charitable Institutions, and the managers of Infirmaries. All the fault he could find with them was, that they mixed with their fellow-citizens. The hon. gentleman said, that English Judges did not do such things; but he had sent for the Red Book, and on opening it at the Lying-in-Hospital, he found that Mr. Justice Park and Mr. Justice Gazelee were Vice-Presidents [honorary, said Mr. Hume]. He found that among the six Vice-Presidents of the Foundling Hospital, there were Lord Tenterden, Mr. Justice Gazelee, and Sir John Nicholl.

Mr. Hume said, he could show that they went farther; some of them might be found amongst the members of Select Vestries.

Mr. Peel resumed; the hon. gentleman charged the Scotch Judges with addicting themselves to secular employments, and instituted comparisons between them and the English Judges, unfavourable to the former, and then he sought to aggravate the charge by saying that the English Judges went a length the Scotch Judges had never been known to go. If that were really and seriously brought as a charge, and sustained in the manner which he had just described, he must be allowed to say that his experience afforded but few parallels to such a mode of parliamentary discussion. It was indeed new to him to hear it brought as matter of accusation against judicial persons, that they were found mixing in deeds of charity with their fellow-citizens at large. The case of the English Judges, to which he had adverted, was certainly such as lay open to no reasonable objection; and he was quite satisfied that the hon. member for Westminster, who sat opposite, could bear testimony to the benefits which their interference conferred upon the charities with which they were connected. It happened that in Scotland some of them had been appointed Commissioners for the purpose of enquiring into the state of Academical Education, and he should gladly learn what there was in the judicial office to unfit them for such a situation; and he might be allowed to add, that they deserved great credit for the willingness with which they undertook those duties, and the efficiency with which they discharged them. As to the immediate object of the present motion, he should reserve to himself the right of addressing the House on it at some future occasion—possibly when it came to be discussed in the committee. As he had a motion of his own to bring on that night, he might be excused from then saying more.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

LAW OF FORGERY.

APRIL 1, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said he was not disposed at that hour to persevere in the motion with respect to the Law of Forgery, of which he had given notice, but that he felt it absolutely necessary to do so in order to the successful introduction of any legislative measure which might have the chance of passing into a law during the present session. In the course of the prosecution of the task he had undertaken,—namely, the Revision and Amendment of the Criminal Law—the crime of forgery had appeared to him to occupy a most important station in the list of offences, and to it he was now anxious to direct the attention of the legislature. Before he stated the object he had in view in the amendment of the laws respecting forgery, he hoped the House would permit him to present them with a slight view of the existing laws on that subject, and the way in which they arrived at their present extent. Originally there was no statute law relating to forgery. Up to the time of queen Elizabeth the punishments for forgery were inflicted under the common law; and it was not until the fifth year of the reign of that queen that a statute was passed inflicting a penalty on the offence of forging documents relating to real property. That penalty, however, did not extend to the punishment of death. The statute authorised imprisonment for life, the pillory, branding and loss of ears, according to the nature of the offence. It was not, indeed, until the reign of king William that any statute imposed the punishment of death. At that time the Bank of England was established, and the punishment of death was awarded to those who forged the negotiable securities of that establishment, but in all other respects the punishments for forgery remained the same from the time of queen Elizabeth until the reign of George II. In the year 1728, however, in that reign, a very material addition was made to the list of offences punishable as forgeries—the issuing of forged promissory notes and bills of exchange being made a capital offence. He believed there could be very little doubt that the extreme rigour adopted at this particular time on the subject of forgery, was owing to the alarms created by the very extensive and somewhat extraordinary forgeries of an individual, a full account of whose depredations would be found in the State Trials of that period. It appeared that this person, whose name was Hale, committed a number of forgeries on a Member of that House, named Gibson. One bill was for £1,600, another for £400, another for £700, and one for £6,500. At that time it was the practice of a Member, in franking a letter, to write his name with the word “free” in the corner, leaving the superscription to be filled up in the writing of the person sending the letter. Hale, it appeared, procured a number of these franks, and having changed the words “free” into “for R. Gibson,” and then filled up the blank at pleasure, he was thus able to commit the forgery with ease. He had little doubt that the indignation and alarm produced by this forgery were the principal causes of the enactment of the laws to which he alluded; but in consequence of the extension of trade, the statutes on the subject of forgery were subsequently increased to a great extent, each department bringing in, with very little consideration, an Act to punish the forgeries applicable to their own business. To such a magnitude had this evil arisen at the time Mr. Justice Blackstone wrote his Commentaries, that he observes, with respect to the Law of Forgery—“In addition to the number of general and special commissions, there was not a forgery which could be practised on a real or a fictitious person, for which a law did not exist which made the crime a capital offence.” He believed, indeed, that the whole number of statutes on the subject amounted to 120. These statutes might be divided properly into two classes. Those relating to public and general affairs, and those relating to official and departmental. In the first class might be comprised all documents relating to the public funds and to negotiable securities—to bills of exchange and promissory notes, and all documents connected with the transfer of property—all papers relating to marriage settlements and testamentary bequests, and registers in public offices. Under the second head, the official and departmental, might be included all documents connected with the Navy and the Army, the Customs, the Excise, the Post-office, and Greenwich or Chelsea Hospitals—every Act relating to which contained some enactments on the subject of forgery. In attempting, then, to consider what course was to be pursued, he felt there were not many difficulties to be overcome with reference to the general and public securities which were transferable and negotiable, but that there were very great difficulties in the way when they came to deal with the official and departmental. To take, for instance, of the latter class, the Act relating to the land-tax. In that Act there were 200 separate clauses, although only one of them related to forgery, but then that clause, the 194th section, overruled and referred to the whole of the other clauses, and expressly declared, that the penalty affixed to the crime of forgery attached to forging the documents referred to in the preceding clauses. In the same manner the Navy Pay Act contained twenty clauses, and the clause relating to the forgeries of orders for pensions and other documents referred to all the clauses contained in the Act. If, therefore, he merely took out the forgery clause and did not alter the whole of the Act, he did nothing in the way of a consolidation of the Law of Forgery, and left the offences unprovided for. Now he proposed to meet the difficulty in this way. He proposed to leave to each department the task of revising and altering the Acts connected with it. The Customs had 360 acts connected with that department, and they had already reduced them to the number of ten. The Stamp-office was engaged in the same task. The Navy Pay-office, and those connected with the hospitals, were engaged in the same task, and he was informed that in a short time the whole of the Acts relating to them would be reduced into a very small compass. He proposed then to repeal all the Acts which inflicted a capital punishment for forgery, whether the offence be either public or departmental, and to name a certain description of offences for which, and no other, the punishment of death was to be inflicted. Of the 120 statutes to which he had alluded, 61 inflicted the punishment of death. The Bill he proposed would contain only four clauses, and in them he proposed to consolidate the whole statute law relating to forgery. It would contain in one clause a distinct enumeration of all forgeries for which the punishment of death was to be inflicted, whether the offence were committed on the general or the departmental class, and the Act would, therefore, consolidate the whole of the laws relating to forgery in all public and private affairs. He thought it a most important object to diminish, as much as possible, the number of offences to which the punishment of death had been attached. He had, indeed, no hesitation in avowing, that he was a strong advocate for the mitigation of capital punishments. He wished to remove, in all cases where it was practicable, the punishment of death; for it was impossible to conceal from ourselves, that capital punishments were more frequent, and the criminal code more severe, on the whole, in this country, than in any country in the world. It was better, however, to proceed cautiously, so as not to embarrass their judicial functions, in the event of any increase of crime taking place, and that increase being attributed to the laxity of punishment they had introduced. They had, however, both reduced the number of offences for which death was inflicted; and that punishment had also, in all cases, been more sparingly applied. On a comparison of the number of executions in London and Middlesex, in time of war and peace, it appeared they were much more numerous in time of peace. Whether it were, that dishonest and profligate persons were carried off by the demands of war, or that the quantity of employment was greater for all, it was impossible to say; but the fact was so, as the return sufficiently proved. In the seven years of peace which succeeded the year 1783, although the number of the population was less and the number of crimes less, yet the executions were much more numerous than at any former or succeeding period. The executions in the seven years amounted to 378, or 56 on an average in each year. In 1787, 97 executions. And now, taking the seven years from 1816 to 1822 both inclusive, the executions were only 192, or an average of 27 each year; and in the last seven years, from 1822 to 1829, there were only 122 executions, making an average of 17 each year, or about one-third of the executions of 1784. He would now proceed to state the offences on which he proposed to remit the punishment of death. The great principle to which he adhered was, to confine that punishment to the forgery of negotiable and transferable securities, and to every thing which represented money. He might add to them the forgery of the Great Seal, the Privy Seal, and the Sign-Manual. He should also add the forgery of wills of personal property. In documents of that kind no witnesses were necessary, and as they were generally not produced till the death of the parties, and might therefore be made the instruments of great deception, and cause great injury to families, he had thought it right with regard to them to retain the capital punishment. He added to these all false entries relative to public stocks. All forgeries of promissory notes—all fraudulent attempts to procure money—all forgeries of the notes of the Bank of England—in fact, all documents representing money, or which came under the denomination of negotiable or transferable securities. In the cases where he remitted the punishment of death, he was confident there would be much difference of opinion as to their propriety, and that some persons would be inclined to suppose he had not gone far enough, and others much too far; but he was of opinion that there would be more security in that course, and that a great deal of good might be done by the increased caution which these exceptions would introduce. He proposed, therefore, to except from the punishment of death all forgeries of receipts for money and goods—all issuing of forged stamps, or forgeries of stamps—all attempts to defraud by forged orders—all fabrications of bank paper, that is, the paper on which notes are stamped—all forgeries of deeds and bonds, and every document which did not come under the class he had named, and which were not negotiable or transferable securities. For these offences death was now very rarely inflicted, and he was ready to admit that it ought not to be inflicted. He had been guided in this course by the opinion of the committee which sat to enquire into the Criminal Code in 1819. The report of that committee says, "It has sometimes been said, that the abolition of penal laws, which have fallen into disuse, is of little advantage to the community. Your committee consider this opinion as an error. They forbear to enlarge on the striking remark of Lord Bacon, that all such laws weaken and disarm other parts of the criminal system. The frequent occurrence of the unexecuted threat of death in a criminal code tends to rob that punishment of all its terrors, and to enervate the general authority of the government and the laws. The multiplication of this threat in the laws of England has brought on them and the nation a character of harshness and cruelty which evidence of a mild administration of them will not entirely remove. Repeal silences the objection. Reasoning, founded on lenient exercise of authority, whatever its force may be, is not calculated to make a general and deep impression. The removal of disuses is a preliminary operation which greatly facilitates a just estimate, and where it is necessary, an effectual reform of those laws which are to remain in activity. Were capital punishments reduced to the comparatively small number of cases in which they are usually inflicted, it would become a much simpler operation to form a right judgment of their propriety or necessity. Another consideration of still greater moment presents itself on this part of the subject; penal laws are sometimes called into activity after long disuse, and in cases where their very existence may be unknown to the best-informed part of the community; malicious prosecutors set them in motion; a mistaken administration of the law may apply them to purposes for which they were not intended, and which they are calculated more to defeat than to promote; such seems to have been the case of the person who in the year 1814, at the assizes of Essex, was capitally convicted of the offence of cutting down trees, and who, in spite of the earnest applications for mercy from the prosecutor, the committing magistrate, and the whole neighbourhood, was executed, apparently because he was believed to be habitually engaged in other offences, for none of which however he had been convicted or tried." The right hon. gentleman then eulogised Lord Bacon, who contended in his works for the principles he now asserted; and having adverted to the wonderful sagacity which that great man displayed, he expressed his surprise that any persons in authority could have perused his recommendations, and left it to the present day to carry them into effect. He confessed he never heard the name of Lord Bacon without feeling the force of those lines of Cowley, which he thought very preferable to those celebrated verses of Pope, in which he described him, connecting together his glory and his disgrace, as at once the greatest and the meanest of mankind. Cowley's commendation was contained in his Address to the Royal Society, and his comparison of Bacon to Moses might be extended beyond the bounds of learning and philosophy. If he had not led statesmen and society out of the wilderness, he had pointed out the path. That glory was his, the neglect was his successors'.

"Bacon, like Moses, led us forth at last,
The barren Wilderness he past,
Did on the very border stand
Of the blest Promised Land,
And from the mountain-top of his exalted wit, Saw it himself, and showed us it."

Before making his present proposition, he had referred to the bill of 1821, which had been read a third time in that House, but did not pass into a law, and he found that there was no very material variation in the principle of the two measures. He had also referred to the Code Napoleon, and he also found that there was no very material variation in the principle of his proposition and that of the Code Napoleon. There was one peculiar reason for being cautious in their advances towards the mitigation of the punishment of forgery: it was an offence chiefly committed by persons of ability and information, and whose ability and information frequently gave them the means of committing it to a great extent: for instance, in the case of Fauntleroy, the forgeries which he committed amounted to above £400,000. If the capital punishment were entirely remitted, some secondary punishment must be substituted. Now, however mischievous and extensive was the crime of Fauntleroy, he was quite sure that if such a person had been sentenced to such a punishment as two years' hard labour on the public roads, the sympathy of the public would soon have been excited at seeing him degraded to the condition of associating with the commonest and vulgarest criminals. If he had been sent to New South Wales, such a man in that colony would have found that transportation was the slightest punishment that could have been inflicted on him. Looking at these and other considerations, he must deprecate the sudden and entire cessation of the punishment of death for forgery. Let the effect of the measure which he was now proposing be watched. Desirous as they all were of gradually mitigating the severity of our criminal code, he entreated the House not to load such a disposition with the opprobrium which might be cast upon it, should premature efforts prove injurious. Let the progress be gradual and cautious, and he was confident that the object would eventually be attained. It ought to be recollected that the number of offences to which the present law applied was very considerable. Upon the average, every one of the sixty-one acts which he had described comprehended five distinct offences. Of this, however, he was persuaded, that the mitigation of the punishment would diminish the present facilities which the offender had of escape. It would ensure his conviction. There were offences connected with forgery which the existing law did not touch. One, and that a very great one, was the forging of acceptances of individuals on foreign bills of exchange: he doubted if any penalty whatever attached at present to such a crime. It was his intention, however, to remove that doubt, by comprehending the offence in the provisions of his bill. There were several other offences, the punishment of which was at least doubtful. If an English person dying at Paris made a will, and another will were forged, that offence ought to be subjected to the same punishment as the forging of a will in this country. He meant, therefore, to propose, that it be enacted, that wherever a document of that nature was executed, the punishment of forging it should be the same as if it had been executed in this country. He proposed also to remove a great imperfection in the law, by proposing to alter the law of venue; and to dispense with the necessity of proving the place where the forgery was committed, provided the fact itself were proved. He was ashamed to trespass so long on the attention of the House; but he trusted the importance of the subject would be his apology. The right hon. gentleman here briefly recapitulated the objects, as they regarded forgery, which his Bill contemplated. Connected with the law of forgery was the law of coining. It was his intention to propose the consolidation of all the laws having reference to coining, and to mitigate the law with respect to capital punishment, as it affected one offence, in the same manner as he proposed to mitigate it as it affected the other. Should these bills pass during the present session of Parliament, little would remain to be done in the consolidation of the criminal law. He had been encouraged to pursue the course which he was pursuing, by the fact, that in no single instance had what had hitherto been done proved injurious. Although so many statutes had been repealed by his former measures, no evil consequence whatever had resulted. He could not conclude without repeating his deep obligations to the two gentlemen whose invaluable assistance he had obtained in the preparation of his measure. The one was Mr. Hobhouse, who, having fulfilled the duties of Under Secretary of State for several years with great zeal and ability, had retired into private life, retaining his disposition to be serviceable to the public. The other was his friend Mr. Gregson, whose aid had been most material. Nothing could exceed the zeal of that gentleman in the work; and to him and to Mr. Hobhouse the country was greatly indebted for their persevering exertions. The right hon. gentleman concluded by asking leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to forgery.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill, which was read a first time, and ordered for the second reading on the 26th of April.

FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE COUNTRY.

APRIL 2, 1830.

MR. SECRETARY PEEL, in reply to Lord John Russell, said, he could assure the noble Lord that his Majesty's Ministers were anxious to produce the papers which related to the negotiations regarding the future condition of Greece at as early a period as they could, consistently with that which must be the leading object of all statesmen—the permanent interests of this kingdom, and those likewise of that country in whose affairs we had been induced to interfere. He had the satisfaction of stating that the parties who signed the Treaty of the 6th of July, 1827, had come to a resolution respecting the government of Greece, and the relations it was to hold with other powers; and he had also the satisfaction to say, that they were in perfect accord as to the Prince to whom the sovereignty of that country was to be committed. On these main points, the future government of Greece, its future condition (which, he was happy to declare, was to be one of unqualified independence), and lastly, the selection of the Prince who was to preside over its destinies—on all these great points there was the most complete concord, and the most perfect unanimity between the Allied Powers who had signed the treaty of the 6th of July. That concord had existed from the beginning, and up to this moment was uninterrupted. But there were some points of a subordinate nature, on which negotiations were still pending, and until they were brought to an end, the noble lord himself must concur with him that it would not be for the public interest to produce the papers; he was sure, however, that at no distant moment, he should receive the commands of his majesty to lay them before the House. He was also sure that this would be done at the earliest possible time consistent with the interests of England, and the permanent welfare of Greece. The noble lord had stated that he approved of the domestic policy pursued by the administration, but that he viewed the foreign policy with some suspicion and distrust. Now, he could not help thinking that the distinction arose from the circumstance that there was not the same opportunity of giving that immediate explanation respecting the course pursued by government in the one that there was in the other. The domestic policy was in itself of necessity more clear—it was the subject of constant discussion in that House; but it was obvious that the same facility did not exist as to foreign policy. Silence was imposed upon the ministers for a long period in many instances. If, then, on those points in which ministers had means of explanation the noble lord gave them his confidence, and if there were points on which they could not give an explanation, he hoped that the House would not follow the example of the noble lord as to our foreign policy, but, on the contrary, suspend its judgment until ministers could give a full account of their proceedings; and he entertained the utmost confidence, that when this took place, the decision would be in their favour, as well in regard of foreign policy as in that of domestic policy. The House might rest assured, that after having completed the pacification of Greece, they would neither sacrifice the permanent interests of that country nor of this; and that also the most anxious attention would be paid to that which must be as dear to them as any worldly or pecuniary interest whatsoever—he meant the high character of the British nation [cheers].

Lord J. Russell asked if the negotiations then pending related to the affairs of Greece, or to those of the Ottoman Porte?

Mr. Peel stated, that they were negotiations between the three Allied Powers on the one hand, and the Prince designated as sovereign of the country on the other. The right hon. gentleman, after a short pause, gave a further explanation of what, he said, was a very important point which he had inadvertently omitted, in replying to the questions of the noble lord. He was unwilling to leave it in that degree of uncertainty which might seem to warrant the correctness of the noble lord's opinion. The noble lord said, that from something which had passed in that House, he had been led to understand that in August last we were upon the verge of a war, in order to protect Turkey from the attacks of Russia. Now, he could not acquiesce in the correctness of the noble lord's interference. He was not aware that the country was on the verge of war at the period alluded to, and still less for the purpose of protecting Turkey or Constantinople from the Russians.

NAVIGATION OF THE RHINE.

APRIL 8, 1830.

In answer to a question from Mr. Charles Grant, relating to the navigation of the Rhine, according to the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL stated, that he was willing to follow the example of his right hon. friend, and give a short explanation as well as an answer. In 1815, a treaty was made at Vienna, which he thought, and in this he concurred with his right hon. friend, and all his predecessors in office, intended that the navigation of the Rhine should be open to all nations. A doubt, however, had arisen as to the meaning of the treaty, which was drawn up originally, he believed, in German, and not in French, and the King of the Netherlands contended that the words of the original treaty did not bear the signification other parties had assigned to them. What might be the meaning of the original treaty in German he would not decide, but looking at it as it was expressed in French, he had no doubt that it was meant to open the navigation of the Rhine to all nations. The words were, that the navigation shall be free—jusqu' à la mer. The government of the Netherlands interpreted this to mean as far as the sea, and not into the sea; which was not, he thought, a very good argument. Another difficulty had been raised concerning the channel of the Rhine, connecting it with the sea—whether it were the Waale, or the Leek exclusively; and the king of the Netherlands was disposed to determine that it was the Leek exclusively. If that were the case, as the Leek was not navigable for sea-going vessels, nor accessible at all times, it would so limit the navigation of the river as to render it almost useless. England, he admitted, above all other nations, was interested in having the navigation of the Rhine free, or subject only to such very moderate duties as were sufficient to maintain the police of the river, keeping the towing-path in order, &c. His right hon. friend, after having stated the case, had asked if the navigation were not closed to all but those having a concurrent interest in the river? He had asked whether there had not been a treaty lately signed by the Continental Powers bordering on the Rhine? and he had also asked whether or not this treaty would be communicated to Parliament when it was ratified? As he understood the subject, it was somewhat different from the case as stated by his right hon. friend. There were assembled at Mayence, commissioners from all the states bordering on the Rhine, constituting what was called the central commission, which represented all these states, and no treaty had been entered into between them and the king of the Netherlands. There was, indeed, a projet of a convention between Prussia and the Netherlands, which had been communicated to the central commission, which had not stated that it would accept this projet. When the treaty was concluded and ratified, there was no doubt it would be communicated formally to his Majesty's government, and when communicated, he had no doubt it would be laid before the House. He could not pledge himself, as the treaty was not ratified, as to what would be the course pursued by his Majesty's government. France, he believed, had some objection to the treaty; but he could have no doubt that when it appeared, England would claim her full share of the advantages. England was not prepared to acquiesce in any system for granting exclusive commercial privileges; she had signified to those powers that they were not to prejudice her interests by their treaties, and that she should urge her rights according to the treaty of 1815. In the present state of the case, England claimed a free traffic, and declared, that till the treaty was ratified she would not consider her claims in any way prejudiced. In whatever view it might be ratified, England would not consent to any such exclusive scheme. He agreed with his right hon. friend that the interests of the commercial world ought not to be overlooked; and he was sure that his Majesty's government was deeply alive to every measure which affected the commercial interests of this country.

Mr. C. Grant said, that the convention between Prussia and the Netherlands, mentioned by his right hon. friend, was different from what he described it to be. The projet, which he had seen in a German paper, for December, was entered into by Prussia, Bavaria, France, Hesse, Nassau, and the Netherlands. It was not merely a convention between Prussia and the Netherlands, but an agreement entered into between all the parties. That was the general impression concerning it. When the treaty was carried into operation, England would be unable to claim any privileges under it, as it related solely to the powers who were parties to it. The treaty, as he understood it, was so exclusive, that vessels from Baltic-Prussia were not to enter the Rhine, the navigation of which was to be confined to the vessels of the powers seated on its banks. Under the treaty, England would have no privileges whatever.

Mr. Peel replied, that he had stated what was, he believed, correct. He believed the projet was only for a convention between Prussia and the Netherlands. Prussia was the party most interested. The central commission consisted of a delegate from each state situated on the borders of the Rhine; and that commission had never consented to the convention entered into between Prussia and the Netherlands. The powers concerned had the convention under consideration; but what opinion they would form, it was impossible to say. He believed that the projet was formed on the principles of the treaty of 1815, which certainly his Majesty's government would not lose sight of. England would not relinquish her claims, and when the treaty was ratified would not forget to urge them. He supposed that the case would be amicably arranged; but, whatever might be the result, England would claim all the benefit which she had a right to. It might perhaps be satisfactory to his right hon. friend to know, that an English vessel had proceeded up the Rhine with a cargo, which had been delivered at Cologne.

Mr. C. Grant knew that an English vessel had proceeded up the Rhine, but he also knew that there was no disposition to repeat the voyage. The duties levied on her were so enormous, that they destroyed all profit, and no other vessel would make the same experiment.

Mr. Peel said, the government would protest as strongly against prohibitory duties as against actual prohibition.

POOR LAWS' AMENDMENT BILL.

APRIL 26, 1830.

In a committee of the whole House, on the Poor Laws' Amendment Bill,—

MR. SECRETARY PEELE said, he was sorry that there had not been a preliminary discussion—that they had not discussed the principle of the bill before they went into committee upon it. At present, instead of paying all that attention to the clauses which it was the practice of the House to pay in committees, they had occupied themselves chiefly with discussing the principle of the bill; thus reversing the usual course of business, by leaving to the third reading the arrangement of the clauses, and occupying the time of the committee with that which ought to be done at the third reading. He wished, therefore, that the hon. mover would endeavour, in the committee, to render the bill as perfect as possible according to his own conception, and then let it take its fate on the third reading. The hon. gentleman had expressed his readiness to do all in his power to meet the views of members, and so to frame or alter the bill as to obtain general support: in doing so, he more indulged his own good-nature than did what was calculated to promote the success of the bill. He really thought that the object of the hon. member would be best effected by making the bill as perfect as possible, according to his own conception, and not by endeavouring to accommodate it to the fancies of every hon. member. Though he saw much matter for serious consideration in the bill before the committee, yet he should be far from throwing any obstacles in the way of its passing through that stage; and he should be extremely sorry to say any thing that could prejudice it on the third reading; but he must be allowed to say, that he doubted whether the hon. member could accomplish what he had in view—namely, making the condition of the South resemble that of the North, by the introduction for a time of an intermediate system not now in use in either. No one could doubt, that the hon. member's object was a very laudable one; and wishing, as he did, every success to the hon. member, still he entertained doubts with respect to the propriety of some of the details of the measure before them. He thought, in fact, that by this measure the hon. member would introduce into the South a plan which did not exist in the North. The manner in which the reception, care, and education of children were provided for in this bill, was unknown in the North. He had his doubts with respect to the propriety of the power given by this bill, of separating the children from their parents. In cases where the parents were persons of profligate character, the separation might be advantageous; but where the parish had provided houses for the reception of children, he was afraid this power of separating children from their parents would be exercised indiscriminately, and that the overseer would make no difference between the careless and profligate, and the industrious and affectionate parent. Overbearing necessity might justify this power of separation; but at the first blush of the question, and as a general measure, he was decidedly opposed to it. In some cases it would doubtless be consulting the morality and the interests of the children to separate them from their parents; but there were many cases in which he should be extremely sorry to see such a power exercised. He doubted, also, if it would not prove an expensive system, and he therefore entreated the committee well to consider that point before they proceeded further with the bill. He understood it as conferring certain powers upon the parish officers, until the practice of the South should be assimilated to that of the North—it gave them a power of founding a school, in which they could place all children on whose behalf parochial relief was demanded, from the age of seven to fourteen, and fixed it entirely under the management of the parish officers. Whenever relief was asked for any child from the parish, he was perfectly ready to admit that from that moment the parish officers were entitled to interfere with its daily education, namely, with the education which it might receive at a day school; but beyond that, he much questioned the expediency of interference. He had had some experience on this subject in Ireland, in respect of an establishment which undertook not alone to provide for the education, but for the clothing and employment of the children committed to its care; and he must confess, that the result of that experience was by no means favourable to the practice. One of the difficulties which it presented was this, that when the children attained the age of fourteen, the managers knew not what to do with them. They might have twenty, thirty, forty children at the age of fourteen, who had received a better education, perhaps, than might have qualified them for situations merely servile; and from that, and other causes, the conductors of Charter-schools—the establishments to which he particularly alluded—had great difficulties to contend against. Those conductors stood in the place of parents, and the parents and friends of the children had a right to say, you are responsible, and not we, and to you we look for putting forward in the world those young persons, now at the age of fourteen or fifteen, of whom you have assumed the care. Then, again, another objection to the bill was, that it conferred upon churchwardens and overseers powers which they would be very likely to exceed. To establish such a school as was contemplated by the bill, invested the churchwardens and overseers with the power of appointing masters and mistresses, and attendants, and so conferred upon them a certain amount of patronage; for the persons employed must, of necessity, get some stipends, more or less. To such an enactment, he confessed, he could not help feeling considerable objection. This bill would confer upon churchwardens and overseers the power of taking leases, making purchases, building or fitting up houses—surely such powers were open to abuse. For these reasons, then, he thought that the committee ought to pause before they agreed to all the clauses of the bill. He begged not to be understood as urging these observations as objections to the bill; he only aimed at suggesting topics which he thought were deserving of serious consideration.

VESTRIES IN IRELAND.

APRIL 27, 1830.

Mr. O'Connell, preliminary to an intended motion, called the attention of the House to a statute named the Vestry Act, passed in 1827, which considerably affected the property of his Majesty's subjects in Ireland. His motion, he said, was simply this—to prevent the possibility of any one class being bound to keep its pockets open, that another might thrust its hands into them. The hon. and learned gentleman moved for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the laws relating to Vestries in Ireland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the act; and, in the course of the debate which took place, Mr. Trant opposed the motion, and pointedly remarked, that all men had foreseen that the moment a Roman Catholic member obtained a seat in that House, measures would be introduced for the purpose of overturning the Established Church in Ireland. This, in fact, was the object of the hon. and learned gentleman, though he couched it under the name of an amendment in the Vestries Act.

MR. SECRETARY PEELE said, he most fully concurred with the hon. member who had spoken last, that they should look with the utmost vigilance to all that affected the interests of the Established Church—there was no motion brought forward as the present had been which should not be regarded with, he might even say, suspicion—a motion made upon such a subject, and having such an effect, by an hon. member dissenting from the doctrines of the church, and avowing opinions with respect to contributing to the maintenance of the Established Church, such as had been avowed by the hon. and learned mover—to which he added, that he contemplated ulterior measures, which, for the present, he did not think it expedient to put forth. Now, it was to be regretted that he had confined himself to that imperfect statement of his opinions; it would have been much to be desired, that those opinions had now been submitted to the House, that they might know at once what the hon. and learned gentleman proposed to do. With respect to the particular question then before them, he begged to say, that he was far from denying that very plausible arguments had been brought against points and portions of the Act, of which it was the object of the hon. and learned gentleman to procure the repeal; but he looked to the main principle of the motion, and upon principle he opposed it. He understood the main object of it to be, to enable Catholics and other Dissenters to vote at Vestries concerning the imposition of church-rates.

Mr. O'Connell: Other Dissenters vote now.

Mr. Peel resumed: If Roman Catholics were permitted to vote, he foresaw it must be productive of the most endless confusion in Ireland, and would lead to the destruction of that peace and good-will now so happily prevailing in that country. The Church of Ireland was a branch of the Protestant United Episcopal Church of England, and the reform carrying on in the whole of that church required an increased supply of places of worship, and he knew not how those were to be had otherwise than by taxing the possessors of land in Ireland. They could not expect England to pay for those churches; and if it turned out that the possessors of land in Ireland were not able to pay for them, then England must see that they were paid for from some other quarter, so as to keep the burden, if possible, upon the shoulders of those who ought to bear it. The members of the United Church had a right to look to the possessors of land in Ireland, for the maintenance of the decent performance of public worship, according to the form of the Established Church.

For his part, he knew nothing better than levying parochial rates for this purpose. He confessed he heard with surprise a lawyer recommending an enactment, giving the power of application to the Court of King's Bench—it might be said, that even at the present moment there existed the means of application to the King's Bench; he did not know whether it were so; if it were, he regretted it; for, in his opinion, the court of King's Bench ought to be kept aloof from all party contention, whereas the measure which the hon. and learned gentleman sought to carry, would have the effect of erecting the court of King's Bench into a political tribunal, exercising a discretion upon the expediency of erecting a church in every parish in Ireland. He knew that in certain cases of rates, that Court could issue a mandamus; but he should most decidedly object to devolving upon that court the exercise of a political discretion, instead of leaving it exclusively to its legitimate business, the administration of justice. Admitting the force of some observations which had been made respecting the operation of the vestry act, he preferred giving the present motion a decided negative, to adopting any other course; nor should he purchase the concurrence of any hon. gentleman in that House, by giving a distinct pledge to propose any alteration in it. He could not conceal from himself the difficulties that were in the way of any attempt to specify by law, in what cases Vestries should have the power of imposing rates. The canon law and the rubric were, it must be admitted, but little understood, and rarely referred to by those who took an active part in the business of Vestries; and, in the circumstances in which the circular letter of his right hon. friend had been issued, he did not, he confessed, see how a more expedient course could have been pursued. Though fully aware of the difficulty of accomplishing the object of which he spoke, he could not help expressing a wish that all those cases were specified by law; for it was scarcely to be supposed that the Roman Catholic would remain satisfied with any practice, merely because it was prescribed by the Canon and the Rubric, and not specified in any legislative enactment. It would be, therefore, convenient and advantageous, that a law should be passed, did no grounds of objection to it appear; but to say any thing decisive, one way or the other, would be giving a pledge in the course of a debate too important to be given, except upon due consideration. There were other points connected with the present question, which required much consideration, and to which he was willing to give his serious attention, but upon which he could then give no pledge. As to the motion of the hon. and learned gentleman, he differed from it in principle; and therefore he was prepared to give it his most decided negative.

On a division, the motion was negatived by 177 against 47; majority, 130.

AFFAIR AT TERCEIRA.

APRIL 28, 1830.

Mr. Grant prefaced a speech of considerable length by reading the following Resolutions, which it was his intention to submit to the House:—

“That prior to the 12th of December, 1828, her Majesty the Queen Donna Maria II. had been recognised by his majesty, and the other great powers of Europe, to be legitimate Queen of Portugal; and that at the period above-named the said queen was residing in this country, and had been received by his majesty with the accustomed honours of her royal rank.

“That on the said 12th of December, the island of Terceira, part of the dominions of the queen of Portugal, was governed by authorities, civil and military, in allegiance to her majesty.

“That on the said 12th of December instructions were given by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, stating that ‘a considerable number of Portuguese soldiers, and other foreigners, were about to sail in transports from Plymouth to Falmouth, and it is supposed they intend making an attack on Terceira, or other of the western isles; and his majesty having been pleased to command that a naval force should be immediately despatched to interrupt any such attempt, you are hereby required and directed to take the ship and sloop named in the margin under your command, and to proceed with all practicable expedition to Terceira; and having ascertained that you have succeeded in reaching that island before the transports alluded to, you will remain yourself at Angra or Praia, or cruising close to the island in the most advisable position for intercepting any vessels arriving off it; and you will detach the other ships as you shall deem best for preventing the aforesaid force from reaching any of the other islands.'

"That on the arrival of the naval force sent to Terceira, in pursuance of these instructions, the commanding officer found that island in possession of and governed by the authorities above mentioned.

"That in the beginning of January, 1829, a number of Portuguese, subjects or soldiers of her said majesty, voluntarily left this country, with a view of repairing to the said island, and that their departure and destination were known to his Majesty's government; that they appear to have embarked and sailed in unarmed merchant ships, to have been unaccompanied by any naval force, and themselves without any arms or ammunition of war.

"That these unarmed merchant ships and passengers were prevented by his majesty's naval forces, sent for the purpose, from entering the harbour of Porto Praia; and that after they had been fired into, and blood had been spilled, they were compelled, under the threat of the further use of force, again to proceed to sea, and warned to quit the neighbourhood of Terceira and the rest of the Azores, but that they might proceed wherever else they might think proper.

"That the use of force in intercepting these unarmed vessels, and preventing them anchoring and landing their passengers in the harbour of Porto Praia, was a violation of the sovereignty of the state to which the island of Terceira belonged; and that the further interference to compel those merchant ships or transports to quit the neighbourhood of the Azores, was an assumption of jurisdiction upon the high seas, neither justified by the necessity of the case, nor sanctioned by the general law of nations."

Mr. Grant having concluded his speech by reading the first of the above resolutions, a long debate ensued, in the course of which, rising immediately after Sir Francis Burdett,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, that he felt great obligations to the hon. baronet for the new light he had thrown upon the discussion. In a manner the most generous, if not the most discreet, he had disclosed the real tendency and object of the motion. He flung to the winds the dry abstract question of the law of nations; away, he says, with your Vattels and your Bynkershooeks—away with all enquiries into the jurisdiction you have exercised under the laws of nations; I impugn the policy of your neutrality; the principles which animated the patriots of Greece and Rome ought to have guided you; and you ought to have upheld the principles of liberty by making war on Don Miguel. And that, however disguised, was the real ground for the attack now made on his Majesty's ministers; their neutral policy was impugned through the affair which happened at Terceira. Like the hon. baronet, he would not involve himself in legal subtleties—he would only appeal to the plain good sense and common understanding of hon. gentlemen, having thus merely reminded those who were prepared to vote upon the abstract right of the question, what, according to the views of the hon. baronet, ought to have been the policy of this country in order to promote the general principles of liberty. He was disposed to speak of the Portuguese refugees with sympathy for their sufferings, and respect for their misfortunes: they came to our shore claiming our hospitality, and they were kindly received; they had since left it, and perhaps all of them had not even yet found a place of refuge. When they came to this country, government recollected the circumstances under which Don Miguel had usurped the government of Portugal—he repeated, usurped the government of Portugal; and, though we consented to afford them a temporary asylum, we resolved to maintain a strict neutrality. It was for the interest of Great Britain not to foment civil dissensions in Portugal. The decision of his Majesty's ministers had on several occasions received the sanction of that House, a majority of which had more than once declared, that it was wise for the country to maintain a strict neutrality between the contending parties in Portugal. He admitted the distinction drawn by his right hon. friend who opened the debate, between a voluntary and stipulated neutrality; but that distinction had nothing to do with the present question. We were not bound, he would also admit, to remain neutral; but having chosen neutrality as our best policy, we were bound rigidly to observe its principles. In that respect voluntary neutrality did not differ from stipulated neutrality, and both equally conferred some privileges, but imposed important duties. To Don Miguel, who was king of Portugal de facto, this country was bound to look, to maintain the engagements entered into by Portugal towards this country. Whenever Don Miguel displayed a disposition to violate the engagements subsisting between England and that country, even so far as regarded the rights of an individual, he had been threatened; and consequently, when the government enforced the strict performance of treaties on the one hand, it was bound to maintain a perfect neutrality on the other. The House would recollect that an attempt was made to oppose the government of Don Miguel by force, and that attempt having failed, most signally, the persons engaged in it sought refuge in Spain. Did the government of this country, then, show no sympathy with these persons? It was not bound to interfere for them, it might have left them to the government of Spain, but it took a more active and generous part. Messengers were despatched to the Spanish government, requesting it to extend the time granted to these refugees to remain in Spain; that request was granted, all means short of actual interference by force to protect these people were adopted, and it was upon an understanding with the British government, if not upon its invitation, that they came into this country. In short, every measure, except a breach of neutrality, was resorted to for the benefit of the refugees. When they came here we told them, in the most friendly but candid manner, that we would do every thing for them in our power but commit a breach of neutrality; such as recognising them as a military force, or allowing them to act as such. They found an asylum here, and the conduct of his Majesty's government displayed any thing but a want of sympathy for their sufferings. When the Marquis Barbacena first applied to the government for facilities to fit out an hostile expedition, the government was obliged to look on the refugees as an organized body of troops. As such they could not be allowed to remain in England, and they were told that if their object were to threaten the Azores, or any other portion of the territories that acknowledged the government of Don Miguel, that would be a breach of our neutrality, and we must decidedly oppose it. His right hon. friend had accused his Majesty's government of having availed itself of the existence of civil war in Terceira as a justification of its conduct, when, as he asserted, that civil war did not commence till after we had stopped the expedition going to Terceira. But he held in his hand the most indisputable proofs of the existence of civil war at Terceira antecedently to that time, and which were in the possession of his Majesty's government at the period when it gave orders for stopping that expedition. It was not necessary for him to refer to those proofs; they were on the table of the House, and would soon be in the hands of hon. members. He would only observe, that it was well known that the port of Terceira is a strong position, within the limits of which, on a memorable occasion, the Spanish and Portuguese vessels found refuge; it was equally well known, that soon after Don Miguel ascended the throne of Portugal, his authority was recognised in every part of the Portuguese dominions except this island, and there also his authority would have been recognised but for the presence of five regiments, who were in the interest of Donna Maria, and held the fortress in her name. There was a despatch on the table from General Caffiera, dated October 3rd, 1828, and he could not conceive how it was possible for any person to read that despatch and doubt for one moment that civil dissensions had existed at Terceira antecedently to that time, and that but for these regiments the whole island would have acknowledged Don Miguel. He had, he thought, fully justified his Majesty's government from the accusation of seeking a pretext in subsequent disturbances for its own antecedent conduct. The disturbances existed long prior to that part of the conduct of the government which the motion went to censure. The next question for consideration was, the character of the expedition, and his right hon. friend contended that, going unarmed from our shores, the refugees were not to be considered as a military body, and that their conduct was no breach of our neutrality. Was it then to be contended, that no expedition was a military expedition except the troops had their arms on board the same vessels with them? If they were on board one vessel, and their arms in another, did that make any difference? Was such a pretence to be tolerated by that common sense to which the hon. baronet had appealed? During the whole time the refugees were in this country the Marquis Barbacena spoke of them as troops, and General Stubbs addressed them as such in a military order of the day. Would it do, then, for the government of this country to tell all Europe that it had no knowledge of their character, and no cognizance of their departure? Arms were already provided for them at Terceira; the men were proceeding thither for the purpose of using the arms, and no person could for one moment doubt what was the real nature and character of the expedition. Some time before, the Marquis Barbacena requested permission to send some arms and ammunition out of the country, and he then distinctly declared, in answer to the foreign secretary, that they were intended for the Brazils. It was on that declaration that permission was given. The Emperor Don Pedro, it was said, was not desirous of being the Brutus of Portugal, and he was aware of the danger of committing the Brazils in the civil dissensions of her ancient European dominions. Don Pedro left the defence of the principles of liberty in Europe to the members of the English parliament. After the assurance to which he had alluded had been given—after the declaration thus made, the arms and ammunition were taken, not to the Brazils, but to Terceira, and deposited in the fort at Angra. The arms were sent previously to sending the troops, and would any man say that this did not make the expedition as completely a military expedition as ever left the shores of any country? The Marquis Palmella admitted that the arms had been sent to Angra, and he stated unequivocally that he was preparing a further supply if the quantity already sent should be insufficient for the troops. The troops were embarked on board eleven transports, and it was not possible for the government of this country, knowing all the facts of the case, to shut its eyes to the real objects of the expedition. The question had been argued as if it were a strictly legal question, and gentlemen seemed to suppose that they could settle a question of national policy by their law books. The opinions of jurists had been referred to, and the judgments of Lord Stowell had been cited with a triumphant but useless display of learning. Surely the hon. and learned member who had referred to that noble lord's opinion, ought to have recollected that, in one of the very cases mentioned, that noble lord had distinctly declared, that any persons who made use of a neutral country for the purpose of fitting out a warlike armament, to be directed against a country with which that neutral was at peace, were guilty of a breach of its neutrality. He would not, however, dwell longer on that point; he would rather take up the same ground as the hon. baronet; he would leave the law of the case to the professional gentlemen, and look at the question with a plain understanding. Would any person then say, that it made any difference that this expedition was going to defend not attack a fortress? Was not defence the act of a belligerent as well as attack, and did not the neutral who assisted the defence as much commit a breach of neutrality as if he aided an attack? Suppose Gibraltar were invested, and two or three of our battalions, in order to assist their brethren, should repair to a neutral state, and say to its government, "We are veterans, we are the subjects of one of the belligerents, we desire to assist the besieged, but in order to elude the other party, we have pulled off our red coats; we are therefore now peaceful citizens, private innocent persons; we go only as individuals, we shall find arms and ammunition there: do you only allow us to indulge the amor patriæ which we feel; allow us to refresh and recruit ourselves here, and then to proceed from your territory into the fortress of our own sovereign." That might be a very good ruse; but if such practices were to be the doctrines and principles of states, he did not see how they could preserve amicable relations with each other, or how any one of them could long remain neutral in any quarrel between two other states. Suppose the case reversed, and that Don Miguel were substituted for Donna Maria; that he had assembled troops at Plymouth, and had proceeded to attack some part of the Queen's dominions, and suppose that ministers had stood up to defend the conduct of the government in allowing him to collect a force at Plymouth, would not such a paltry distinction as that urged to justify the sailing of this expedition, be scouted with indignant derision by every patriotic member who should hear it employed to justify the government for not interfering with the expedition of Don Miguel. It was not necessary, he believed, further to discuss the question, whether the expedition were or not a breach of our neutrality, and, conceiving that it was, the next question which required to be settled was, whether or not we were justified, after that expedition had left our ports, in preventing it from reaching the place of its destination. On that point, he thought, a complete answer to the statement of his right hon. friend who opened the debate, had been given by his right hon. friend who sat near him. The Portuguese refugees and their leaders had throughout been guilty of the grossest deception towards the British government. It had been such as justly to subject them to the treatment they had received. They had made representations that were untrue—they had entered into engagements which they had not kept; and in short, they had attempted to practise a fraud on the government of the country where they had received the rites of hospitality. On their heads, therefore, and not on the head of any one of his Majesty's ministers, ought the consequences of these transactions to be visited. Were the government of this country to allow itself to be deceived in the way these refugees had deceived it, the ports of England would be selected by all the discontented people of Europe to fit out and prepare expeditions against their governments; or even expeditions to plunder and devastate other countries. It might be true, that we had no right to punish the Portuguese for their fraud, but we had a right to prevent them profiting by their fraud, particularly when doing that might have involved us in a contest with another power on account of the breach of our neutrality committed by these people. In a speech made by the brother of his right hon. friend, on the Foreign Enlistment bill, that gentleman quoted the following passage from Vattel, which he presumed was correctly quoted: "Neutrals shall not suffer themselves or their possessions to be made instrumental in doing injury to other nations. There is no law of nature or of nations—no obligations of justice—which condemn us to be the dupes of those who would lead us into such wrong." That was the doctrine he would apply to the present case—we were not to be made the dupes of these people, to commit wrong against another power. But the consequences, he believed, of such proceedings, did we permit them, would be fatal to ourselves. If we supported, or allowed fraud, we should have no remedy but to submit to it when our own rights were in question. If we allowed one hostile expedition to be prepared within our territory, ten years would not elapse, to use the remarkable words of Mr. Canning, in the debate on the Alien bill, "before this country will be made the workshop of intrigue, and the arsenal of every malecontent faction in Europe. Placed, as this country is, on the confines of the old world and the new, possessing such facilities in her manufactures, and in her natural advantages, and, above all, in her free institutions, for the purposes of hostility—it becomes her, to watch with the narrowest scrutiny that the facilities she affords are not abused to her own injury." Was it possible, when such was the language of Mr. Canning, that he should now be invoked as an authority for the opinions of those who supported the present motion? He remembered that when he was sitting by the side of Mr. Canning, as his colleague in office, that it was stated by that right hon. gentleman, shortly before the Alien act was brought forward, and when ministers were considering of the propriety of abandoning it altogether, that information had been obtained, and he knew it to be correct, that the Spanish constitutionalists—the martyrs to liberty, as the hon. baronet called them—had resolved to foment internal disorders in the dominions of Spain. Mr. Canning stated in the House, that he did not allow a day to elapse, after learning this fact, without notifying to the persons carrying on these intrigues, that "the government would not allow them to desecrate the asylum they had chosen for their protection," and at the same time, he gave information to the governor of the Spanish province threatened by these machinations of what was going on. Mr. Canning said, that it was ridiculous to suppose that, if we authorized such a line of conduct, we should not have to pay the penalties of hostility. For the interest and peace of this country—not less than for the interest and peace of other countries, he enforced on all those who resided here the strictest neutrality. "God knew," he said, "when we should see the end of the prevailing agitation—when the struggle of opinions would terminate; and no man could wish for it more than he did; but he claimed these bills in order that we might not be fooled, gulled, bullied, cheated, or deceived into hostilities, into which we never intended to enter." It could not be supposed, it would be indeed deceiving ourselves to suppose, that the champions of freedom, and the friends of unquietness would not make use of our ports and our means; we had parted with the Alien bill, we could not prevent foreigners having access to our shores—we had no longer a means of sending them summarily out of the country, and could it be believed, then, that there was a law of nations so absurd as to interdict us from using our own discretion whether hostilities, in which we had no interest, should or should not be carried on from our ports. For fifteen years we had been at peace—for fifteen years not an armament had left our shores, and if, during that period, the tranquillity of our ports and arsenals had not been disturbed by the necessity of supporting any British interest, or resenting any insult offered to the British dominions; it was too much that Portuguese refugees, who had been received here with hospitality and kindness, were to endanger our repose and the repose of all Europe, it was too much to suppose that England was to suffer herself to be made the starting-post of their animosities, and that, herself seeking and desiring peace, she was to be launched into hostilities by those who had sought refuge on her shores. As long as England remained at peace, she might be an asylum to the unfortunate, a refuge to the distressed, and a retreat to those who were weary and heavily laden, where they might lay down their burthen and be at rest. But to maintain our independence, to preserve the power of being this place of refuge, it was necessary, to use the words of Mr. Canning, that “we should not be fooled, gulled, bullied, cheated, or deceived into hostilities;” and, in order to prevent such a result, he hoped the House would join with him in rejecting the resolutions which had been proposed, and which were neither more nor less than a severe censure on the conduct of those who had prevented England from being cheated into hostilities.

On a division, the numbers appeared—for the motion, 78; against it, 191; majority, 113.

REFORM IN COURTS OF LAW.

APRIL 29, 1830.

Mr. Brougham, at the close of a long speech in illustration of his views respecting Law Reforms, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to establish Local Jurisdictions in certain districts in England. In the debate which ensued,—

MR. SECRETARY PEEL said, he wished only to address a few words to the House upon the main subject under consideration. It could not be necessary for him to say, that it was not his intention to offer any impediment to the introduction of the bill proposed; for he had placed on record his concurrence in so much of the principle and detail of the proposition, that it was quite impossible for him to dissent from the motion, though the hon. and learned gentleman's plan differed in some respects from the considerations he had submitted to the House. The hon. and learned gentleman went farther than he had been disposed to go, but both measures were based on the same principle; and in the principle of the proposition he cordially concurred. The time had arrived when it was desirable to facilitate the recovery of small debts, and bring justice in this respect as near as possible to the homes of the people. Expenses should be lessened, and he felt no objection to the establishment of local courts. He was aware of the objections which applied to exclusive and corporate jurisdictions, but it would be very easy to establish local court: to execute the general law of the land, and to steer clear of the evils which applied to local jurisdictions guided by local rules. Much had been said with reference to the inexpediency of cheap justice. If by cheap justice they were to understand bad justice, he acknowledged that nothing could be a greater evil than to make that cheap; but the introduction of cheap and good justice was not open to the objections by which cheap and bad justice might be assailed. He was well aware that it was desirable to keep down a litigious spirit amongst the population, but there was much less evil in that than in a total denial of justice, for the purpose of preventing such a spirit. It was difficult to define what was a litigious spirit. The sums trifling to one man might be important to another, and he who appealed for the recovery of his wages, the amount of which might appear to some of little concern, might feel the loss of seven or ten shillings more severely than those who legislated might feel the loss of £100. There was as much reason to facilitate the recovery of a just debt of a few shillings as of £100. It was a grievous injury to the poor, if they could not recover small sums on account of the expenses of the suit; and to measures for facilitating the recovery of such sums, he was decidedly a friend. He would tell the House what was worse than a spirit of litigation; it was that spirit of discontent which was engendered by being told that the injured had no protection, and no alternative but an acquiescence in injustice. He hoped he might be allowed to refer to the bill for the recovery of small debts which he had introduced last session. It was entitled, "A bill for the more easy recovery of small debts in England and Wales, and for the establishment of local jurisdictions for that purpose." Although his bill did not go to an equal extent with the bill now proposed to be introduced, yet there was not a single clause of it that might not be inserted in the bill of the hon. and learned gentleman, consistently with the principles of his speech that evening. He (Mr. Peel) took no credit to himself for introducing that bill, for the merit of it was entirely due to the noble lord opposite (Lord Althorp); and it was only because the bill could not be brought forward with sufficient advantage by any but an official person, that the noble lord had delivered over to him the task of proceeding with the measure. He would beg leave to mention a few of the details of his bill, to show how far they agreed with those of the hon. and learned gentleman. He would first say, that he had a great objection to the establishment of new tribunals, if the purposes for which they were intended could be accomplished by improving the old tribunals already in existence, and making them more conformable to the spirit of the times and the wants of the country. If, in such a case, it were possible so to improve the old tribunals as to meet the ends which the House had in view, it would have all the advantages attendant upon them which were derived from prescription and name. There already existed in this country an institution called the county court, which was capable of answering many of the objects of the new tribunal. He would propose to improve that court by giving to it a more extensive jurisdiction, and with that view, all that his bill intended was to increase the powers and jurisdiction of the county court. The names of these courts were familiar to the people of this country, and would claim for them a greater influence than if the House were to establish new tribunals. If, moreover, county courts were not specially abolished, they would continue in existence, and there would be two separate jurisdictions. All his bill had proposed to effect was, to increase the amount of causes in the county courts from £2 to £10. He agreed with the learned and hon. member in excluding from the county courts all cognizance of cases of freehold. The county courts were held at fixed periods, and he had specified the smallest number of sessions, which should be held; but with reference to the extent of different counties, there was a great difficulty in introducing any general measure which would suit the circumstances of all counties, and therefore he had given the quarter session the power of dividing large counties into different districts, and of specifying where county courts should be held. The magistrates of the quarter sessions could require the judges of the county courts to hold their sessions more or less frequently, if they thought that necessary. He had allowed by his bill parties having cause of action above £10 to waive their right to the surplus, and to proceed in the county courts for the remainder. He had proposed that both plaintiff and defendant should be examined in open court, and no objection should be made to a witness on the ground of incompetency, leaving his credibility to be judged of by the jury. He had required the trial by jury, but he doubted much the necessity of unanimity in their decisions in these courts. He believed that persons in the county courts at present acting as jurors, decided cases without coming to a unanimous decision. The question then was, whether the majority of the jury should not, in the proposed measure, be made capable of deciding whatever case was brought before them? This was a question for future and grave consideration. If unanimity were to be required on the part of the jury, the right of challenging them should then be allowed, and that was a machinery of rather a cumbrous nature, which he thought it would be well to exclude from such courts. He (Mr. Peel) also proposed to give this court the power to order the defendant, in case the suit was decided against him, to pay the amount awarded, if the court should so think fit, by instalments. He did not propose that in a case where an honest defendant was anxious and willing to pay out of the earnings of his labour, that he should be driven at once to execution, but he would afford him time to satisfy the demand awarded against him. Another provision he had made was, that in no case should the remedy lie against the person, but against his property, and he proposed that execution against the property should issue in whatever county it might be situated. Nothing could be more simple than the process by which these provisions were to be carried into effect. [Here the right hon gentleman read from the draft of his bill the wording of the plea, which was confined simply to the cause of action, the defendant being limited to a denial of the debt, or a proof of payment.] The fees of court were limited by a table in the Appendix, and a debt of £10 could be recovered, so far as the court was concerned, for the expense of 4s. or 5s. The expenses of witnesses it was impossible to regulate by any such means, and they would remain the same as at present. The greatest difficulty had been, to deal with the courts of exclusive jurisdiction in corporate towns. He had not abolished these, but he had given to the county courts a concurrent jurisdiction, being perfectly sure that the cheaper and better process in the new courts, would induce all persons to resort to them, and that the exclusive courts would die out of themselves. The greatest remaining difficulty was, who should be the judges, and from whom the appointment should proceed; for objections had been made to increasing the patronage of the Crown. If the residence of the judges within their counties were a sine qua non, the appointments would be objects of local patronage: but if resident, a lower salary would tempt them to accept office; and the whole object might be effected at a smaller sum than had been imagined, and certainly at much less than £130,000 a year. It was not necessary that the expense should altogether fall upon the Consolidated Fund; for the fees, though not taken by the judges, would form a fund, out of which their salaries might be paid. As to the tenure of office, the question was, whether the Judge should be a local barrister or not? If he were a practising barrister, his practice in the superior courts would give him a knowledge of the daily progress of the law, which is improved as science advances; and to make him acquainted with every improvement must be esteemed a great advantage. Besides, his residence in that seat of law from which its ramifications, as the hon. and learned gentleman had truly stated, extended to all parts of the empire, must also be considered as a circumstance which would entitle him to greater weight in the court in which he presided, than he could otherwise hope to possess. He thought he had now said enough to show that degree of concurrence in the proposition of the hon. and learned gentleman, which would naturally preclude him from any other course than that of voting for his bill. He trusted he might be allowed to consider himself the associate of the hon. and learned gentleman in these reforms, and he accordingly most cheerfully offered him his assistance; and if the hon. and learned gentleman's bill were such as would enable him to dispense with his own, he would most heartily rejoice in such a conclusion of his labours.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

MAY 17, 1830.

[The Right Honourable Secretary for the Home Department appeared to night for the first time, in the House, subsequently to his father's death, which had occurred on the 3rd of May].

Mr. E. Davenport, on presenting a petition, signed by 25,000 of the inhabitants of the town of Birmingham, praying for a Reform in the Commons House of Parliament, spoke at considerable length on the subject.

SECRETARY SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he never was more surprised than by the speech of the hon. member. The hon. gentleman had informed him that he should state, in the course of his speech, on presenting the petition, some facts in opposition to the statements which he (Sir Robert Peel) had made on a former occasion, when he had quoted various facts to show that Birmingham was not in that state of extreme and overwhelming distress, past all hopes of relief, that had been stated on several occasions. The hon. member had been since that time getting information on the spot, and, after all his local enquiries, what refutation had he given to his statements?

He had stated on a former occasion, in reply to the hon. member, that he would allow him to select what indications he pleased of increasing prosperity, and that he would leave the House to judge by the indications selected by him, whether or not Birmingham were in that state of distress described. He had then stated that there was an increased consumption of articles subject to Excise-duties, which argued no distress among the poor. He had also stated, that on all the turnpike roads about Birmingham there was a great increase of tolls, and that on every canal in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, there were proofs of an increased traffic; and the hon. gentleman, leaving his statement as to the roads untouched—leaving unnoticed his proofs of increased consumption—had stated that there was in one single canal a large increase, which he ascribed to other causes than the increase of prosperity, and which, he said, were sufficient to account for the increase of traffic on the canal. But the hon. member had by this confirmed his argument. He had not contradicted by facts, after all his enquiries, one single statement which he (Sir R. Peel) had formerly made to the House, to show that Birmingham was increasing in prosperity. The hon. member proved by his admission, that there was an increase in the prosperity of Birmingham. The only other point to which the hon. gentleman had adverted, was the increase of four-wheeled carriages. The hon. gentleman had found out that the inhabitants of Birmingham had changed their gigs into four-wheeled pony chaises, which accounted, he thought, for the increase of four-wheeled carriages. He had quoted the increase of different kinds of carriages formerly, to show that the middle and lower classes had increased in comforts. Had he referred only to such carriages as were used by the rich, he should have been told that these were the luxuries of the rich, and that the poor were suffering. He had quoted the number of two-wheeled carriages, therefore, as well as the number of four-wheeled ones, because the two-wheeled ones—the gigs—were used by the lower and middle classes, and the increase in them showed that the lower and middle classes had increased their enjoyments—their comforts and luxuries. The hon. gentleman said, that only one four-wheeled carriage had been added to the number in Birmingham for many years. He did not know where the hon. gentleman got his information, but he could assure him that the returns in his possession showed a considerably larger increase. As he wished to quote no returns not in the possession of every hon. member, if the hon. member would move for those in his possession he would second his motion.

Mr. E. Davenport said, he would save him the trouble.

Sir Robert Peel said, he did not want to be saved the trouble. He wanted the hon. member, and all other hon. members who complained of the effects of that bill which bore his name, and who continually stated that it had been productive of evil to the country—he wanted those hon. members to hear the facts which disproved their assertions. He had stated on a former occasion, that the number both of two-wheeled and four-wheeled carriages had increased in Birmingham; and he had quoted that increase to show that the people had increased in comforts and luxuries, which he took to be an indication of increasing prosperity. In order to obtain the information, he had applied to the Excise and to the Tax-office, and had required as full and accurate a return as possible of all the carriages that paid taxes. There could be no higher authority than the returns of the Excise and Tax-offices; and if their accounts of the number of four and two-wheeled carriages showed an increase in them, what better proof could be obtained of the increasing prosperity of Birmingham? He had not rested his proofs, however, on this alone. He was willing to admit that an increased revenue raised from the people, by an increase of taxation, was no proof of their increasing prosperity. But when he found, though the rate of taxation was not increased, though it was even diminished, that the revenue increased, was not that a proof that the people possessed an increased means of consumption—that they actually consumed more, and were increasing in comfort? The hon. member stated, that there was only one additional four-wheeled carriage in Birmingham for ten years: but this was a mistake; and he wished that the returns he quoted were on the table of the House, that every member might correct him if he made a misstatement. In 1819, then, the number of four-wheeled carriages in Birmingham was 38; in 1820, 38; in 1821, 38; in 1822, 44; in 1823, 55; in 1824, 68; in 1825, 94; in 1826, 106; in 1827, 137; in 1828, 157. Thus, since 1819, when the bill was passed, which the hon. gentleman said had ruined Birmingham—which the petitioners said had involved that town in bankruptcy, and made it unable to pay rates and taxes—[Mr. E. Davenport was understood to deny this. Sir Robert Peel said he had taken down the words of the petition]—this Birmingham, which had been ruined by the bill of 1819, had then only thirty-eight carriages, and in 1828 it had no less than 157. But the hon. gentleman accounted for this by saying, that the people had converted all their gigs into four-wheeled pony chaises; that all the people who had kept a taxed cart and one horse, had changed their vehicles for a pony chaise. Now, if the hon. member's statement were true, there ought to have been a great reduction of the number of two-wheeled carriages; that was the way the hon. gentleman accounted for the increase of the four-wheeled carriages. But if the gigs had been so converted, the two-wheeled carriages must be put an end to; but the returns by no means bore out the statement of the hon. gentleman. It appeared by them that the number of these vehicles in Birmingham, in 1819, was 301, and that from that time they had increased in regular progression, up to 1828, when they amounted to 470. The hon. member stated that Birmingham was in such a state of distress that it could not pay rates and taxes; but he had no hesitation in saying that Birmingham paid its taxes and rates as well now as at any period. [Mr. E. Davenport was understood again to dissent from the statement about the taxes and rates.] It was said (continued Sir R. Peel) that by the bill of 1819, Birmingham had been so much reduced, the hon. gentleman had said it, that prices had been reduced 56 per cent, while the burden of taxation had been increased beyond the power of the people to pay to the same amount. The hon. member stated as a consequence of that bill, that the inhabitants could not pay their rates and taxes; but he should be able to show that the rates and taxes were never levied there with greater ease than at present. He had a return of the arrears of rates at different years; from which it appeared, that those arrears amounted, in 1818, to £3,904; in 1820, to £8,571; and in 1829, to £1,031. He had a similar return also, as to the arrears of taxes, which he would read to the House.—In the year 1819, the amount of taxes assessed on Birmingham for the half-year ending on the 5th of April, was £18,000; of these taxes the amount paid was only £7,000, while the arrears were £11,000. In the year 1821, the arrears were £10,324. In the year 1823 they were £7,899; and in 1825, the year of prosperity, be it recollected, the arrears were £5,748. In 1828 they had fallen to £1,734, and last year they were only £2,522. Indeed, he believed that there never had been less distress at any period in Birmingham than at the present moment. The hon. member had formerly stated, that the consumption of butchers' meat in Birmingham had decreased one third; he knew not from what sources the hon. gentleman derived his information on that subject; but he was certain that the statement of the consumption of meat being one third less than it had been was not supported by the fact. To show that the condition of the working classes was not deteriorated, he would advert to the returns connected with the savings' bank. The total amount of money deposited there was about £50,000, and the total number of accounts actually opened was 3,547. In the last month the amount of money taken out was £1,252, and the amount paid in, £2,403, leaving a balance of £1,150, money paid into the savings' bank. But this was not all. The payments of every kind on every article of taxation had received a sensible increase. The taxes had increased on windows, on houses, on servants, on horses, on carriages, and on dogs, indeed on every article of luxury, enjoyment, or necessity, except two, and he would give the hon. member the full benefit to be derived from them: they were the taxes on horse-dealers and hair-powder. He thought it unnecessary to pursue this subject further. The hon. member had not been able to impugn any of the statements he had formerly put forth; and having, therefore, shown that the situation of the population of Birmingham was not such as he represented, he should not trouble the House with any further details.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF JEWISH DISABILITIES.

MAY, 17, 1830.

In the debate which took place on Mr. Robert Grant's motion, for the second reading of the Jews' Relief Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL spoke as follows:—I shall endeavour, Sir, to condense into the shortest possible compass what I have to say on the present occasion. As I had not the advantage of being here on the former discussion, I hope the House will bear with me should I trouble them with any thing that they may have heard before. I must set out by saying, that I cannot support this bill. I do not admit the principle of the bill, nor can I help objecting to the mode in which it is sought to establish that principle. The bill professes to limit itself to giving relief from all civil disabilities to all the Jewish subjects of his majesty; but that is not the sole object to which the bill is limited. I will not say that it is a bill for unchristianizing the legislature, but I will say that one of the unavoidable consequences of this measure will be, that every one of the forms and ceremonies which give us assurance of Christianity must be abolished. I take it that it follows as a legitimate consequence of this measure—that every man, to whatever sect or persuasion he may belong, will be entitled to prescribe the form of affirmation by which he may give assurance to the state of his fidelity. The session before the last we were called on to give our support to a measure for the relief of the Protestant Dissenters; and last session we passed a bill for the relief of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects; therefore it is said that we are bound, in consistency, to follow up those measures by adopting the present measure. I hear this with regret, because I hear it for the first time. In the discussions respecting either the Catholics or the Protestant Dissenters, nothing of the sort was ever intimated; it was never stated to us that because we admitted our fellow Christians to a participation of power, that therefore, as an unavoidable and necessary consequence, we were bound to admit to all the privileges of the constitution men who reject Christianity altogether. Some most forcible appeals were made to us on the ground of the common Christianity of the parties applying for relief. In the speeches of Burke, and in his recorded sentiments, as contained in his writings, we learn that he rested his strongest arguments in favour of concession to the Roman Catholics upon the Christianity of that body; so of Mr. Grattan, of Mr. Canning, and of all the great and eminent advocates of that cause; even my right hon. friend on my left, in pressing their claims upon the attention of the House last session, observed, that “when serving with Protestants in the army, they entered together the same breach, they fought together on the same field, reposed together in the same grave, and rested their hopes of future happiness upon the merits of a common Redeemer”—those appeals were forcibly made, and successfully made; for it was not to be denied that Protestants and Catholics admitted the same great doctrines of Christianity. But if this bill pass, though it may apparently be limited to the Jews, and though, confining our view solely to this bill, it does not go beyond that class of men; yet we shall, if this be agreed to, have to pass other bills most objectionable in my views of the constitution. It is perfectly obvious that if we pass this bill, it follows as a necessary consequence, that every form of oath which requires a profession of the Christian faith must be abandoned. Now, this is a most important alteration in the usages of this country. Before Catholics and Protestant Dissenters were excluded, there was still a necessity for all public functionaries to profess Christianity; from the earliest period a belief in Christianity was required as necessary to official appointments or to seats in parliament. No person who rejected Christianity could obtain office; therefore, from the first, our constitution was, to say the least of it, Christian. Here, then, we have an evident and palpable departure from the principles of the constitution, as admitted and recognised in the earliest periods; and where is the urgency of this vast change? What is it that requires this departure from the first principles of our constitution? What is the case made out respecting the Jews? It would seem—I take my information from a book which, I understand, is written by a very respectable Jew, and is considered a work of authority—that there are resident in the united kingdom about 27,000 Jews, natural-born subjects of his majesty, of whom 20,000 are resident in London, 7,000 Jews in the other parts of the kingdom; and for these 27,000 or 30,000 individuals I am invited to depart from the principle which has been acted on from the earliest period of the constitution. I am told the Jew is degraded by his exclusion—he is not excluded in the same manner that the Catholic and the Dissenter were—he is not excluded by any thing in the nature of a taunt upon his form or profession of faith. The Jew is excluded merely because the legislature requires, as the great principle of civil government, that all persons admitted to office should acknowledge the fundamental truths of the Christian religion. The Jew is not a degraded subject of the state; he is rather regarded in the light of an alien—he is excluded because he will not amalgamate with us in any of his usages or habits—he is regarded as a foreigner. In the history of the Jews, their domestic usages, their institutions respecting marriage, and in a variety of other points, we find enough to account for the prejudice which exists against them. We find them in the possession of political privileges in France, in the Netherlands, and in the United States of America—in the last during a period of forty years, and in the two former during the last fifteen years, and only two Jews have in that time been admitted to political offices [hear]. I think I understand that cheer. I understand it to mean, that, since so few have been admitted, there is no danger in admitting the English Jews to political power. Now the inference I draw from it is, that if the Jews expect to derive so little advantage from the removal of disabilities, the practical benefit to them must be very small; and for such a trifle are we to depart from what has formed for centuries one of the fundamental principles of the British constitution? Does the House suppose that the people of England are indifferent because no petitions have been laid upon the table of this House? On the contrary, I will venture to affirm, that the sense of the people of England is opposed to concessions of this nature, and I will venture to predict that the result will prove that affirmation to be well founded. If the House is prepared to lay it down as a principle that Deists, Atheists, and other infidels may hold the highest offices of the state, and possess seats in the legislature, then you must be prepared to revolt the feelings of the country. For fifteen years, in France and the Netherlands, have they been entitled to all privileges, and during forty years have they possessed those advantages in the United States; yet during the whole of those periods not one of them has obtained a seat in the legislatures of those countries, only one has been appointed to a high situation at Amsterdam, and one has been made mayor of New York; and that convinces me that the exclusion of Jews does not arise from their political incapacities, but from their own peculiar institutions and usages. So much for the principle of the measure. The mode in which it is proposed to carry it into effect I look upon as equally objectionable. Its advocates propose to abolish all disabilities on account of religious opinions. The hon. member for Clare would have every man allowed to worship God as he might think proper; but if the present bill be passed, it will not be necessary for a man to worship God at all. The Deist and the avowed infidel are admitted into parliament under this bill. From its provisions this principle necessarily flows, that political power is, and ought to be, unconnected with religious belief—that, I take it, is a legitimate consequence of its enactment. Now, if that be intended, why not avow it at once and for ever? Does any man in this House suppose that this is the last bill which will be passed upon this matter of religious freedom, as it is called? There are at the present moment three great classes of his Majesty's subjects eligible to high political office and to seats in parliament; but they are all required to be Christians; these are the Protestant Dissenters, the Roman Catholics, and the members of the Church of England—and now we are called on to admit the Jews: but are there no Christians excluded? What becomes of the Quakers? Why is not a bill brought in for their admission also? [hear] I again hail those cheers—if the Jew be admitted, there is not a doubt that the Quaker is equally well entitled. Why not one as well as the other? Are you afraid of the consequences? [No, no, no.] Observe the admission—if this bill be allowed to pass, other bills, à fortiori, must pass. Is it wise, then, to disturb yearly the religious feelings of the people of this country by separate bills for the relief of the several classes of his Majesty's subjects from the disabilities which from the earliest period the constitution imposed upon them? If the measure be right, establish it fully and for all, and let us not have a bill one year for one set of men, and another year for another. I know of no tenet of Quakerism which ought to exclude Quakers from the enjoyment of political power if the Jews are to be admitted. It is said that the relief of the Catholics placed the Jews in a worse situation than before—that the more the space was narrowed the greater was the suffering—to speak mathematically, the intensity of the suffering varied inversely with the space operated on. But I repeat, that if the Jews are entitled to this relief, so are the Quakers—so are the Separatists. On these grounds, then, Sir, I am not prepared to admit the principle, and I object to the mode of giving effect to the bill; and I confess I do so with much regret. There is nothing in the conduct of the Jews themselves which ought to create the slightest prejudice against them. The upper classes of that people are eminent for charity and sympathy with the sufferings of their fellow men, and the lower classes are not marked by any vices beyond what is common amongst persons in that rank of life. I, therefore, cannot but feel the necessity of opposition as most painful; but there has been no case of practical oppression shown, to call on us to give them relief. So far as landed estates are concerned, I see no objection to the Jews being empowered to hold them; my own opinion is, that they can do so already; but in that I, of course, submit to higher authority than my own; but my own opinion is, that it requires no new law to enable them to hold estates in land. At an early period, eleven learned judges gave it as their opinion, that Jews, being native born, are capable of holding land. But if there be doubts on the subject, I shall not object to a bill to grant them relief. The late Lord Ellenborough contented himself with such a title as a Jew could make to land; he purchased an estate of Mr. Goldschmidt, and after that I think we need have little doubt that Jews may hold land and can make good titles. With respect to the present bill, I think it cannot be so amended as to meet my views, and therefore I say, unhesitatingly, that I must oppose it; foreseeing its consequences, I cannot give it my support.

On a division, the motion for the second reading of the bill was negatived by 228 against 165; majority, 63.

ENGLISH IN ALGIERS.

MAY 20, 1830.

Sir Robert Wilson said he would ask a question of the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department. It was understood that a frigate had been some time since despatched to Algiers, with a view of removing from that city the British consul and all other British subjects resident there. When, however, the frigate arrived off the coast, the commander of the French blockading squadron, it was said, prevented the vessel from approaching Algiers, and she was obliged to proceed to Malta. Now, he asked if any mode had been adopted to carry the original intention of Government into effect, or whether the French admiral, having sent the frigate away, had taken any measure to secure the safety of those persons?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he could give the hon. and gallant member a very satisfactory answer. It was well known that a blockade of Algiers had for some time been undertaken by a French squadron; and when it became notorious that France was fitting out a very considerable expedition against that place, the British government thought it right to despatch a frigate to remove the wives and children of British subjects from Algiers, in order that they might not be present during the siege. The British frigate arrived there, and took on board all the women and children, except the wife of the consul, who was unable to leave the place in consequence of illness, and could not, therefore, take advantage of the opportunity. On leaving Algiers a communication took place between the captain of the British ship of war, and the officer who had the chief command of the French blockade flotilla. That individual intimated a doubt to the commander of the British frigate, whether he could, consistently with his instructions, permit him to return to take away the wife of the British consul; but he said that he would state the circumstance to his admiral, and ask his orders. The instructions, in all cases of blockade, were, he believed, the same; but it was customary to admit exceptions in the case of packets, and certain ships of friendly nations. Previously, however, to the French admiral giving his opinion on the subject, the French government itself heard of the circumstance, and immediately interfered. There was no necessity for making any further application, as the French government stated at once that the officer had misconstrued his instructions, and that there was not the least intention of interrupting the usual system which prevailed between friendly nations. Even before the British government had sent the ship of war to remove the women and children to this country, the French government had taken measures to secure the safety of all Europeans in Algiers.

Sir. R. Wilson said, he was perfectly gratified and delighted with the statement of the right hon. secretary.

MEXICO.

MAY 20, 1830.

Mr. Huskisson having brought up a petition from the merchants of Liverpool, relating to their commercial intercourse with Mexico,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he felt that he should not only be excused, but that he should stand justified, if he abstained from entering into the discussion of any of those important points upon which his right hon. friend had touched. He did not quarrel with the introduction of those points by his right hon. friend in the speech he had just delivered. His objection to enter upon the discussion of them was founded on higher grounds. He stood there in a position different from that of his right hon. friend. His right hon. friend had very justly observed, that he spoke there as an individual member of that House. The government, consequently, were not responsible for the opinions expressed, or the doctrines laid down, by his right hon. friend. This, however, was not the place in which he (Sir R. Peel) as a minister, ought to enter into a discussion of the future policy of the country. Neither should he be justified in going into those questions of national rights upon which his right hon. friend had touched; for though these were apparently of an abstract nature, yet his right hon. friend had given them a practical application. He felt, therefore, that duty imposed silence upon him with regard to these topics. Upon one point only of his right hon. friend's speech did he feel himself at liberty to say any thing. His right hon. friend had insisted on two things; first, he had said that England had imposed upon itself an obligation to protect Mexico and Colombia from any attack on the part of Spain from the island of Cuba; and that England had contracted this obligation in consequence of past transactions, but especially in consequence of an interdict which she had laid upon these provinces, forbidding them, it was said, from making an attack on Cuba. Secondly, his right hon. friend had laid down, that England, in conjunction with the other powers, had a right to prevent Spain from continuing hostilities against Mexico and Colombia. On the latter point he felt it his duty to abstain from discussion, because it would lead him into the future policy of this country. With respect to the first point, he must preface what he had to say by the expression of the regret he felt that any misunderstanding should have gone abroad on a subject of so much importance. The question was simply this—whether any such interdict had been laid by this country on Mexico and Colombia as ought to call upon us to prevent an expedition against those provinces, on the part of Spain, from Cuba. It was with surprise that he heard his right hon. friend say, that there had been such an interdict; for the language of Mr. Canning, both in that house, in the cabinet, and in his despatches, was, that England would maintain a strict neutrality in the contest between Spain and her colonies. Mr. Canning had indeed said, that this country deplored the continuance of those hostilities; but he had, at the same time, invariably said England would preserve a strict neutrality in the contest. Now, he was bound to admit that if this country had interdicted Mexico and Colombia from attacking Cuba, or that if it had prevented such an attack by remonstrances, which amounted to an interdict, then in such a case we should have departed from that strict and impartial neutrality which was invariably professed by Mr. Canning. With this view, the propriety of which he presumed no one would be found to question, he could not help feeling that the character of that distinguished statesman was deeply involved in the solution of the question; and the House therefore, he was sure, would think him justified in going into some details, for the purpose of removing the misconception which had unhappily gone abroad respecting this affair. In the first place, then, he was prepared to deny the existence of any such interdict, or of remonstrances which would amount to an interdict. There was no written record, as his right hon. friend admitted, of any thing of the kind; and this, if such interdict or remonstrances had been made, was at once against the established usage of the office, and at total variance with the custom of Mr. Canning, who was no less remarkable for punctuality in the business of his office, than he was for brilliancy of eloquence and cogency of reasoning in the discharge of his duties in that House. The absence, then, of any written record was the first ground on which he denied that there had been any such interdict or remonstrance. In the next place, if there had been such an interdict, it was certain that it was never issued at the instance of Spain. Spain certainly was never aware of the obligation she would have owed to us for such an interference on our part. If such an interference had taken place, it was not probable that Mr. Canning would have suffered Spain to remain in ignorance of it; but there was nothing in the communications with that country to warrant the belief that Spain was ever informed that any thing of the kind took place. He was not discussing the point as to what course ought to have been taken, or what we did take, but whether, even if we had taken that course, so far as to advise the governments of Mexico and Colombia, it would have entailed upon us the moral obligation to make a defensive alliance with those powers now, to prevent any attack by Spain from Cuba upon them. It was true that in 1820 the government of the United States did advise the governments of Colombia and Mexico to abstain from any attack on Cuba, on the ground that Russia was disposed to offer her mediation with Spain. On the 20th of December, 1820, Mr. Clay wrote to Mr. Salassa, the minister of Colombia at Washington, informing him of the proposed mediation of the Russia between Spain and her colonies; and, alluding to an expedition which he understood to be then in preparation at Carthagena, destined against Cuba or Porto Rico, he mentioned that the abstaining from sending such an expedition would have a salutary influence in that mediation; he hoped, therefore, that the government of Colombia would see the importance of abstaining from the intended attack. Now surely it would not be contended, that if Colombia had acted upon that advice, the United States would have thereby contracted an obligation to make a defensive alliance with it against any attack from Cuba. The answer of Mr. Salassa to that communication was important: he said, that as to the wish of the United States for suspending any attack about to be made by Colombia on Cuba, he would lose no time in communicating it to his government; but at the same time he felt it necessary to state, that neither by official communication, nor otherwise, had he any information that such an attack was intended. He believed the report to be rather the result of conjecture, founded, probably, upon the fitness of the time and opportunity for making such an attack. He added, that this government wanted not the opportunity, for that such an attack would, no doubt, be very desirable to many of the inhabitants of Cuba itself. But in the whole of this communication he never once mentioned England, or that any wish had been expressed on her part that such an attack should not take place. There must, then, he conceived, be some mistake on the part of his hon. and gallant friend (Sir Robert Wilson) on the point as to the advice of Mr. Canning. ["No, no," from Sir R. Wilson.] It was certain, however, that he could find no trace of any such advice having been given, and he was in the ministry at the time. The second point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was, that Spain had no notice of the interference, nor was in any way aware of the obligation she was under to this country on that account—an obligation which, as he had observed, Mr. Canning would not have lost the opportunity of letting Spain know that she owed us. This fact was of itself a strong one against the probability that any advice had been given, or request made, on the part of the government of this country; but he held in his hand a document which he thought afforded conclusive proof of the accuracy of his view of the case. He knew it was not the practice to introduce official documents of this kind in discussions in the House; but the nature of the present case, referring in a great degree to the character of Mr. Canning, would justify this departure from the ordinary practice. The document which he held in his hand was a copy of a despatch from Mr. Canning to Mr.

Dawkins, our minister, who was proceeding to the congress at Panama. In this despatch, dated March, 1826, Mr. Canning pointed out how earnestly it was desired by the United States, by France, and by this country, that Cuba should remain a colony of Spain; but it was added, that the British government was so far from denying the right of the Mexican state to attack Cuba, as the colony of a country with which she was at war, that we had not even joined the United States of North America in the intimation given to Mexico and Colombia, that the abstaining from such an attack would be desirable, or made any communication which would show that an attack on that island would annoy us. This fact, coupled with the absence of any document of Mr. Canning's in the Foreign Office showing that any formal communication was made to the Mexican government on this subject, was, he thought, conclusive that no such communication was ever made. It was very probable, that in the course of conversation with the Mexican minister, Mr. Canning might have pointed out the danger which would have attended a plan with respect to Cuba, which had for one of its objects the creating an insurrection among the slaves of that island. Mr. Clay himself, it was certain, did point out the impolicy of putting arms into the hands of one part of the population for the destruction of the other, and it was probable that, in conversation with the Mexican minister, Mr. Canning might have expressed his concurrence in that view, and also have pointed out the danger that would arise to Jamaica and others of our West-India colonies, from the example of arming the slaves of Cuba. Such conversation he had no doubt did take place; but there existed no record of any communication of the kind having been made to the Mexican or Colombian government. On the contrary, he appealed to the document which he had just read, to show that, whatever Mr. Canning might have thought on the subject, he had never pledged the authority of this country to any endeavour to prevent war from being carried on against Cuba, though it was probable that he might, in conversation, have expressed an opinion that such an attempt would be by no means desirable. What he had now offered was, he hoped, sufficient to vindicate this country from any moral obligation to defend Mexico from any attack by Spain, through Cuba. At the same time he would admit, that this country was by no means indifferent to the condition of the new states of South America, or had any wish but that they should consolidate their power. We had shown, and France and the United States had shown, that they, that the whole world, had an interest in the tranquillity of those states. He did not know where his right hon. friend had got the information of the intended attempt again to reduce them under the dominion of Spain, but he owned he should regret to hear of any attempt of that kind. He spoke of this, not viewing it as a question of abstract right, but rather as one in which this country would offer her advice, in a tone of friendship to Spain, and he believed that never was there a time when she was more disposed to listen to that advice than at present; and knowing this, we should not discharge our duty towards her as a friendly state, if we did not strenuously recommend that she should not waste the resources she still possessed in a fruitless attempt to reduce those states which were formerly her colonies; and that, if she did not recognise their independence, she should at least cease to carry on a war against them. He would not enter into the question of the right we might have to demand this, for that would be entering into the question of our future policy, upon which he did not think it would be prudent for him to touch in a discussion of this kind; but undoubtedly, in common with every other maritime power, we had an interest in the restoration of tranquillity between the new states of South America and Spain, inasmuch as the continuance of hostilities would keep up those piratical attacks, which were so frequent upon the commerce of all nations in the seas adjoining those states. Spain had, indeed, a strong interest in preventing the loss of her possessions of Cuba and Porto Rico; but beyond these she ought not to look; for there was no doubt that she would never be able to regain those she had lost; and the greatest curse which could fall upon her would be to gain temporary possession of two or three fortified places in those states. The whole of her influence in Europe would be paralysed by her attempts to keep up even a few small places against the will of the people. For the sake of the interest of Spain herself, then, he should regret any attempt of the kind; and he earnestly hoped she would attend to the advice she received this day from England, of whose goodwill she must now be convinced. Nothing would be more injurious to Spain than such a course. There were examples in her own history, to which his right hon. friend had alluded, which it would be well for her to imitate. In the year 1609 she listened to the friendly advice of other powers, to agree to a truce with the states of the Netherlands, which, though it did not bring about a recognition of their independence immediately, yet eventually led to that, and had the effect, with some slight interruptions, of putting an end to the sanguinary contests which she had carried on against them. This, however, was not the only instance in her history in which she had recognised the principle of friendly mediation; and there was one in which it would have been well for this country if it had taken such mediation and advice in the prudent and friendly spirit in which it was offered. In the contest in which we were engaged with our North American colonies, Spain, in the year 1779, seeing the fruitlessness of the attempts we were making to retain dominion over those colonies against the wishes of their inhabitants, did, as a friendly state, offer her advice, that if we did not choose to recognise the independence of those states, we should at least, as we had suffered considerably in the contest, cease from hostilities,—that a truce should be agreed upon for a time, which, without any compromise of the right of either party at the moment, might lead eventually to an amicable termination of the contest. This advice we rejected, and what did we gain by it? After continuing the contest for a few years, we were obliged to do that which it would have been much better to have done sooner—we recognised the independence of the United States. Spain was now in a situation nearly similar to the situation of England then; and if she rejected the friendly advice which England and other states gave her, she would find that none but baneful consequences would follow. He did hope, however, that she would be induced to listen to the friendly counsel she received, and not waste herself in a fruitless contest, that could never restore her the dominion over her colonies, and would forfeit for her the goodwill of those powers which were now anxious to promote her interests, and effect an accommodation between her and her former colonies. In these few remarks he hoped the House would find a proof that the ministers of this country had not looked with an eye of indifference on the prosperity and political relations of the new States of America. Another, and a very delicate point to which his right hon. friend had called the attention of the House, was the views of the United States towards part of the Mexican territory. He hoped that those states, possessing as they did the freest institutions, which had claimed credit to themselves for being the advocates of freedom every where, would be too generous to take advantage of the weakness of Mexico, and trench upon her independence as a state by the appropriation of any part of her territory. If in the moment of her strength they had by their advice prevented her from attacking Cuba, and now took advantage of her being attacked from that quarter, to prey on her weakness and her distractions, they would be acting inconsistently with their declarations, and doing that which would redound but little to their honour or their character as a free state; but he owned he entertained no suspicions of the kind. He relied with confidence on the statements of the American minister to this country, than whom a more honourable man did not exist, that America had no wish to take advantage of either Mexico or Spain, or to possess herself of any of those portions of territory to which his right hon. friend had alluded. Undoubtedly it would not be consistent with the interests of England that America should make any such addition to her territories, or occupy any part of the Mexican States by settlers or otherwise; but he repeated, he had no suspicion of her disposition to do so. He trusted he had stated sufficient to maintain his chief point—that we were not bound to enter into a defensive alliance with Mexico, to prevent any attack from Spain through Cuba. He would not enter upon the abstract right or policy of this country with respect to any such interference, for the reason he had already assigned; but he must contend, that his right hon. friend had not made out a case to show that we were at all bound to act defensively for Mexico.

In the course of the debate which followed, and during the speech of Mr. Baring, Sir Robert Peel interposed to explain, that the hon. member had misunderstood him. What he said was, that there never was a time when Spain and this country were on more friendly terms than at present. From this circumstance he inferred the greater probability of a satisfactory settlement.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

MILLBANK PENITENTIARY.

MAY 21, 1830.

Mr. G. Dawson having moved, that a sum not exceeding £21,135 be granted to defray the expense of the Penitentiary at Millbank for the year 1830, Mr. Hume objected to the vote, and recommended the subject to the serious consideration of the right hon. the Secretary of State.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply, said, that he rejoiced in the opportunity afforded him by the hon. member, of entering into some explanations on this subject. He confessed he felt as deeply as the hon. member the importance of the subject, not more from the circumstances connected with it to which he had adverted, than from others to which he had not directed his attention. The whole question was so connected with that other most important question—the infliction of secondary punishments—that he really thought it worthy of the strictest investigation; and that investigation he courted, not to relieve himself from any responsibility, but in order that the best information might be obtained respecting the infliction of secondary punishments, and the prevention of offences. He had, indeed, been at all times most anxious to further the admission of strangers and foreigners into all places appropriated to the punishment of offenders; because he thought it of great importance that the country and the government should be able to avail themselves of the information and suggestions which such visits might call forth. The hon. member had put to him a number of questions on the subject of the management of the Penitentiary, as connected with the present system of punishment; and he would answer these questions with all the fairness and candour which the hon. gentleman could desire. The hon. member commenced by asking him to say, if it were his opinion that the advantages of the Penitentiary were not counterbalanced by the expense attendant on its management? Now, certainly, if the question to be agitated at the present moment were—whether or not it would be expedient to expend £500,000 on a building of that description—he confessed he should pause before he gave his assent to it. But the real question to be considered was, whether it must not be more advantageous to avail ourselves of the benefits which the possession of such a building afforded, than to abandon it at once after so great an outlay, which could not be recalled? It ought to be known that the Penitentiary was not in reality governed by the Secretary of State, but by a committee appointed by the Privy Council for the purpose of giving advice to the Secretary of State on every thing connected with the management of prisoners. These gentlemen performed their duty gratuitously, but with great advantage to the country; and although he confessed very candidly that he, at one time, entertained a very strong opinion on the propriety of placing every department connected with the administration of secondary punishments under the immediate control of the Secretary of State, still he had no reason to regret the decision of the committee of the House, which had been appointed at his request to enquire into the subject. The members of that committee were gentlemen, a great majority of whom were not favourable to the government. Mr. H. G. Bennett, who at that time took a prominent part in the discussions of the House, was their chairman; Mr. Hobhouse, and many others of the opposition were among its members; and he was bound to confess that they differed with him on the propriety of placing the Penitentiary under the government of the Secretary of State, and thought it better and more satisfactory that it should continue under the management of a number of gentlemen of high character and experience, such as those who formed the committee. Having said thus much with respect to the management, he would now proceed to notice some of the hon. member's other objections. The hon. member complained of the salary of the superintendent. He differed with him on that point. He believed that some reductions might be made in the general establishment; but when it was considered that the committee acted gratuitously, and that the whole expense of management was the salary of the superintendent, he thought it of great importance that they should have in that office a gentleman of education and character, and of such a situation in life as would be a guarantee for the proper discharge of the very important duties appertaining to his office. The hon. member, however, objected to the establishment altogether. What would he do with it? If it were offered for sale to the Middlesex magistrates, he apprehended they would give for it but a very small portion of the worth or of the money it had cost. [Mr. Maberly said, "Give it to them; make them a present of it."] Now, really considering that the hon. member who made that suggestion was a great economist, it was a little surprising that he should offer to give away a building which cost so much, when they must immediately after erect another of some kind, although perhaps not quite so extensive. They could not transport all who were found guilty of offences, although the propositions of the hon. member for Montrose would go to the extinction of all imprisonment, except for life. There were some classes of offenders who must always be excepted—young females, for instance, who might probably be sentenced for a first offence, and who did not come within the description of hardened criminals. He begged, however, to admit at once, that while he denied the propriety of the hon. member's suggestions on the subject of transportation, he had not the slightest objection to the appointment of a select committee for the purpose of enquiring into the comparative advantages of the convict system, and of transportation. The hon. gentleman said, he would transport all, both young and old; the young to increase the population of the colony, and the old to become young. He would be glad to know, however, what benefit was to be received from transporting offenders of seventy or eighty years of age, or of what advantage they could be to the colonies? He was convinced, that a system of secondary punishment, by compelling convicts, under good discipline, to serve at the public works, was one calculated to prevent crime, and to prove beneficial to the offender, as well as profitable to the country. By a letter from the Navy Board, which he held in his hand, he found that the expense of the convicts in the hulks was £70,500, while the produce of their labour amounted to £67,570; and to this was to be added the labour in the Ordnance Department, which produced £9,092. At Bermuda, too, the labour of the convicts had been found highly productive. The hon. member blamed him, too, for not sending every female offender to the colonies, where they were so much wanted. Now, in order to show how much difference of opinion prevailed on this subject, he begged the hon. member to hear the language applied to a system of transportation of that kind, by Mr. Halford, a gentleman who had lately published a pamphlet on the subject. Mr. Halford there says, he wanted language to express his objections to the monstrous principle which seemed to be adopted by the Secretary of State, in sending out females to the colonies, with a regard to the wants of those colonies rather than to the nature of the crime. He mentioned this, not for the purpose of combating Mr. Halford's arguments, but to show that the situation of a Secretary of State, amidst such conflicting opinions, was not a very agreeable one; for, although he had adopted the practice of sending out a number of female convicts in consequence of overwhelming considerations of morality, repeatedly urged on the Home Office, he was here charged with the crime of defrauding the Penitentiary in order to increase the number of female convicts. It was obvious, however, that New South Wales had long outgrown all the objects for which it was chosen as a place of transportation—for if young and active profligates were to have the assurance that they could support themselves in ease and comfort the moment they were sent out of this country at an expense of £30 or £40 to the government, transportation became an object to be coveted rather than avoided. It was, indeed, in the contemplation of the government to endeavour to make the punishment of transportation, when had recourse to, much more severe than at present, not only as a punishment, but as an effectual preventive of crime. In England transportation was not much dreaded: in Ireland it was. The inhabitants of that country seemed to have a peculiar dislike to be separated from their country and their kindred. In all agricultural countries this feeling seemed also to prevail; but in England the people of large towns were little affected at the prospect of being sent to a distant colony, and the change of scenery appeared rather to possess attractions for them. It was for this reason that he thought the infliction of secondary punishments at home was preferable to transportation to New South Wales. But then the hon. member recommended the selection of new colonies for that purpose. If the government were to adopt that recommendation, it was much to be feared that the hon. gentleman would not be much satisfied with it on the score of economy. If convicts were sent to a colony there must be labour for them, or the object of transportation would be lost. When, however, this difficulty was surmounted, the necessity of providing a surgeon, a chaplain, a guard, and all the other requisites for the settlement, would lead to an expense which the hon. member would not be prepared for. The cost of the establishment at New South Wales had taught them the danger of embarking in plans of that kind. Bermuda, however, was admirably calculated for all the purposes of transportation. There labour was needed, and by a judicious system it was supplied in abundance, and he believed there were now above 1,200 convicts employed in the works. In other places—in Canada for instance—the same facilities were not afforded for that purpose, because, if the convicts were to be moved from place to place, they must have a guard of some strength to accompany them, and buildings must be provided for their reception. He mentioned these things, not to prevent enquiry, but to encourage it. He thought the subject one of great importance, well deserving the most serious investigation. He knew that many different opinions were entertained respecting it; but he stated his opinion, that the labour of the hulks was the most economical method of disposing of the time of the convicts, and that it deserved encouragement. He repeated, however, his former declaration, that if the House were of opinion that a sufficient time had elapsed since the last enquiry, and that the state of New South Wales was so much altered as to render it inexpedient to make it longer a place of transportation, although he did not by any means wish to relieve himself from the responsibility of his situation, yet he should feel glad to see the whole of the subject thoroughly investigated by a select committee.

Colonel Davies, having commenced by saying that the right hon. gentleman had changed his opinions on this subject, because he had formerly rejected all enquiry into the general management of county penitentiaries—

Sir R. Peel denied that he had expressed any opinion with respect to them now, and observed that any meddling with the management of county jails by the local magistracy, after the counties had been persuaded to expend £20,000 or £30,000 in their erection, would be calculated to destroy all confidence in the government.

Sir Robert Peel, in reply to some remarks by Mr. Maberly, said, there was no analogy between the situation of a colonel in the army and the governor of a prison; he had experienced great difficulty in getting a gentleman of the attainments and character he deemed necessary, to fill the situation.

The vote was ultimately agreed to.

THE KING'S ILLNESS—MESSAGE FROM THE THRONE.

MAY 24, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEELE brought up the following Message from His Majesty, which was read by the Speaker:—

“GEORGE R.

“His Majesty thinks it necessary to inform the House that he is labouring under a severe indisposition, which renders it inconvenient and painful to his Majesty to sign, with his own hand, the public instruments which require the sign-manual.

“His Majesty relies on the dutiful attachment of Parliament to consider, without delay, the means by which his Majesty may be enabled to provide for the temporary discharge of this important function of the Crown, without detriment to the public service.”

Sir Robert Peel then said: I am confident that I shall be acting in concurrence with the unanimous feeling of the House, if I proceed immediately to move an Address, expressive of the deep regret of his Majesty's faithful Commons at the intelligence just communicated, respecting the indisposition under which his Majesty is labouring, and conveying to the foot of the Throne the earnest prayer of the House of Commons, that his Majesty may be speedily restored to health. The address I shall propose will, in addition, merely pledge the House to take into consideration, with the least practicable delay, the means which may enable his Majesty to provide for the attachment of the royal signature to the public instruments that require it. Perhaps it may be convenient to state, that the bill for effecting the object in view will originate in the House of Lords, and it will therefore not be necessary to move immediately that the message be taken into consideration. I beg to move, "That an Address be presented to his Majesty, to return the thanks of this House for his most gracious message—to assure his Majesty that his faithful Commons have heard with the deepest regret that his Majesty is labouring under severe indisposition, and that they earnestly pray, under the favour of Divine Providence, that his Majesty may be speedily restored to health—to assure his Majesty that this House will, with the least practicable delay, proceed to the consideration of such measures as may enable his Majesty to provide for the temporary discharge of that important function of the Crown referred to in his Majesty's most gracious message."

Mr. Brougham seconded the motion, and the address was agreed to, nem. con.

AFFAIRS OF GREECE.

MAY 24, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL brought up and laid upon the table, by command of his Majesty, papers relating to Greece. In moving (he said) that they do lie upon the table, I feel it my duty, as the House has had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the contents of the papers, not only to abstain from any discussion upon them, but from all reference to them. It may be convenient, however, to state shortly what are the transactions to which they refer. They may be divided under three heads: First, Protocols from the date of the signature of the treaty between this country, France, and Russia, on the 6th of July, 1827, to the 14th of the present month: Second, Protocols of conferences which took place at Constantinople, between the ministers of the Allied Powers and the Porte, from the period of the signature of the treaty, to that of the departure of the ministers of the Allied Powers from the Turkish capital: and Third, documents relating to three transactions, not immediately connected with the execution of the treaty, but still growing out of it, and which parliament expressed a desire to have an opportunity of inspecting. Those three transactions are—The convention concluded at Alexandria by Sir E. Codrington, for the evacuation of the Morea; papers relating to the blockade of the Dardanelles by Russia, and to the circumstances connected with it; and documents regarding the raising of the Greek blockade at Patras and other places. I feel it my duty also to state, that the expectations entertained by his Majesty's government, that his Royal Highness Prince Leopold would become the sovereign of Greece, have been disappointed, and that he has signified to his Majesty's government his determination to relinquish the trust he had undertaken. All the papers connected with the acceptance of the trust, and with its resignation, will be presented to the House in the course of a few days; and, until the House is in possession of the requisite information, it will be much better for me to abstain from making any observations.

After some observations from Mr. Brougham, Mr. Hume, and Lord John Russell,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he laid the documents on the table of the House, and in doing so he conceived it was proper to state what they were, but strictly to avoid any comments upon them until they should be in the hands of hon. members. He thought he was bound to observe that course in fairness to the House, and to the parties interested, he being now acquainted with their contents, and other hon. members not having that advantage. As to the questions which had been asked, he should willingly reply to them, but in doing so he wished to avoid all discussion. In answer to the question of the hon. member for Aberdeen, he had to state, that full information would be found in those papers respecting the pecuniary engagements of this country, arising out of the negotiations to which the papers he had just laid upon the table of the House referred. The noble lord opposite enquired whether differences respecting loans, or a disagreement relative to the proposed territorial limits of Greece, formed the grounds on which the negotiations were broken off? On a former occasion he stated, that all the great points had been settled, which, up to that time, had been raised between the Allies and Prince Leopold.

He understood since, however, that points of difference arose which were of a pecuniary nature. The Prince's resignation, however, was also connected with other questions. The House, he repeated, would be in possession of the papers within four-and-twenty hours, and then, but not until then, he should consider that they were in a condition to discuss the question.

Mr. Agar Ellis was desirous of knowing whether it were information recently received from Greece that decided Prince Leopold in breaking off those negotiations?

Sir Robert Peel said, that in the communications between Prince Leopold and his Majesty's government, his Royal Highness stated, that in despatches received from Greece, he certainly had received information which had decided his conduct on the matter of his resignation.

Mr. Brougham, adverting to what fell from his noble friend behind him, in which the resignation of Prince Leopold was spoken of as "unfortunate," confessed that he considered it as any thing but unfortunate. He should rejoice in any thing calculated to promote the honour and glory of that illustrious personage, but he could not help considering it an excellent thing that his resignation enabled this country to avoid the entanglement which the acceptance of that sovereignty might eventually have brought about.

Sir Robert Peel again recommended the postponement of any further discussion until hon. members were in possession of the papers.

Lord John Russell explained—he used the term "unfortunate" in the usual way in which that term was applied to negotiations terminating unsuccessfully.

MEXICO.

MAY 24, 1830.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, Sir Robert Wilson rose to call the attention of the right hon. baronet (Sir Robert Peel) to the important subject on which a petition had been presented to the House on the 20th instant, and which concerned the credit, the interest, and the prosperity of the country—the Petition from the Merchants of Liverpool relating to Mexico.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply, said he was sorry that his hon. friend had renewed the discussion on this subject, and he was confident that the hon. member and the representatives of the states of Mexico and Colombia were not consulting the true interests of those countries, by wishing to fasten on England an engagement to enter into a defensive alliance with them against Spain; an alliance which no minister of this country ever contemplated, and which, he repeated, it was injurious to the interests of those states for their representatives to insist on, through any construction put on the correspondence of Mr. Canning. There never, indeed, was any thing clearer than that Mr. Canning had not by any language in any public document, interdicted Mexico and Colombia from the fair aggression of belligerents against Spain, and that he had not entered into any obligation, either formal or moral, to assist those states against Spain in consequence of their refraining from their contemplated attack on Cuba. What, however, had his hon. friend done? He had produced no authenticated document from the Foreign Office—no paper bearing the signature of Mr. Canning; but he had read to the House the memoranda of a series of conversations which the Mexican and Colombian ministers are said to have had with Mr. Canning; but memoranda of conversations which that minister never saw, and which he had not, by his signature, acknowledged to be genuine. The hon. member, however, said, that the reason why these documents were not to be found in the Foreign Office arose from the circumstance of the ministers of the new states not being at that time formally received in this country, or acknowledged by the ministers of foreign affairs. Whether, however, they were ministers or agents, there could not be the slightest doubt, that if any such admission as that attributed to Mr. Canning had been made in these conferences, some notice of it would have been found in the Foreign Office; and, had any such document been found, its validity would have been acknowledged, though the ministers of those states were not at the time recognised. In the discussion on a former evening, he had stated distinctly, that although Mr. Canning declared an invasion of Cuba, in the manner and under the circumstances of that contemplated by Mexico, would be displeasing to Great Britain, still no interdict of any kind whatever had been laid on either Mexico or Colombia from prosecuting the war, if they thought proper. When General Santa Anna had assembled about 700 men in the province of Yucatan and issued his proclamation, this country and the United States of America did protest, as they had a right to do, against the attempt to conquer Cuba through an insurrection of the slaves; but they did not attempt to restrain the fair use of the Mexicans' rights as belligerents, when exercised according to the acknowledged rules of war, against Spain. His hon. friend said, however, that Mr. Canning advised the Mexicans not to invade Cuba. Why, at that time the new States of America were not recognised by this country; but even if they had been, he expressly denied that Mr. Canning adopted any other course than that of expressing the dislike of this country to that mode of warfare which the States seemed disposed to adopt. It was with great reluctance that he referred to any unpublished official documents, but he had already on a former occasion, for the special reasons he had then stated, referred to the letter of Mr. Canning to Mr. Dawkins, to which no answer had been or could be given. Mr. Canning is supposed to have promulgated the interdict in 1824; yet when writing to Mr. Dawkins shortly afterwards (and he would quote the passage at length, to set the question at rest as far as that could be done by Mr. Canning's authority), Mr. Canning said, "You will see how earnestly it is desired by the United States, by France, and by this country, that Cuba should remain a colony of Spain. The British Government, indeed, so far from denying the right of the new States of America to make a hostile attack upon Cuba, whether considered as the possession of a power with whom they are at war, or as an arsenal from which expeditions are fitted out against them, that we have uniformly refused to join with the United States in remonstrating with Mexico and Colombia against the supposed intention, or in intimating that we should feel displeasure at the execution of it." Then followed the passage which he quoted the other night, "We should indeed regret it, but we arrogate to ourselves no right to control the military operations of one belligerent against another." This was the clear and express language of Mr. Canning at the very time when the hon. member supposed he was interdicting the invasion. He would state, also, one other fact, which was convincing on the subject. In the year 1826 Mexico and Colombia, so far from thinking themselves interdicted, actually determined on fitting out an expedition to blockade the Havannah, and it was announced at the same time, that the President of Mexico meditated the collection of a body of troops, to be marched from various places, in order to co-operate with the blockading squadron for the reduction of Cuba. At that time Mr. Canning was informed of the expedition, and the British minister wrote to him, communicating the nature of the expedition, and asking for instructions. In answer to the demand for instructions on those points which were likely to arise with reference to the interests of England, Mr. Canning replied, that it was necessary for the writer to make a division somewhat more distinct than he had made, before he could answer his questions; but not one word was to be found of surprise at the communication, as there naturally would have been had any interdict existed as to the invasion of Cuba. That fact could not, at such a moment, have been passed over in the instructions for the conduct of the British agent, if such an interdict had been ever put forth by Mr. Canning.

Sir R. Wilson said, that the blockade was prevented.

Sir R. Peel—the blockade was prevented by internal dissensions among the states, but not by the interference of England. The right hon. gentleman concluded by repeating his former declarations, that there was no obligation, either moral, or imposed by treaty, on Great Britain, to protect Mexico from attacks on the side of Cuba; and he protested against the reception of unauthorized memoranda of conversations in the discussion of a question of this kind, for the purpose of establishing a claim to a defensive alliance, which never was contemplated by any member of the Government of this country.

Sir R. Wilson intimated an opinion that it was only in March last that Mexico received permission to invade Cuba.

Sir R. Peel repeated, that the South American States knew they were at liberty to do so throughout the whole period, and that in 1826 they showed a disposition to act on that opinion. Some stress had been laid on the supposition that Mr. Canning advised the Mexicans not to invade Cuba. He denied that Mr. Canning did so; but if he had, he (Sir R. Peel) was prepared to contend, that at the time when Mr. Canning was endeavouring to prevail on Spain to recognise these States, he had a perfect right to advise the Mexicans to abstain from offending Spain by an attack on Cuba.

PUNISHMENT OF FORGERY.

MAY 24, 1830.

In a Committee on the Punishment of Forgeries' Bill, Sir James Mackintosh moved, as an amendment upon the original motion, to leave out the words "suffer death" for the crime of Forgery, and to insert in lieu thereof, "transportation beyond the seas, for life, or for fourteen years, or seven years, or imprisonment and hard labour, or solitary confinement, as to the court may seem proper."

On the question being put,

SIR ROBERT PEELE rose and said, that if he had expected, when he came into the House that evening, to find the question of forgery treated as a party question, and as one by which the fate of a ministry might be decided, such an impression would have been removed by the great, not to say lavish, encomiums bestowed on his humble exertions by the right hon. gentleman. But he entered the House with no such impression, knowing, and he rejoiced at it, that the time was at length come when they could consider all the questions connected with the criminal law of the country, as no party questions, nor be liable in discussing them to have their attention diverted from the sound reasons which ought to determine their conduct, and from the interests of those classes for which they were called on to legislate. He wished to defer to the views of the right hon. gentleman and the great body of the petitioners; and if he had been compelled to adopt a conclusion different from theirs, he could assure them that it was after deliberate consideration that he had attained to the honest conclusion, that it would be better to preserve the punishment of death for forgery than abandon it. He had no motives to make him wish to differ from them, and he had no previously-formed theories which he was anxious to support. From the right hon. gentleman's general doctrines respecting the punishment of death he did not dissent: but he wished to state his opinion, with the reasons and the facts on which it had been formed, on the question whether the punishment of death ought to be preserved or abandoned. There were no reasons, that he knew of, nor any circumstances in his situation, why he should not be ready to adopt the views of the right hon. gentleman. By the bill which he had introduced into the House he proposed to meliorate one part of our criminal code, and his course had uniformly been towards the mitigation of its severity. When he came into office seven years before the present period, the criminal law of Great Britain exceeded in severity the criminal codes of every other part of Europe, and he had then thought it ought to be meliorated. He made it, since he had been in office, the great object of his ambition, not to set the example of meliorating this code, but to follow the example previously set by others. He had found, however, that the habits and usages of the country were adapted to and formed on the severity of our code, and he found it necessary to proceed in the mitigation of this severity with great caution. He thought it advantageous to continue the severity of the law in its letter, but gradually to meliorate its practical application. The bills he had introduced into parliament, consolidating the criminal laws, had, in part, abandoned capital punishment; but he looked forward to a time when the criminal law, after the consolidation of its different parts had been carried into effect, should be again brought under consideration. When that was the case, the House might, with propriety, take the question into consideration, whether further mitigation of its severity should not be attempted. In his views he had adopted the recommendation of the committee over which the right hon. gentleman had presided, and had endeavoured first to simplify the law, with a view to its mitigation afterwards. What he had done to consolidate the law was not to prevent the whole subject being hereafter brought under review; and when the simplification was complete, a further mitigation of its severity might be found expedient. If he resisted, at that time, the proposition to abolish the punishment of death for forgery, he must appeal to the course he had pursued, and to the practical application he had made of the law, to show that he was not attached to that punishment. He had not contented himself with a bare expression of his opinion on this point; he had, by the advice he had given to the crown, carried those opinions into active operation. He found that in the seven years previously to 1822, when he came into office, the number of executions, in England and Wales, was 731, while the number of executions since 1822—that is up to December, 1829—was 433, showing a considerable diminution. The number of executions in London and Middlesex in the former seven years, was 192; in the latter seven years during the period that he had been in office, it was 120, showing a diminution of seventy-two. He was afraid that this diminution could not be laid to the account of the diminution of capital offences, as they had been rather on the increase. Perhaps, indeed, the mitigation of the severity of the laws might have encouraged and facilitated prosecutions, and so more capital crimes had been prosecuted, but he did not believe that the diminution of executions could be accounted for by the diminution of capital offences. He thought that the House, when it took the subject into its serious consideration, would pause before it gave its consent to abolish the punishment of death for forgery; and he wished first to state the reasons, and afterwards the facts, which ought to be well weighed by hon. members before they consented to abolish the capital punishment for this crime. With respect to the crime itself, there were many reasons, such as the magnitude of the gain which might be acquired—the facility of committing the crime, the difficulty of detection, and the temptation to commit it, which marked it with peculiar characteristics, and made it deserving of especial consideration. As an illustration of the magnitude of the sums to be obtained, he would refer to the case of Fauntleroy, the amount of whose forgeries was not less than £353,000. The Bank of England was answerable for forgeries committed by this individual through a series of years, and actually paid a sum of £353,000. Looking to the temptation, he would observe, that it came across a man overwhelmed with distress, who, by the mere presenting a draft at a banker's, might be relieved from his difficulties, and find himself suddenly in the midst of prosperity; and then, if he did succeed, there was the difficulty of detection. In this crime there were none of those revolting circumstances which alarmed mankind. There was no confederacy necessary. The criminal did not need to disclose his guilt to any particeps criminis; there was, consequently, an extreme difficulty of detection—the draft was paid by a banker's clerk, who might, perhaps, be induced, in a case of need, to cancel it or to deliver it up. Then the signature might be so well imitated, that no precaution could detect the forgery at the moment. No vigilance, therefore, could guard against it; and when it was once committed there might be no remedy. No receiver, too, was necessary, as in the case of many other crimes; and the property, when once obtained, could not be made evidence against the criminal. But even the crime itself might be committed by an innocent man, and a man ignorant that he was committing a crime. A man presented a draft at a banker's; it was paid, in the hurry of business, over a crowded desk; the person who presented it might not be the forger, but somebody whom he had employed. The real guilty party might escape, if the stake were large enough, to the continent; he might leave the country; but even if he did not do that, the difficulty of detection was very great. It depended obviously on a question of personal identity. The clerk who paid the draft must, in the first instance, recognise the man who presented it; and if he were only some ignorant and innocent agent, he must find out and identify his employer. Thus, it was a question of double identity; and that must be decided, before the guilt could be brought home to any person. When he recollected, therefore, the magnitude of the gain—the great temptation—the difficulty of the detection, that there were no confederates necessary, and no violence to alarm people, as in a burglary or murder; coupling all these circumstances with the large properties concerned, he thought they invested this crime with a peculiar and exclusive character—a character which belonged to no other species of crime against which the legislature had to guard.

Before the House resolved to abolish the punishment of death, the members should be well convinced that they could find a more efficacious punishment, such as that recommended by the right hon. gentleman. The House, before it came to such a resolution, would pause, and it would deliberate long before it adopted the proposition of the right hon. gentleman. He did not by any means undervalue the public sympathy in giving force to laws, or rendering them nugatory; he adverted with all due respect to the opinions of the petitioners, but he did not find them conclusive against his view. The petitioners, generally speaking, were not the persons most interested in the question, though, if he looked only at individual interest, he must be silent. If a regard to that were all the arguments he could urge, he must abandon the defence of the law; but if it could be made out that the apprehension of the punishment of death prevented the commission of the crime—if public morals were protected by the fear of this punishment—if without that punishment there would be a great increase of the offence—if these things could all be made out, then there would be very strong, and indeed very powerful, reasons for maintaining the punishment. If it could be shown that the fear of death did operate to prevent the commission of the crime of forgery, and if property were defended by it—which was not immaterial—he conceived that they would not be justified in abolishing it. If he could also show, that those who petitioned against it were not the parties most interested, he thought the House would have good reasons for withholding its assent to the prayer of their petitions. The chief petitioners in favour of the measure most interested in it were the country and provincial bankers; but the direct and immediate interest they had in it was not to be compared to the interest of the bankers of London. London was the great centre and mart of all money transactions, and very few bills of exchange, drawn or negotiated through the whole country, but found their way to London. The danger of forgery, therefore, was tenfold greater in London than in any other place. Since the abolition of the small notes also, the number of forgeries committed on country bankers had considerably diminished. Forgeries of £5 notes, and of notes to a large amount, had never been so frequent as of the £1 and £2 notes. It might, at first view, appear as easy to obtain £50 or £20 for signing a name as £1 or £2; but it was to be remembered that the large sums caused the notes to be examined. The small notes also were taken by a different class of persons—they were passed among the working classes, who had not time nor skill to examine them or to detect the forgery. Moreover, generally, the £5 notes were made payable in London; and if they were once paid, the London banker was responsible for the sum. As to cheques, which were the great instruments forged, the country bankers hardly used them. They were not acquainted with cheques as they were used by the London bankers. Besides, in their narrow circle, every person who drew cheques was known, and forgery was there much more difficult than in London. He believed that the forgery of a cheque in any provincial town, except Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester, and one or two others, was hardly known. Thus, in estimating the interests of London and country bankers in this question, those of the latter would be found to be comparatively small. The argument in favour of the principle he was opposing was this, and he wished to state it fairly. The severity of the law, it was said, defeats its own object; it prevents prosecutions, it leads, when criminals are prosecuted, to their acquittal; it enlists in their cause the sympathies of juries, and the sympathy of the public, and leaving a prosecutor without hope of obtaining a conviction, gives him an interest in avoiding a prosecution. He admitted the existence of a reluctance to prosecute, but he believed that it was not always wholly dictated by conscientious motives; other motives, mingling with the conscientious motives, did deter people from prosecution. There was the great expense of the prosecution, and the chance of the criminal escaping. When a man had been defrauded of £80 or £200, he did not always see the necessity of expending £80 or £100 more in prosecuting the criminal, without a chance of recovering his property. It might only be regarded, according to a vulgar saying, as throwing good money after bad; and, therefore, prosecutions were abstained from on account of the expense, as well as on account of conscientious motives. To illustrate this he would observe that the country bankers had proposed to the Bank of England, in cases where the forged bills of the latter were paid to the former, to give the Bank of England all the information in their power if it would prosecute, or even to be at half the expense; but when they found that the bank would do neither they declined to prosecute. He could not allow, therefore, that all the reluctance proceeded from conscientious motives; and he could not admit that, if the law were altered as to severity, that there would be no reluctance to prosecute. He was sorry to fatigue the House with details, but he hoped that the members would give to the following facts their deliberate attention. The argument was, that the reluctance to punish the parties with death prevented individuals from prosecuting and juries from convicting. It was difficult to determine the cases not prosecuted. Individual instances were, no doubt, known, but he hoped the House would not draw a general conclusion from isolated facts. He would compare the cases abandoned by prosecutors, after commencing the prosecution for forgery, with the prosecutions abandoned for some other crimes. Selecting the seven years between 1823 and 1829, inclusive, he had examined the question in reference to six other capital offences; that was, he had taken the charges preferred on six capital offences, and the number of prosecutions abandoned on them. These were murder, burglary, highway-robbery, horse-stealing, sheep-stealing, and offences under Lord Ellenborough's act. On these six capital offences, the number of offences charged in the seven years was 8,392; and of these 1,054 had not been prosecuted, or the abandonment of prosecutions amounted to one-eighth of the whole number of charges. The number of charges of forgery during the same period was 383, and of these fifty-three cases had not been prosecuted. There was, therefore, about one-eighth of the prosecutions for this crime, as of the former class of crimes, abandoned. There was no greater number abandoned in forgery than in murder and other crimes. The acquittals were of more importance, in his view of the matter, than the abandonments of prosecution, for they had in them less of what was vague and uncertain. Taking the capital crimes before mentioned, he found that the number of them charged in the seven years he had already alluded to was 7,328, and of these the convictions were 4,850, so that the proportion of convictions to charges was as two to three. There was one third acquitted. The proportion of acquittals for forgery was not greater. It might be said, indeed, that several of the crimes he had selected—such as sheep-stealing and horse-stealing—were, like forgery, condemned by the general sentiment, and therefore that the acquittals under them would be as numerous as those under the charge of forgery, and from the same cause. To avoid this imputation, he would take the case of murder, and see what proportion the charges and acquittals bore to each other. The charges for murder, in the seven years, were 479, and the convictions were only 99; so that the convictions were to the charges as one to five. There were in the same period 2,760 charges of forgery, and the convictions were 1,790; so that the House would see that the convictions were more numerous in proportion for forgery than for murder. The latter was as five to eight, the former only as one to five. He contended from this view, that the law had not been so inoperative as some hon. members supposed, and that it had, in fact, protected property to a very considerable extent. He thought, therefore, that the punishment of death had checked the crime of forgery, and was thus a protection to public morality. The parties most interested in the question of preventing forgery were the London bankers, and Bank of England, and he would advert to the magnitude of the property they had at stake. He would first take the case of the Bank of England, and the House would see if the punishment of death might not be necessary for the protection of its property. The number of stock accounts, in the Bank of England, was not less than 300,000. It paid in the course of one year, not less than 400,000 drafts, and there were not less than 1,000 transfers of stock made in its books daily. Before they came to any determination on this subject, they ought to look to the state of criminal prosecutions for forgery at the present moment. And first he would beg the House to look at the number of prosecutions instituted by these establishments most exposed to suffer from forgery. The prosecutions, then, of the Bank of England since the withdrawal of the £1 notes, had been gradually on the decline. Bear this in mind, therefore, when the question of altering the law was to be considered, that in an establishment which had 300,000 accounts of stock, which paid 400,000 checks every year, and which had 1,000 transfers of stock every day, there had been only two prosecutions for forgery at the last assizes, while up to the present moment there was not a single prosecution pending for the next assizes. This was the state of crime, with reference to this great establishment, under the present law of punishing forgery by death. He had felt it his duty to make very minute enquiries with respect to the practical operation of the present system, in the case of the great London bankers, in order that he might come to some positive conclusion whether the infliction of the punishment of death tended to the promotion of morality, or of the reverse. It might be necessary to state, that in London there had been formed, in the year 1825, an association for the purpose of protecting bankers against forgery, by an immediate prosecution of all those accused of that crime. This association was composed of thirty-six of the most eminent London bankers. They have a secretary and a solicitor, and to them, he apprehended, it was the practice to commit the conduct of the prosecution. The members were, of course, bound to communicate any offence in the way of forgery, of which they became cognizant. He believed there were two instances of a departure from that practice. He would not name them; but ordinarily, he understood, it was the practice for the members to communicate to the secretary and solicitor the commission of any forgery which came to their knowledge.

Mr. Martin begged pardon for interrupting the right hon. gentleman; but although he was a member of the association, he never understood that it was binding on them to make any communication to the secretary or solicitor, unless they thought proper to do so.

Sir R. Peel said, he did not wish to mention names, but he had been assured of the fact on very good authority. Returning, however, to this association, he found, by returns which he had received, that at the clearing office of these bankers there were paid, on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of the month of May, bills and checks to the number of 45,800, and the money value of this amazing number of drafts and bills, all of them liable to forgery, amounted to £10,095,000. But this was not all—he found that four of the banking-houses, whose members belonged to the committee, liquidated demands upon paper, and therefore liable to forgery, to the extraordinary amount of £500,000,000 in the year. Now, by the returns from the secretary of the committee of London bankers, he found, that in 1827 there were nineteen forgeries committed, and that the amount of the forgeries was £7,000. In 1828 there were sixteen forgeries, and the amount was £15,000. In 1829 there were twelve forgeries, and the amount was £2,500; and in the present year, up to the latest time at which the return could be made out, there were only four forgeries, and the amount was £658. Coupling, therefore, the fact of there being at the present moment no forgery under prosecution by the Bank of England, and that the prosecutions by this society of the bankers of the metropolis were gradually diminishing, he thought they ought maturely to consider how far the present law had proved sufficient for its end, before they abandoned the infliction of the punishment of death, and substituted for it a secondary punishment, which was expected to operate more effectually to the prevention of crime. He confessed he had not heard from the right hon. gentleman that satisfactory explanation of the nature and effect of secondary punishments which he expected from him with reference to this subject. The men accustomed, as forgers generally were, to all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, were not likely to be influenced so much by the fear of the punishment of transportation and imprisonment, as of death. They were, by their habits and education, placed in a situation which prohibited the beneficial exercise of the system of secondary punishments. In many cases the government had tried the effect of secondary punishments. It had imprisoned men for seven years, and what was the consequence? Why that the low diet and the languor produced by solitary confinement had given rise to a mortal and infectious disease, which the most eminent physicians ascribed, after the most minute enquiry, to purely moral causes, to the languor of long and solitary confinement, coupled with the prison diet, which, as a fit punishment, was allotted them. It was observed, indeed, by Sir Henry Hallford, when giving his evidence to the committee who sat on this subject, that punishment by solitary confinement and low diet, acted with a double force on those whose previous habits were far removed from such privations. But, in addition to disease, there was another evil to be guarded against. It not unfrequently happened, that the languor of solitary confinement led to some of the most formidable aggravations of insanity. Then came the question of whether this insanity were feigned or real—whether the sufferings were pretended, or the result of the situation and previous habits of the criminal—so that, under any view of the case, the infliction of long solitary confinement as a secondary punishment, presented numberless difficulties. Then came the question of the infliction of hard labour. Now, with every disposition to make the criminal suffer by the infliction of hard labour, it not unfrequently happened that his previous habits of life precluded the possibility of putting that portion of the sentence in force. It was frequently impossible to inflict such a punishment. But supposing he did send a man of education to the hulks at Deptford or Chatham; after he had been there for two or three years, suffering under the eyes of the public, what security had the executive that the public sympathy would not be as much awakened in his favour, and the public prejudice as much directed against the infliction of hard labour, as it is now against the taking away the life of the offender for the same crime? What certainty had he that the public and prosecutors would not shrink as much from inflicting the punishment of solitary imprisonment or hard labour, as they now do from that of death? The infliction of secondary punishments, such as hard labour, low diet, and solitary confinement, had been tried for ten years, and it had been found impossible to continue it; for the consequence always was, that they were compelled to alter the diet of the prisoners, and to give a kind of nutriment, which, as was observed by an hon. member (Colonel Davies) the other evening, when he had not an opportunity of answering his remarks, rendered the situation of the convict an object of envy to the agricultural labourer, whose honest industry would not procure him any sustenance of the same description. It was said, however, that they might transport offenders of this description to New South Wales, and keep them to hard labour there. Independently of the power which a man of education must always exercise among such persons as he would be compelled to associate with in New South Wales, it was scarcely possible to guard against other peculiarities of the situation of a person committing forgery. A man who was guilty of that crime, seldom or never failed to secure a considerable sum of money. He might even escape discovery long enough to accumulate a very large sum; and it must therefore be taken into calculation, that when detected and subjected to punishment, he might employ a portion of his gains for the purpose of effecting his escape. In truth, if the infliction of secondary punishments, such as imprisonment or confinement to the hulks, were to be had recourse to in such cases, he for one had no confidence in being able to prevent a forger from finding the means of escape. For these reasons, which he had thus candidly avowed, he had no confidence in secondary punishments producing the end all had in view—the prevention of crime—unless they made them so severe that the mind of the prisoner would be affected—the public sympathy awakened for his sufferings, or his constitution prove inadequate to the support of the sentence. On these grounds, therefore, he submitted the question to the impartial and unbiassed decision of the House—premising only that his decided opinion, supported by many years' experience, was in favour of the law as it stood, and expressing, as he did, his conscientious conviction that the adoption of the right hon. gentleman's proposition would not tend to the repression of crime. He must oppose the amendment.

THE KING'S ILLNESS—THE SIGN-MANUAL.

MAY 25, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply to a question from Mr. D. W. Harvey, said, that the hon. member appeared to him to mistake altogether the object of the message of last night. His Majesty was perfectly capable of exercising discretion and deliberation, and the message of last night merely stated that bodily indisposition made it inconvenient and painful for his majesty to sign with his own hand those public instruments which required his sign-manual. No minister would presume to attach his Majesty's signature to any document upon which the pleasure of the Crown had not been taken; much less to an instrument for the removal of a judge. His Majesty's pleasure would be taken upon this, as it was taken upon every other case; for he had the satisfaction of assuring the House, that his Majesty was at that moment as competent to exercise his mental faculties as he had ever been at any other period of his life.

DRAMATIC CENSORSHIP

MAY 25, 1830.

Mr. Lennard, the hon. member for Maldon, moved "for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the third and fourth classes of Act 10 Geo. II., c. 28, which empowers the Lord Chamberlain to prohibit the acting of any new play or entertainment on the stage."

In the brief discussion that followed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that, looking at the state of the stage before and after the passing of the Act, there was nothing to induce the House to remove the censorship. He confessed he had not the confidence which the hon. mover had in the good taste of the public; and was by no means satisfied that, but for the censorship, immoral and blasphemous dramas would not be received with applause; neither did he believe that the common law would be found sufficient to repress the licentiousness of the stage. He was the more induced to entertain these opinions from the manner in which the horrid murder committed by Thurtell, with all its dreadful details, was represented on a minor stage, almost immediately after its occurrence. The hon. member for Maldon had alluded to Lord Chesterfield's speech. There was one part of that speech to which he begged the particular attention of the hon. member, namely, that part of it in which Lord Chesterfield had objected to bringing in the bill at so late a period of the session. Lord Chesterfield had predicted that the passing of the Act in question would, in its consequences, be injurious to the liberty of the press. The result, however, had shown that the noble lord was entirely mistaken on that point. The deputy-licenser, Mr. Colman, had been charged by the hon. gentleman with fastidiousness; but was the hon. gentleman prepared to say, that the dramatic taste of the people of England was so pure that it might be left without control? And what was the substitute for that authority recommended by the hon. gentleman? A committee of magistrates—of police—or at best, county magistrates! For all these reasons, but especially because he objected to bringing in such a bill as the present at so late a period of the session as the 25th of May, he must oppose the hon. gentleman's motion.

Sir Robert Peel having subsequently intimated that he would not object to the hon. member for Maldon's bringing in a bill at as early a period in the next session as he might think proper,—the motion was negatived without a division.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT OF CANADA.

MAY 25, 1830.

Mr. Labouchere moved, and Lord Sandon seconded the following resolutions:—

"That it is the opinion of this House, that a majority of the members of the legislative councils of Upper and Lower Canada ought not to consist of persons holding offices at the pleasure of the Crown; and that any measures that may tend to connect more intimately this branch of the constitution with the interest of these colonies, would be attended with the greatest advantage.

"That it is the opinion of this House, that it is not expedient that the judges should hold seats in the Executive Councils of Upper and Lower Canada, and that (with the exception of the chief justice) they ought not to be involved in the political business of the legislative councils.

"That it is the opinion of this House, that it is indispensable to the good government and contentment of his Majesty's Canadian subjects, that these measures should be carried into effect with the least possible convenient delay."

Sir Robert Peel, towards the close of the discussion, said, he had been asked, whether he did not think that the judges ought to be independent of the Crown? This was a difficult question to answer in general, as much depended on the nature of society, on the state of the colony, and on the nature of the inducements held out to men to accept judicial situations. The great point to be aimed at was, a pure and impartial administration of justice in the colony. The mover and seconder of the resolutions that had been proposed to the House, had supported them in a manner which indicated that it was necessary to force his right hon. friend to adopt the recommendation of the committee; but it had already been pointed out by his right hon. friend, that he had not only adopted the principle, but had actually carried it into practice, by seizing the opportunity afforded by three vacancies to appoint the successors in accordance with the suggestion of the committee. As the resolutions were meant to apply a stimulus to the government, which his right hon. friend had shown that the government did not need; that was, he thought, a sufficient reason why the House, which must, under such circumstances, wish to avoid the appearance of censuring the government, should not adopt the resolutions. There were, however, two other reasons. First, as the resolutions referred to the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, the House ought to proceed by addressing the Crown to abstain from exercising that prerogative, and not by coming to the proposed resolutions. The Act regulating the Canadas gave the power to the Crown, and if the House wished to restrain that power, it would be proper to proceed by a legislative measure. To the resolutions of that House the other House of Parliament could not be a party; and therefore, what was intended to alter the prerogative should be done by a measure in which the whole legislature could concur. Another reason was, that the Crown had exercised its prerogative, and had appointed a Council, and in that council were several persons dependent on the government, as well as judges; and a resolution of that House, condemning the formation of that Council, would not add to its respect in the Canadas. He thought it would not be wise, therefore, for the House of Commons to come to such a resolution. He desired to see the colonies prosperous; and he was convinced they would long be of use to the mother-country, by remaining connected with her by the ties of affection; and it was only by those ties, which he wished to see strengthened, that we could secure their assistance and goodwill.

INTERFERENCE OF THE MILITARY AT RYE.

MAY 27, 1830.

Colonel Evans presented a petition from certain inhabitants of Rye, complaining of the interference of a military armed force, under the direction of Herbert Curteis, Esq., on the occasion of a recent disturbance at that place between certain landowners and other persons, relative to the sluices which served to clear the harbour. The hon. member entered into a detail of the disturbance which took place there on the 26th ultimo; he justified the conduct of the people, and considered the interference of the military as illegal.

In the discussion which ensued,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he would not give any opinion on the question between the people of the town of Rye and the commissioners. He absented himself from voting on the bill relating to Rye, upon the principle that it was better for a minister of the crown not to interfere in giving an opinion on a private bill. The time for making repairs in the sluice would not by law expire till 1831, and yet, at ten o'clock at night, about 500 persons, preceded by a band of music, went to level it by force, and so destroyed the communication between Rye and Dover. He felt it his duty to say, that the magistrate (Mr. Herbert Curteis) acted with promptitude and temperance. The men in the preventive service were called to assist in putting down the rioters. Rye was not a place from which the blockade service could be safely drawn away, and, in order to let them attend to their own duty, he (Sir R. Peel) ordered troops to go in aid of the civil service. There was no alternative but to give protection to property. He hoped the gallant colonel would interfere with his constituents, and advise them on their conduct in this matter. The magistrate was perfectly right in preventing the destruction of the sluice by night and by violence.

At the close of the debate Sir Robert Peel said, it was no part of his duty to interfere with the progress of any bill that was before the other House of Parliament; neither did he think that he was called upon to interfere officially with private bills in any respect. Presuming even the alleged grievance to exist, he still thought that it ought not to be redressed in a tumultuous manner. If the parties should find that they had a right to abate the nuisance by law, there would be no opposition whatever offered on his part.

The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

THE ROYAL SIGN-MANUAL BILL.

MAY 27, 1830.

A message was brought down from the Lords, stating that their lordships had passed a bill, entitled "An Act to enable his Majesty to appoint certain persons to affix the Royal Signature to instruments requiring such signature," in which they desired the concurrence of the House of Commons.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said,—Sir, in moving the first reading of a bill intended to make a temporary provision for enabling his majesty to affix his royal signature to those public instruments which require that formality, I must repeat, in concurrence, I am sure, with the unanimous feeling of the House, and of this nation, my deep regret at the circumstances which have rendered this application to Parliament necessary. It is, as his majesty has informed the House by his gracious message, on account of the indisposition under which he is labouring, painful and inconvenient to the king to attach his sign-manual to the multitude of official instruments which require the royal signature to give them validity. I must at the same time state that, under all circumstances, when application has been made to his majesty for his signature to any instrument, the completion of which was necessary to the public service, particularly instruments connected with the administration of justice and pardons, when it was thought fit to extend mercy to those who had received a penal sentence; on all such occasions, whatever pain or inconvenience affixing the signature might have subjected the king to, his majesty never suffered those considerations to stand in the way of his desire to facilitate the administration of justice, or to exercise his royal prerogative of mercy, and to forward the due execution of the public service. I am sure that this House is animated by a unanimous desire to spare his majesty the pain and inconvenience, if measures can be devised to effect that object consistently with the due discharge of the public service. I hope, consistently with that object, and with the prevention of all detriment or fear of injury to the public service, that the measure which is now introduced, is likely to be satisfactory. The present bill provides that his majesty may, by his royal warrant or commission, to be signed with the sign-manual, appoint one or more persons to attach a stamp to those instruments which require the royal signature. That stamp will be provided under the direction of the Lord President of the Council. There will be two stamps; one of which will bear the words "George R.," and the other "G. R.," the initials only, for such instruments as are usually signed in that way. The bill provides that the persons so empowered to affix this stamp, shall not be authorized to affix it to any instrument without a memorandum, specifying the nature of the instrument, and bearing the signature of at least three out of seven officers of state, who are named to be responsible for its application. Of those seven signatures, three, at least, must be attached to every instrument, as a certificate of its authenticity. The seven persons so appointed are the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the First Lord of the Treasury, and the three principal secretaries of state. There is a provision in the bill that no one of these seven officers so appointed shall act alone; and, in order to guard against the possibility or the supposition of any possible fraud, an oath is provided by the bill, to be taken by the parties by whom the stamp is to be affixed. The stamp can only be affixed by the king's express command, and in the presence of his majesty, and the party affixing it must attest by his own signature, that the stamp has been affixed by his majesty's express command, and in the presence of his majesty. These are the conditions which accompany the passing of this bill. However temporary it may be in its duration—for it is proposed to limit the bill to the end of this session—and God grant that it may not be necessary to extend it longer—but in case it should become necessary to continue it for a longer time, then there will be a necessity of bringing the measure again under the consideration of the House; so that every caution possible has been used in this case. It is right that it should be so, because we must bear in mind that we are establishing a precedent which may be appealed to on future occasions. There is one other provision which I omitted to notice—namely, an express enactment that his majesty may, at any time, attach his sign-manual in the ordinary way to any instrument when he sees fit and convenient, and that such signature shall have the ordinary operation, notwithstanding the concurrent power given to attach the signature in the other manner. His majesty will, therefore, if he see fit, exercise his royal prerogative with his own hand. There have been various instances in the former history of this country, of the royal signature being attached in the manner proposed by this bill. In the reign of Henry VIII. more than one commission was issued, empowering persons to apply a stamp, instead of the royal signature or initials, and giving it equal validity with the royal sign-manual. In the reign of Queen Mary also, the same power was given by royal commission; and it is also recorded, on the authority of Bishop Burnett, that, in the reign of King William, a stamp was applied in a similar manner. But although there exist all these various precedents for devolving to individuals the power of affixing a stamp, by the authority of the sign-manual, we have thought it the safer course to apply to parliament in this way for its sanction. I could enter into a more detailed explanation if it were necessary; but from the circumstances under which this measure is proposed, from its temporary duration, and the caution with which it is surrounded, I should hope that the House will be unanimous in the desire to afford his majesty this accommodation. It will be felt that it is extremely desirable that the measure should be passed with as little delay as possible, particularly on account of those public instruments which would now be pressing for signature, if it were not for the pain and inconvenience which the operation causes to his majesty. At the same time I propose, that we should see the provisions of the bill in print before it is finally carried. I shall move that it should be read a first and second time to-day; it can then be carried through its remaining stages to-morrow, and receive the royal assent on Saturday.

Lord Althorp suggested that it might be proper, before the bill should be finally passed, to have some evidence that his majesty was in such a state as to render a measure of this nature necessary.

Sir Robert Peel said, he was sure that when the noble lord thought of the circumstances under which the bill was proposed, he would not press his proposition. The House had his majesty's distinct assurance, in his gracious message, that he was labouring under indisposition which rendered it painful and inconvenient to sign the various official documents presented for that purpose. He entirely concurred in the opinion that it was necessary to be cautious in a step of this nature; but when the House had the royal message, saying that it was painful and inconvenient to his majesty, he thought it would not be respectful to imply a doubt of the fact.

Later in the evening, in reply to some observations from Sir C. Wetherell and Mr. Bernal, Sir Robert Peel, said, that he had not thought it necessary to trouble the House with any further details before, but there was a precedent for a commission to authorize a party to attach a stamp, instead of the royal hand. It was in the reign of Mary, and it was really curious and remarkable how closely the precautions adopted on that occasion coincided with those provided by the present bill. The precedent had only been discovered yesterday, after this bill was prepared, and if the House had any curiosity, he would read it. The right hon. baronet then read an extract from the 5th and 6th of Philip and Mary, which stated, that the Queen, in consequence of the great labour which she sustained in the government and defence of the kingdom, was unable, without much danger and inconvenience, to sign the commissions, warrants, letters, missions, and other papers, and she therefore appointed certain persons therein named, and gave them authority to seal the necessary instruments, instead of the Queen, at her command, and in her presence, and in the presence of the Archbishop of York, the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Horse, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Chancellor of the order of the Garter, and others named therein, or any two of them, and declared that all instruments so signed should be as valid and effectual in law as if they were signed by the hand of the queen. This precedent had been discovered subsequently to the preparation of the present bill; but it would be seen, that the precautions taken were the same. Indeed, the bill went further than the precedent, because (a point which he omitted to mention before) it would be necessary that the instruments should be signed also in the presence of a confidential servant. The question of forgery had been considered; but, as the duration of the bill was to be so short, and as it was environed with so many cautions, it was thought that forgery would not be possible, because the forgery of the stamp alone would not be sufficient. It would be necessary also to affix the names of all those who attested it. In almost every instrument there would be five signatures. Referring to the Regency Act, he did not find in it any provision making it treason to counterfeit the sign-manual—[Sir C. Wetherell said, he did not desire to persevere in his suggestion]. If it were necessary to continue the present measure after this session, it would then be right to consider whether it would be desirable to make any additional provision to meet this point. But at present he did not think it was necessary, for the reasons which he had stated, and also as forgery was at all times subject to a high penalty at common law.

The bill was read a first and second time, and a committee appointed for the following day.

The Bill was passed through the committee, and ordered to be reported, without amendments. On the question being put, that it be read a third time,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished to say in reply to an observation made last night, respecting the crime of forging the Royal Signature stamp, that in the Regency Act there was a clause, enabling his present majesty, then Prince of Wales, to sign "George, Prince Regent," and the Act did not make the forging that signature treason, but forgery. On the present occasion, the precedent afforded by that Act was strictly followed; and most hon. members, he had no doubt, would consider the punishment of forgery abundantly sufficient for such a possible offence. The other precautions contained in the bill better provided against forgery than would any extraordinary severity which they might introduce in the nature of a penal enactment.

The bill was passed, and immediately carried up to the Lords by Sir R. Peel.

THE NEW POLICE.

MAY 28, 1830.

Sir R. Vyvyan moved, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, that he would cause to be laid before the House the number of men employed in the Police of the metropolis under the Police bill of 1829, distinguishing the grades of the persons so employed, and the specific number of each grade, together with the Pay and Allowance of all the persons employed; and also all the General Orders issued by the Secretary of State since the formation of the Establishment."

Mr. Spring Rice seconded the motion, which was supported by Mr. Lennard, and agreed to.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, who just then entered, said, if he had been in the House when the hon. baronet moved for these Returns, he should have taken that opportunity of stating, that on this subject he was prepared to give the House the fullest information. All the orders which had been issued, both general as well as secret—if there were any, but in fact there were none,—he should be most willing to lay on the table of the House. There was no sort of information connected with the police that he was not ready to give. In order, however, to make the returns to be laid on the table complete, the House ought to know to what extent the police had been brought into operation, and what was the extent of the districts it guarded. He would therefore move for an account of the number of districts to which the Metropolis police had been extended, specifying the number of parishes, and the population of each parish according to the last Population Returns, with the total amount of the population embraced within the districts of the police.

Mr. Lennard said, he had made no allusion to secret orders, for he did not suppose that any such had been given.

Sir Robert Peel said, if there had been any he should have been glad to have produced them, for he was convinced that the efficiency of the police would be increased in proportion as it was exposed to the scrutiny of the House.

Lord Encombe said, if the Metropolitan police were to be conducted on the same principles as that at Brighton, it would be purely a military body.

Sir Robert Peel knew nothing of the Brighton police, except having seen the men. He had readily given all the assistance in his power to such towns as chose to form a police like the Metropolitan police; but he had taken no other part in their proceedings, though he hoped, that every provincial town would form such a police.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM BY UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

MAY 28, 1830.

Mr. O'Connell, pursuant to notice, moved for "leave to bring in a Bill for the effectual and radical reform of abuses in the representation of the people in the Commons House of Parliament."

Mr. John Wood seconded the motion.

Lord John Russell intimated his intention of moving, by way of amendment, a series of resolutions, in substance the same as those which he had formerly proposed on the subject of Parliamentary Reform.

In the course of the evening, SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the question was already so much exhausted, that he would not trouble the House with any general observations upon the matter at issue, but confine himself to the motions which had been made. There were two specific propositions before the House. The one was the motion of the hon. and learned gentleman, and the other the amendment of the noble lord. The motion of the learned gentleman embraced three topics—Triennial Parliaments, Vote by Ballot, and Universal Suffrage. The act which altered triennial parliaments into septennial, had been designated by the learned gentleman a gross usurpation, and he had, on that ground, claimed the going back to triennial parliaments; but he begged to observe, that the usurpation extended only as far as that one parliament was concerned, which was elected for three years. With respect to future parliaments, it had just as much right to make them septennial, as the present parliament had to make future ones triennial. But he was opposed to triennial parliaments on other grounds; neither did he see how it could help the interests of which its friends declared themselves the advocates. The expenses of elections had been talked of; but surely the oftener they occurred, the more frequent must be the expense. It had been stated, that in clubs the vote by ballot prevailed, but he thought that there was a great difference between the cases; besides which, he altogether doubted the policy of exercising the elective franchise in secret; to him it appeared that it would afford ample cover for hypocrisy and deceit, if it did not altogether prevent that free canvass and discussion of the merits of the different candidates.—[Some hon. member observed, "They may have that too"]. No: if they did discuss those merits, unless hypocrisy were afterwards made use of, the landlord would have just as much power of discovering what the vote of his tenant was, whether the discussion took place in the public-house or on the hustings; neither did he believe that any assurance could be given that the ballot would be fairly taken. To whomsoever the task might be trusted, he would be placed in a situation of great responsibility. With respect to universal suffrage, he had only this observation to make;—If the learned member had said, “I prefer a republic to a monarchy,” he should have understood why that learned gentleman wanted to have universal suffrage. But if he said that he intended to improve the constitution according to constitutional principles, he ought to show that there was a precedent in the constitution for universal suffrage. There was no such precedent. Once grant universal suffrage, and that monarchy which the learned gentleman professed to admire—that House of Lords, for the existence of which, he said, he saw so many excellent reasons, would not long survive. If that House were to be the immediate organ of the people’s will, it would not long be content with possessing only one-third of the legislative power—and the first moment in which there was an opposition on the part of the House of Lords to the expressed opinion of the representatives elected on the principle of universal suffrage, that moment would endanger either the existence of the House of Lords, or change the state of the country, so as to prevent the action of government. And let him tell the learned gentleman, who had been so fond of referring to the times of the Revolution, that if universal suffrage had existed then, they never would have had that Revolution; for the voice of the people was decidedly for another form of government. But the learned gentleman had contended, that as the people paid for the public appointments, they ought to have a control over those appointments. Why, did not that very argument show that as soon as they got possession of the elective power, they would also want the executive power? The only tangible instance that had been cited by the other side, was that of an hon. and gallant general, who had been dismissed from his office for voting against the government; but did any one suppose that a state could ever be so constituted as that those who were opposed to the government in opinion should form part of the government? But even supposing that this circumstance gave a proof of a corrupt state of things, he could tell the learned gentleman that universal suffrage would give no security from such dismissals from office; and in this ancient limited monarchy there was infinitely less exercise of this power than in that republic where universal suffrage prevailed. In this country, when there was a change of government, the removals were generally confined to those who held confidential situations, and all the subordinate officers were usually retained; and, on the contrary, he could assure the learned gentleman from good authority, that when General Jackson succeeded to the presidential chair, his first act was to remove every individual from office—from the highest down to the lowest—even the very postmasters, who had been opposed to his interest. In his mind, that was a conclusive proof, that even if there were universal suffrage, there still would be no security against the removal of individuals from office. On these grounds, he was decidedly opposed to the motion of the hon. and learned gentleman. With respect to the amendment of the noble lord, he must say that he was also opposed to that. The noble lord, referring to something that he (Sir R. Peel) had said on a former night, observed, that he had contrasted the present House of Commons with the Houses of Commons in the reigns of George I. and II.; but that he (Lord J. Russell) was ready to prove that there was more attention paid to the public interest in those times than at present. If this proved any thing, it proved that there was no necessity for reform; for, as the noble lord had observed, there were more members of parliament holding office formerly than now, so that the present defect, according to that argument, would be, that there were too few members holding offices. The proposal of the noble lord was such as to afford no satisfaction to those who sided with the hon. and learned gentleman; and, if it were carried into execution, the consequence would be, that it would involve the whole country in great confusion. In particular, the part of the proposition which referred to the compulsory disfranchisement of boroughs, appeared to him to be quite incomprehensible; he could not understand in what manner the pecuniary compensation was to be afforded, or to whom it was to be paid. But on still more general grounds he was opposed to the proposed parliamentary reform. The House was bound to decide this question on the most comprehensive views. They had to consider whether there were not on the whole a general representation of the people in that House; and whether the popular voice were not sufficiently heard. For himself he thought that it was; and that that House was not unduly influenced by the members of the other branch of the legislature. The hon. and learned gentleman had contended that the want of reform was the cause of the expensive and lengthened wars in which this country had been engaged. He begged leave to deny that assertion; for he did not believe that a House representing the wishes of the people would be a security against the recurrence of expensive wars. It never had been found in the experience of English history, that peace was very popular, or that war was very adverse to the sentiments of the people. He would admit that the people sometimes became tired of war; but war having been entered upon, it was then matter for the consideration of government whether there were not circumstances to preclude an immediate treaty of peace. On these grounds, and not seeing that there were any grievances made out which called for parliamentary reform, he should certainly give his most decided opposition to both the measures before the House.

THE LAW OF DIVORCE.

JUNE 3, 1830.

Dr. Phillimore moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be pleased to direct the commissioners appointed to enquire into the state of the ecclesiastical courts in England and Wales, to take into their consideration the state of the Law of Divorce, to consider the expediency of enabling persons to obtain divorce from the bonds of matrimony, in cases of adultery, by legal process in courts of competent jurisdiction."

Several members having spoken, SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the House had some reason to complain of the imperfect notice which the hon. and learned gentleman had given of this measure—all-important as that was. He was, therefore, rather taken by surprise in being called upon to give an opinion upon it at that moment. He was sorry to be compelled to give a vote on so extensive a subject without the fullest consideration. The question, as it appeared to him, was this:—Was a case of necessity made out for a change in the existing law? and, secondly, was the proposed the best mode of legislating upon the subject? As to the first part of the question, he would not at that moment undertake to decide it, but he was prepared to say that he could not admit all the hon. and learned member's statements. It had been said that that House was not a competent tribunal in cases of divorce, and that in nine cases out of ten collusion took place. He thought, however, that that statement was much exaggerated; for he could not give the name of collusion to a case where a wife, who had been guilty of adultery, and wronged an affectionate husband, offered no opposition to his procuring a divorce. If it were the case that collusion was frequent and inevitable, it would be their duty to take some means of preventing such an evil in future. But the testimony of the hon. and learned member for Tregony was directly opposed to such a supposition. If by collusion were meant a criminal collusion to obtain a divorce, he (Sir Robert Peel) was by no means of opinion that such a collusion was frequent. The hon. and learned gentleman spoke of the expense of the remedy operating to give the rich an advantage over the poor. Let them adopt what regulations they pleased on the subject, he feared that that inequality could not be obviated. How could any court determine on the justice or expediency of granting a divorce without an extensive review of the lives of the parties by whom it was claimed, and without hearing satisfactory evidence upon the subject? The expense attendant on such proceedings must always operate as a bar to the poor. It had been said that there were courts in which a subject of that kind could be investigated at an expense not exceeding £15. With a reference to public morality, however, it appeared to him that it would be much better to retain all the existing inconveniences than to make divorce so easily attainable. To do that, would be to hold out a temptation to adultery. He was far from thinking that our present system was a good one; but he was by no means prepared to say, with the hon. and learned member for Clare, that the husband should have no remedy for the infidelity of his wife.

Mr. O'Connell said, he was not opposed to divorces a mensa et thoro.

Sir Robert Peel said, his argument applied to both species of divorce. It was well to make it the general rule that there should be no divorce; but there must be exceptions; yet those exceptions ought to be strictly enquired into, and ought to be the subjects of distinct acts of legislation. As to referring the subject to the ecclesiastical commission, it must be remembered that that commission was appointed for a very different purpose. And, besides, there were in the discussion of the question many moral and political considerations, which the legislature ought to retain in its own hands, and not devolve them upon any commission. It must also be recollected, that the commissioners were acting gratuitously. Having undertaken what it would require three or four years of application to accomplish, was it fair to impose upon them an additional labour? For all these reasons he was not prepared to acquiesce in the hon. and learned gentleman's motion; and hoped that he would follow the advice of the hon. and learned member for Tregony, and not press his motion to a division.

On a division, the motion was negatived by 102 against 45; majority, 57.

FOUR-AND-A-HALF PER CENT.

JUNE 4, 1830.

On the motion for the House to resolve itself into a committee of Ways and Means, with reference to his notice of motion respecting the prerogative of the Crown and the 4½-per-cent duties, he (Sir James Graham) wished to make a proposition. His proposition was this:—That his majesty's ministers should undertake, without loss of time, to bring in a bill to limit the prerogative of the Crown to import commodities free of duty, to such commodities as were for the use of the Crown, and not allowing it to import commodities free of duty, for sale, particularly the sugar which was sent here in payment of the 4½-per-cent duties, from Barbados and the Leeward Islands. If ministers would accept his proposition, and bring in such a measure, it would take away the necessity of making the motion of which he had given notice, though he should reserve to himself the right, if he were not satisfied with the measure, to bring forward a motion on the subject hereafter.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was glad of the opportunity of making that statement before going into the committee, which his right hon. friend would have had to make. It appeared, that according to the principle of the Constitution, nothing was more clear than that it was the prerogative of the Crown to bring into the country any commodities without the payment of any ordinary duties; and it was quite clear that this prerogative extended to the sugar which the Crown received in payment of the 4½-per-cent duties. It was, he asserted, quite clear, according to the constitutional law of this country, and the common law, that this sugar was not subject to pay Customs' duties. That was the fact in point of law. The proceeds of those duties (the 4½-per-cent), though evidently belonging to the Crown, were not appropriated to any personal, but to public, objects; and were applied to diminish the charges on some other public funds. At the same time, he was not prepared to contend that the Crown could import commodities for sale in the market, except on payment of duties, like other persons. Neither was he prepared to say, that the prerogative, though existing constitutionally to this extent, might not lead to public inconvenience. He was not prepared to say, that the prerogative, if wholly unlimited, might not lead to abuse. It was therefore the intention of ministers to place the prerogative under such a limitation, that the sugar for sale should not be brought into the market without paying the Customs' duties. His right hon. friend would have to introduce a legislative measure on the subject, to the House. He should reserve himself for further explanation when the measure was submitted to Parliament, and then the hon. baronet would have an opportunity of seeing if the enactment merited his approbation.

LAW EXPENSES OF THE CROWN.

JUNE 4, 1830.

In a committee of supply, on the question, that a sum not exceeding £15,000 be granted to his Majesty, to defray the expenses of Law Charges for 1830, being put, a warm debate arose, particularly with reference to the prosecution of Mr. Alexander by the Lord Chancellor, for a libel.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising immediately after Mr. O'Connell, said, that whatever might be the opinion of the House on the question now before it, he was certain that no other member would be prepared to give his vote on the same grounds as the hon. and learned member for Clare. He had said that the prosecution was vindictive: if so, let the House mark its sentiments, by reprobating the conduct of the Attorney-general; but let it not degrade itself by such a paltry mode of reprobation as that of reducing the votes on the Estimates. Was there ever such a miserable mode of dealing with a great constitutional question? Was there ever an instance of an attempt to subject a Lord Chancellor and an Attorney-general to censure, by diminishing a vote of £100? And what if the Lord Chancellor had paid out of his own pocket the expenses of the prosecution, instituted by the Attorney-general? Would not the hon. and learned member for Clare be among the first to charge him with vindictiveness on that very ground, and cite it as the strongest instance of an unjust and vindictive feeling? He had never yet seen a gentleman placed in such a situation as his hon. and learned friend beside him. When he had been expressly challenged to justify his conduct, he had been called to order by an hon. member, and told that he ought not to proceed in an explanation into which he had been forced quite by surprise. He must say that his hon. and learned friend had not been fairly dealt with. He was called upon, without any public notice or private intimation, to vindicate his conduct in these prosecutions; and he would ask, whether this were a convenient opportunity for discussing that subject? A motion on this question had been made by the hon. and learned member for Plympton, who had protested against a private prosecution being changed to a public one. The House had decided against it. [No, no.] Well, the House had given no vote upon the subject; but the hon. and learned member had given notice of a motion, which was to bring the whole subject before the House. Not content with this, the hon. member for Newark had also given notice of a distinct motion to a similar effect. Neither of these hon. members had persevered in his motion; and was it therefore probable that his hon. and learned friend could expect that he was this night to be called on to enter into the whole question? Although it was competent for any hon. member in a Committee of Supply to introduce any question he pleased, yet, as a matter of convenience, it was desirable to limit questions as much as possible to pecuniary matters, unless distinct notice were given. A pecuniary consideration certainly arose out of the question of the hon. baronet, whether the expenses of the Lord Chancellor's prosecution were defrayed out of the public purse. If they were, they were defrayed by the vote of last year. He hoped they were; for he thought it far better that the charges of such prosecutions should come from the public funds, than from those of individuals. He would say, that although his (Sir R. Peel's) name had been introduced into an information, he would not pay the expense of it. The Attorney-general had instituted that prosecution, not out of regard for his private feelings, but because he had, as Secretary of State, been unjustly libelled. He had done so without communicating his intention to him; and could there be any thing more absurd and unjust, than for him to be required to pay the expenses of a prosecution, in respect to which he was not even consulted? It was the duty of the Attorney-general to protect public servants from attempts to run them down whilst in the performance of their public duties; and it was right that the Lord Chancellor should refuse to pay the expenses of such a prosecution. He should propose, that before the report be considered, and before a grant be made to defray these expenses, in order that the House should not adopt a proceeding implying the slightest censure on the Attorney-general, or on the Lord Chancellor, or on any individual connected with those prosecutions, that an enquiry should be made, and the facts fully stated to the House, as to whether it were usual for the public to pay the expenses of such prosecutions. If such were the practice, and that practice were wrong, it was certainly competent for the House to alter it. The course he proposed, therefore, was that the vote should pass, and that, prior to the report, the facts should be fully stated to the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

JUNE 7, 1830.

The Bill for the Punishment of Forgeries having been read a third time, Sir James Mackintosh rose to move certain Amendments in the form of a Rider to the Bill. The first clause he meant to propose to add, would be the same as he had proposed in the committee. He intended by that proposition to repeal the penalty of death for all cases of forgery, except the case of forging wills, which he retained against his own inclination, making a sacrifice of his own opinion, out of deference to the opinions of a great many members, who observed, accurately enough, that there was some peculiarity in the crime. He should propose, then, to repeal the capital punishment in all cases of forgery, except the case he had mentioned, which was distinguished from others. In place of this punishment he meant to give a power to every court before which a person was convicted of forgery, to sentence that person to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding fourteen years. The same court should also have a power to substitute for imprisonment, banishment to any penal colony, also for a term not exceeding fourteen years. He should propose also that the court should not only have the power to inflict either of these punishments, but to accumulate them both, when the enormity of the offence should, in its opinion, justify such an accumulation of punishment. He should also propose to vest a power in the Crown, to make a regulation for the treatment of persons transported for forgery, so that the crime might be marked as one of the greatest enormity and danger, ranking next after the crimes of personal violence. He should wish, in addition, to take away the power which was possessed by the governors of our penal colonies, at least by the governor of New South Wales, of mitigating in cases of forgery the punishment inflicted for that offence. He proposed this in order that persons of education, such as those who generally committed forgery, and who being very often persons, on account of that education, useful for public situations in a colony, might not escape the punishment to which they were condemned. He meant to take away the power of remitting or relaxing the punishment of persons convicted of forgery, except it were obtained through representations to his Majesty. He did not intend to infringe on the prerogative of the Crown, but short of its exercise no remission of punishment should be granted to persons convicted of forgery. These were the objects of the clauses he meant to propose. He should be prepared to bring up these clauses in a few minutes, and the first amendment he should move would be in the first paragraph of page three, line seven, to the words "and shall suffer the punishment of death," to be left out. He would then, as the clauses on account of being engrossed could not be immediately brought up, formally propose that a clause for taking away the punishment of death in all cases of forgery, except that of forging wills, be added.

Mr. Fowell Buxton seconded the motion; and in the course of the debate which followed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he would at once approach that point which, after all, was the main argument for the remission of the punishment of death in cases of forgery, namely, that the law, as it now existed, afforded no protection to property; but that if they remitted the punishment of death in such cases, a new protection to property would be thereby created. If this position were established by sound argument, it would unquestionably have more force with him than all the declamation which he had heard on this subject, during the present as well as on a former evening. But he would ask, if the punishment of death did not deter from the crime of forgery, why did the right hon. and learned gentleman admit the propriety of retaining that punishment in one particular case, that of forging a will? If the right hon. and learned gentleman really thought that, by remitting the punishment of death, he gave additional security to property, why did he retain that punishment in this instance? The right hon. and learned gentlemen said, that he would not, to-night, go so far as he had formerly done; and then, with what appeared to him to be a great inconsistency, he proposed that the punishment of death for forgery should be abolished in all cases except where the forgery of a will took place. The hon. member for Weymouth stated, that he would not support the proposition of the right hon. and learned gentleman on any religious or conscientious scruple which he might himself entertain, but that he would defend it on the ground of its giving a new security and protection to property. Now, he would again state that which he had stated the other night, that it would, in his opinion, have precisely the contrary effect. If he were to look confidently forward to his continuing to hold the office of secretary of state, he could assure those who advocated the proposition of the right hon. and learned gentleman, that nothing would be more agreeable to him than to agree to a commutation of punishment, if he could bring himself to believe that it would be attended with beneficial effects. It would unquestionably free him from many very painful applications. In arguing this question, he relied entirely on facts connected with the mercantile concerns of this city, and to these facts the House, in his opinion, ought to attach very great weight. He particularly selected the case of the London bankers, and of the Bank of England. He, however, formerly declared, and he now repeated, that he did not mean to retain this punishment merely on account of the pecuniary interests of the London bankers or of the Bank of England, but because he felt that the general interests of the public were deeply concerned. In treating this question formerly, he had found it necessary to advert to the London bankers; and he had first stated the immense extent of their business. He had shown that thirty-six banking establishments (forming the Bankers' Committee for prosecuting forgeries) had in the course of three days, in the month of May, transacted business to the amount of £10,000,000. That fact, which he then stated, and which appeared at the time to have astonished some gentlemen, he now confidently repeated. He had also stated to the House, that four private banking-houses in London had, in the course of a year, transacted business to the amount of £500,000,000. But then he was told that, as all the drafts and bills of exchange must go through the clearing-house, an effectual security against forgery was thus created. Therefore, the right hon. and learned gentleman argued that they ought to deduct from the securities which were liable to forgery, that they ought to deduct from the general account, all notes and drafts which went through the clearing-house. Now, he differed entirely from those who advanced this as a valid argument. He would contend that the clearing-house was not an effectual security against forgery. He would contend that the right hon. and learned gentleman, and not himself, was mistaken as to facts. He said that the banker was not called on to pay on the day when the instrument was presented, and that therefore he had an opportunity of ascertaining its authenticity. But notwithstanding this, the fact was, and he knew it, that forgeries had on many occasions passed the clearing-house. A recent forgery for £500 on Messrs. Rothschild, did actually pass through the clearing-house. When a London banker received a bill, he had, no doubt, a day to ascertain its correctness; but the fact was, that such skill was evinced in the perpetration of forgery, that the fraud could not in many cases be discovered without a perpetual reference to the party named in the instrument. Why, it was but the other day that a woman brought forward documents signed, as it appeared, by Mr. Dunning, Lord Chatham, and he knew not by whom else. Now, he had no doubt that those signatures, though well executed, were not real; and if signatures were artfully traced, as he believed those to have been, how, except by personal reference, could the forgery be detected? Therefore he would say, that the argument founded on the clearing-house was not worth any thing: but that the fear of the punishment of death did deter from the commission of this crime was evident from the fact, that though business had been transacted, in three days, at the counters of the banking establishments, to which he had referred, to the amount of £4,795,000, there were, in the course of the present year, but four forgeries committed on them, and the amount was only £400. With respect to the Bank of England, where an immense amount of business was necessarily transacted, they had only instituted three prosecutions for forgery in the last assizes, and in the present there was not one name recorded, in England or Wales, for forgery on that establishment. The right hon. and learned gentleman had said, that the Bank of England was an unflinching prosecutor, when it was supposed that the prosecution would serve its interest; but that it was always guided by its legal advisers, who never urged a prosecution except where conviction was sure to follow, and that, therefore, many cases of forgery might occur, which, being abandoned, were unknown to the public. Now, he had sent to the Bank of England for a return, specifying the entire extent of forgeries of which that body had received notice during the years 1827, 1828, and 1829. He did not call for a mere return of forgeries that were prosecuted, but for a full return of the forgeries attempted on the Bank of England, whether they succeeded or not, and what was the result? In 1827, the total amount of forgeries on the Bank of England was £2,107; in 1828, the total amount, under the existing law, was £197; in 1829, a magistrate of the county of York forged three powers of attorney to the amount of £6,500; he, however, not placing much confidence in the unwillingness of juries to convict, left the country the moment he had received the money; but, exclusive of that particular forgery, the sum of which it was attempted to defraud the Bank of England by false instruments, in 1829, amounted only to £378. Could it, he would ask, be argued, after this was made known, that the present state of the law afforded no protection to property? The hon. member for Calne argued, that the Bank of England, being a rigorous and inexorable prosecutor, thereby secured its own property. But if grand juries were so very unwilling to find true bills in these cases, and if petty juries were so anxious not to convict, as the House had been told, how came it that the Bank of England commanded this protection for its property? The two arguments were completely opposed to each other. After all he had heard, his conscientious conviction was, that they would not be promoting the protection of property, or the cause of public morality, by substituting the punishment of transportation for the punishment of death. One punishment was privately mentioned to him as very proper to be resorted to in the case of forgery. It was suggested that the culprit should be branded, and thus held up to public disgrace. This, however, had been formerly tried, with reference to other offences, and it had failed. In 1669, in the reign of William and Mary, an act was passed by which the perpetrators of burglary and larceny were directed to be punished by branding them on the face and hand; but six or seven years after, in the reign of Queen Anne, that act was repealed, on the express ground that the offenders who were thus driven from society, instead of being in any degree reformed, became more desperate; and he was quite sure that any very severe secondary punishment, if substituted for death, would speedily be abolished. The French, he knew, had secondary punishments; but he was convinced, that if an individual here were to be condemned, as many were in France, to work for ten years on the public roads, dragging a cannon-ball at his feet, the Quakers, or the sentimentalists, as the hon. and learned gentleman called them, would shudder at such a punishment, and would feel just as much reluctance to prosecute for the crime of forgery as they did at present on account of the infliction of death. Much had been said about France; but he must observe, that the punishment of death for forgery was not abolished in that country. The forgery of transfers of stock, or of any documents bearing the stamp of the government, was still subject to the punishment of death. Secondary punishments, though recognised by the law, were not at all popular there. The punishment of the carcan, for instance, was denounced as cruel and degrading. In taking the course which he felt it to be his duty to pursue, he was actuated by no other motive than the protection of property, and the repression of crime. If the House thought differently from him, he must bow to its decision; but, under all circumstances, he would act steadily upon the feelings and principles which a serious consideration of the subject had created.

Mr. Brougham having addressed the House at some length, Sir Robert Peel in explanation stated, that the members of the committee of bankers to whom the hon. and learned gentleman alluded, had never spoken to him as a body, or in any other capacity than that of individuals on their own responsibility. He could assure the hon. member, that he must have been misinformed if he understood that either of the individuals in question had consented to forego a prosecution from motives of principle.

On a division, the numbers were: for the clause abolishing the punishment of death for forgery, 151; against it, 138; majority for the clause, 13.

Sir James Mackintosh having brought up the clause, Sir Robert Peel rose and said, that he bowed to the sense of the majority of the House, although he must repeat, that his sentiments remained entirely unchanged, and he believed they would soon have reason to repent the decision to which they had just come. As the bill had taken this turn, he now relinquished to others the benefit of his labours, and bequeathed the further progress of the measure to the right hon. and learned member, who had, he took it for granted, well weighed the terms of his clause, and given to it that deliberate consideration which he (Sir Robert Peel) had not had the power of bestowing upon it. On the right hon. and learned gentleman, then, devolved the responsibility of this amendment.

JUNE 8, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEELE moved the second reading of the clause added to the Forgery Punishment Bill. The right hon. baronet said, he would take that opportunity of making a statement to the House, in reference to something which had fallen from the hon. and learned member for Knaresborough last night. When he (Sir Robert Peel) stated that he had communicated with six of the most respectable merchants in London, expressing to him their apprehensions of the consequences if the punishment of death were abolished, he was met by the statement, that two of these very gentlemen had permitted a person charged with forgery to escape the hands of justice. Now, he held in his hand a letter, signed by all these gentlemen, dated that day, in which they asserted that the statement he had just alluded to was entirely without foundation; and they requested that he would communicate the contents in the most public manner to the House.

Mr. Fowell Buxton said he had reason to believe that the statement was substantially correct as to the fact, though inaccurate as to date. The fact was, that a forgery was committed upon the house of Shipman and Co., of George-court, up-holsters; and, when it was recollected that the party accused was the father of nine children, some excuse would be made for these parties not prosecuting. But there was no doubt that the forgery took place.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, the question was, whether the parties abandoned the prosecution from a dread of inflicting the punishment of death?

Mr. F. Buxton had been informed, on high authority, that the substance of what he had stated was capable of proof in every part, as stated by the hon. member for Knaresborough, except the date.

The clause read a second time, and the Forgery Bill passed.

REPEAL OF THE VESTRIES' ACTS OF IRELAND.

JUNE 10, 1830.

Mr. O'Connell moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the statutes in force in Ireland, as enabled parish vestries to assess rates for the building, rebuilding, and enlarging of churches and chapels, and also for the repairing of the chancels of churches, and also for providing things necessary for the celebration of divine service therein.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, as an amendment, for "leave to bring in a bill to amend the Act 7 Geo. IV., c. 72, for regulating Vestries," and, with respect even to that amendment, he should be ready to abandon it in favour of the noble lord opposite (Lord Gower), if he would undertake to bring forward a measure for the purpose.

Mr. Hume defended the original motion, and expressed a hope that, if ministers would not accede to that motion, they would themselves originate some measure which would give satisfaction at once to the House and to the country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL was afraid that he should never be able to bring in a bill upon this subject, so framed as to give satisfaction to the hon. member for Aberdeen. He thought that the whole question now under discussion resolved itself simply into this—Is it right that provision should be made for the due performance of divine worship in every parish in Ireland? If it were, how ought that provision to be made? He contended that it should be by parochial assessment. The hon. member would have it otherwise. Was the hon. member then prepared to provide for the proper payment of the Church of Ireland out of his own funds, as well as for the proper payment of the Church to which he now contributed?

Mr. Hume said, that he was not. He wished the parishioners to be allowed to tax themselves.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the answer of the hon. member for Aberdeen was just the answer which he had expected to receive from him. The hon. member was therefore an advocate of parochial assessments, but of parochial assessments formed upon such a system as must be destructive to the Established Church of Ireland. To admit 1,000 Catholics to be on a level with twelve Protestants in parishes where the population was so unequally divided between the two religions, would be to make the Church Establishment of Ireland a mere mockery. He thought that there ought to be a specification by law of the matters deemed essential to the maintenance of divine service, and that the vestry should not be empowered to disburse the funds of the parish on any but such matters; but he was not prepared to introduce a bill with such specification during the present session. The hon. member asked, why not? He would ask in return, whether ministers were now able to get a fair hearing for the business which was already before the House, and which was absolutely necessary for the public service? He admitted that it was the right of that and every other hon. member to speak upon and discuss every subject that came before the House. The right he would not dispute; but when the hon. member and others thought fit to exercise that right as they did, how was public business to go on? The hon. gentleman might, no doubt, say he was a member of the legislature, and had a right to do so; but if there were twenty other members who would exercise their right to the same extent, so far from being enabled to pass any bill, the House could never get one to a first reading. He therefore, without contesting the hon. member for Aberdeen's right, or presuming to say that the hon. gentleman ever made use of any unnecessary argumentation in his reasoning, still felt that, while such course was pursued, they could never get to the end of their business. When the hon. member occupied the time of the House on an average for four or five hours every night, it was rather hard that he should be the person to turn round and become the accuser of the government for delay. He was not willing to add to the business of the present session, for he was sorry to find that there was not now sufficient time to despatch what was already before the House. For his own part, he was often employed seventeen or eighteen hours a day. In that House he often spent ten hours, in addition to seven or eight spent in the discharge of his official duties, and he fairly owned, that he was thus left with too little time for the proper consideration of public business. Under these circumstances, it would not be right to press such a bill as that on the consideration of the House. The right hon. gentleman concluded by expressing his opposition to the motion.

The House rejected the amendment, and divided on Mr. O'Connell's motion. Ayes, 17; Noes, 141—majority, 124.

CONVICTS.

JUNE 11, 1830.

Mr. Hume having moved for certain returns relating to convicts sent out to New South Wales, &c., in 1828 and 1829; Sir M. W. Ridley, concurring in the motion, begged to call the attention of the right hon. secretary opposite to a statement which had been made to him (Sir M. W. Ridley) a few days back, respecting the treatment of some convicts on their arrival at New South Wales. He was informed that, in a week after their arrival out at the colony, some of them appeared abroad without any restraint; that they lived in a style of affluence which they could not support here. He alluded to convicts who had been sent out for forgery,—many of whom were living in a style of splendour. Some of them kept their carriages and horses, and in other respects were in the enjoyment of much affluence. He understood that some steps had been taken to correct this evil; but still he felt it his duty to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the circumstances to which the hon. baronet alluded, were amongst the reasons which induced him, on a former evening, to object to transportation as an efficient punishment for forgery. In fact, it was almost impossible that a man who had moved in a respectable rank of life, and who had the command of money, could be made to labour under another who was very much below him in station. He regretted that any thing such as this should occur, yet it was difficult, in a colony which had now nearly lost its character of a penal colony, to prevent the influence which education and rank would naturally acquire. No doubt, however, a limit should be set to indulgence to convicts. With the particular circumstances to which the hon. baronet alluded, he was not acquainted. Indeed, as the hon. baronet must be aware, the colony did not come within his department; but no doubt, if they were such as the hon. baronet had described them, a check ought to be put to them, and he was sure his right hon. friend, the secretary for the colonies, would give the subject all due attention.

Mr. Hume's motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENTS.

JUNE 11, 1830.

In a Committee of Supply, Sir James Graham, on the item relating to Consular Establishments, moved as an amendment, that £79,970 be substituted for £87,970.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, who spoke at an advanced period of the debate, said he could not see the slightest inconsistency in the conduct of the hon. member for Beverley. When the hon. gentleman said, that he entertained confidence in the general disposition of his Majesty's government towards economy, he by no means relinquished his right to examine any particular part of their conduct. He did not think his Majesty's government had been well used by the hon. baronet. It was too much for the hon. baronet to argue, that his Majesty's government disregarded public opinion because they disregarded his opinion. What were the facts? The estimates voted last year, amounted to £17,525,000; the estimates which it was proposed to vote this year, amounted only to £16,584,000. When did any preceding ministers of their own accord, the circumstances of the country remaining the same, propose a reduction in one year of £1,100,000? Having done that in a single year, and having declared their determination, if they continued in administration, to persevere in their course, that afforded in his mind a conclusive answer to the charge against them of constituting a profligate and corrupt government.

After some explanations on the part of Sir James Graham,—

Sir Robert Peel said—By voting against the motion of the hon. baronet, I do not pledge myself to the support of the present consular establishments, for I think that the whole system of our consular establishments and salaries ought to be revised. We are, however, placed in a peculiar situation; for if we concede to the opinion of the House of Commons on one occasion, our so yielding is used as a taunt against us at another. This certainly is a novel course, at least, if it be not a just one. Now, the present system relative to consuls was an experiment of Mr. Canning's in the year 1825; and the abolition of fees and the substitution of salaries was tried at the recommendation of the House. This experiment has not succeeded, and it is a subject worthy of serious consideration whether we ought not partially to return to the old system of remuneration by fees. But, let me ask, am I to be taunted, because the House of Commons threw out a suggestion, to which I yielded; or, is there any thing in such conduct to justify the hon. baronet in throwing out such a taunt? The House of Commons is as much responsible for the present consular system as the government; and therefore not the tribunal that ought to inflict censure. There have been, already, several reductions made, amounting to £5,300 a year; and, as vacancies occur, a due and proper consideration will be given to every appointment before any vacancy be filled up: but it would not be good policy to withdraw from remote colonies the present consuls, and put them on the superannuation list at home. There are, at present, under the consideration of my noble friend at the head of the Foreign Department, the appointments at Mexico, Carthagena, Lima, Valparaiso, Buenos Ayres, Concepcion, Lisbon, Madrid, and several others; and as vacancies occur at these stations, the necessity of filling them up will be considered; and, what is of more importance, also, whether the emoluments of these offices may not undergo some partial alteration—at least, as to the source from which they are to be ultimately drawn.

JUNE 15, 1830.

In a discussion which arose on the presentation of a petition by Sir E. Knatchbull, from the market gardeners of Middlesex, Surrey, &c., SIR ROBERT PEEL, who had entered the House while Mr. Benett was speaking, said,—There certainly had been many complaints that the old system was inefficient; and with good reason, for there were parishes which had refused to subject themselves to the assessment which was necessary for the support of a watch; the consequence was, that in one parish there had been eighteen burglaries in the course of six weeks: this alarmed the inhabitants, and a voluntary subscription was entered into; but in the course of two months it fell to the ground; and all this time there was no provision for the nightly watch. The present system might be more expensive than the old one, but it was the greatest injustice that, by the refusal of some to provide a proper watch, those expenses should be heightened to others who were willing to pay for the protection of their property. If it were desirable to improve the system, the men must be disciplined for that purpose; but as to calling them a military force beyond that, it was absurd. Every order under which they acted had come to the knowledge of the public. The power which that House had at all times to call for the regulations made, was a sufficient protection against any military system being introduced. Considering that the number only amounted to 3,000 men, he thought that they had done as much as could possibly be expected. Of course the expense was considerable; but how was that to be avoided? Was the number of men too great? On the contrary, it was generally complained of as being too small. Was the salary too large? On the contrary, it was said that it was not sufficient to induce respectable men to offer themselves. For himself he thought that the salary was sufficient, and he should, therefore, be unwilling to raise it; still, however, the opposite opinion prevailed to a considerable extent. With respect to land in the neighbourhood of the metropolis having to pay the rate, he thought that was but just, for as it reaped all the advantages attendant on being situated near so large a city, what right had its owners to expect that they should be exonerated from the disadvantages? He saw no reason why a parish at a distance from the metropolis should be included in the police system; and he should be sorry to propose to the Privy Council to include any such parish, without first consulting the parish authorities, more particularly if they objected to it. He would not extend the system to parishes which did not form, as it were, part of the metropolis. In general, however, parishes had made applications to be included within the police districts; and certainly more made applications to be included than to be excluded. As far as his experience of the new system went, he had formed a highly favourable opinion of it. Twelve months had not yet elapsed since it was formed, and he did not expect that in so short a time it would have done so much. He had never anticipated that it would in that time have become so well acquainted with the class of people it was most desirous the police should be acquainted with, in order to watch them. He did not suppose that its discipline would in that period have become so perfect, or the men, who were all new to the employment, would in so short a time have become so well acquainted with the habits of the thieves of London, as to prevent their depredations. The police was daily improving, and three or four years would not elapse before the House, he was sure, would congratulate itself on having established the force. Gentlemen must not judge altogether from the streets through which they were accustomed to walk, but they must look at every part of the metropolis and its environs. That system could not be good which did not provide for the police of every part; for if the police of St. Giles's were neglected, the parish of St. George would suffer. The former system, which allowed each parish to take care of itself, was a bad one. In one parish the greatest care might be taken, but in another the police might be wholly neglected. The consequence would be, that the thieves would live in the outskirts of the well-watched parish, and commit their depredations in the other, when they found an opportunity. Complaints were made of the police almost before it was formed. It was not adopted from any whim, it had been recommended by a committee nominated at his suggestion—that committee had made elaborate enquiries, and recommended the present police system. The moment it was tried, even before it was complete, some gentlemen exclaimed against it, and wanted to return to the old system. He hoped the new system would be preserved, for his confidence in its success was strengthened every day. The improvement already effected was very great, and every day it became more manifest; and if gentlemen would only watch its operations, and wait a reasonable time, he was persuaded that they would be as partial to it as he was.

Later in the debate, Sir Robert Peel, in explanation to Mr. Alderman Wood, said he was never more surprised, than to find a debate of this kind brought on without any intimation having been given, or any notice even that a petition was to be presented; and not merely a debate, but an attack on him. The hon. baronet came down with scraps of his former speeches, and endeavoured to prove that he wished to change the institutions of the country. The hon. baronet said he was glad that the city of London had resisted the secretary of state, as it had formerly resisted an arbitrary sovereign, and had escaped the control of the new police. The fact was, that he had told the city that he would not concern himself in any way with its police, except by giving it all the documents and papers connected with the Westminster police, which could be of service to the city in forming an improved police. He never had attempted to interfere with the city; he had no desire to control the city of London, and wished that its police should be improved under its own municipal authorities, and not under the authority of the secretary of state. He did say that the country had outgrown its institutions; but he applied that remark only to its police institutions. If the hon. baronet thought that there should be no other institutions now than those that existed in the time of Alfred, he was much mistaken. The owners of property now would complain loudly enough, if, under the present circumstances of the country, there were no other justice than that which was instituted when Alfred reigned. The hon. baronet's respect for antiquity carried him too far when he found nothing to admire but the institutions that were framed 600 or 700 years ago. He hoped every populous place would provide itself with a police, but he by no means wished that the police of every town should be under the control of the secretary of state. There was no other effectual way of checking crime than that of having a good police. To show that he did not wish to control the police, that he did not want any patronage from it, he would mention that he had not made one single appointment, but had left all the appointments in the hands of the commissioners, making them responsible for the persons they recommended. The present system was a great deal better than the old one, under which the parochial authorities made a great number of very improper appointments without being either efficient, active, or united.

Subsequently, Sir Robert Peel said he wished to state, that he himself was no more capable of managing a police thirty miles from London than of regulating the police of Dublin or Edinburgh. He certainly wished that all the large towns should establish a police, but he did not wish that to be placed under the control of the secretary of state. He had enough to do without looking after such details. What he wished to see extended was, the plan adopted at Manchester. In that town there was an excellent police, but it was entirely under the control of the local authorities.

ROUTINE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

JUNE 15, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said he felt himself obliged to call the attention of the House to the state of the public business, as he was at present deeply interested in the subject. It was necessary to make some alteration in the mode of proceeding, and come to some determination as to the time at which public business should begin, or abandon it altogether. At present it was so deferred, that attention to it was precluded. At that late period of the session, something ought to be done, or the inconvenience to the public would be very great. He should beg leave, therefore, to submit to the House, in the existing state of the public business, that it would be expedient for the present session, and only for the present session, that the House should come to an understanding, that public business should commence at a definite hour. He would say, that on every day except Wednesday, public business ought to begin at half-past five o'clock. For private business, and for the presenting of petitions, there would then be an hour and a half every day. The petitions, too, might be presented after the public business was done. Gentlemen who were concerned in petitions, when they were of a doubtful nature, would greatly facilitate the business of the House if they would not excite debates on them. He would not move any formal resolution on the subject, but he was anxious to collect the general sense of the House on the question, whether it would not be desirable to make a temporary arrangement—and to be understood only as a temporary arrangement—that the public business should begin every evening at half-past five o'clock? He did not wish that it should take effect on the present day, but that in future, business should begin at that time.

Mr. Brougham said, that if any private matter were under discussion at half-past five, it ought to be allowed to be concluded. Sir R. Peel assented to this proposal.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE BILL.

JUNE 18, 1830.

In the discussion on the Attorney-general's motion for the recommitment of this Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL objected to the course taken by hon. members, who, in opposing the committee upon the bill, had anticipated the discussion proper to a committee, and, instead of combating the principle, contented themselves with criticising the details of the bill. He should not imitate this example, but address the observations he had to make to the object or principle of the measure. After repeated complaints of the delays that occurred in legal proceedings, and the consequent hinderance of justice, a commission was appointed, at the unanimous desire of the House, to investigate the whole question of the proceedings in our courts of common law, and submit to the Crown and Parliament remedies for so striking an evil. Now that the enquiry had been instituted, and the report had been made, they were asked to begin the enquiry over again, and by persons who, he would venture to say, had never read the report at all. This, however, was the constant course now pursued: for enquiry they had clamour; and, when the time for enquiry had gone by, then fresh enquiry was called for. He would, however, ask hon. gentlemen, before they decided against the principle of this bill, to advert a little to the facts of the case. The first enquiry of the commission was with respect to the courts of common law; and, with reference to the Court of King's Bench alone, it appeared that there had, within five years, been begun in that court no less than 281,000 causes. In the year 1823, the number was 43,000; in 1826, it was 69,000; and in 1827, it was 66,000. The commissioners pursued this calculation further, and the conclusion to which they came was, that the Court of King's Bench was immoderately overburdened with business; that the judges exerted themselves with great activity; but that, notwithstanding, the arrear of Term business and Nisi Prius causes was extremely oppressive: that the Court of Common Pleas was also very busy; that there was no arrear of Term business, but a considerable arrear of Nisi Prius business. The commissioners doubted the policy of adding to the labour of the judges, and of occupying every moment of their time, without allowing them any leisure for recreation, or even for the pursuit of those branches of learning which were connected with their functions. They proposed, therefore, that the business in all the courts should be equalized, and, for that purpose, that another judge should be added to each court. That was the main proposal which the report suggested, and which the bill was to carry into effect. There were others, into which he did not think it necessary to enter at present. If it were admitted that three new judges were necessary, then arose the question, whether the time of those three judges would be entirely and exclusively occupied by the business so assigned to them; or whether it would not be possible that a portion of their time might be employed in the business which now devolved upon eight judges in Wales? The commissioners had come to the conclusion that it was possible so to employ them, and that led to the question, whether it were not desirable, by that means, to save the expense of the eight judges who now performed the duties? His Majesty's ministers had come to the conclusion, that if three new judges were to be appointed in the first place, they could not ask Parliament to retain eight unnecessary persons in office; and, next, he thought that they would be able to show that justice would be better administered by judges of the highest character, belonging to the superior courts, than it would be administered, without meaning any disparagement to the present judges, and entertaining, as he did, the highest respect for them, by those who might hold their offices with a seat in Parliament, and who, from the narrowness of their salaries, were necessarily practising barristers. But then ministers were met with this objection, "You must not make this alteration because the people of Wales (a brave and gallant people, as his hon. and learned friend designated them, and truly)—the people of Wales are adverse to it;" and his hon. and learned friend went so far as to deny the right of Parliament to take away their Court of Equity. No man could speak more affectionately than he could do, with the utmost sincerity, of the principality of Wales. He must say that he honoured the principality; that no part of the empire had held out examples more worthy of admiration than Wales had, at various periods of difficulty as well as of success; but could he, on reading the reports, say that the measure was contrary to the will of the people of Wales? It was not either by his, or his hon. and learned friend's assertion, but by the evidence, that that point must be decided. Now, who were the parties whose opinion had been taken by the commissioners on the subject? The first was his hon. friend, the member for the county of Brecon, who, he was sure, if the honour or character of the principality were at stake, would be ready to stand up in its vindication. The chairmen of the different quarter sessions had also been examined, who, by their own experience, and by their intercourse with the magistrates, were best calculated to form a judgment. They all concurred in pronouncing it desirable that the principality of Wales should be included in the circuits of the English judges. One of those gentlemen added, that the attorneys were principally adverse to the change, because the fees in the principality courts were higher than elsewhere. After the government had received the opinions of the commissioners, supported by this evidence, would it have been justified in refusing to act upon the report, and ought it not to call upon Parliament for its sanction to a measure so recommended? Besides, it was a fallacy to say that the principality had local courts, and that this bill was taking them away. There would be just as many local courts as ever, only the justice in them would be administered by English judges, and on the English system: it appeared to him, that there was a combination of advantages to be anticipated from this bill. First, there was the more effectual administration of justice in England, by the addition of the new judges; and next, the advantage of placing Wales under the same jurisdiction as England, and saving the expense of the Welsh judges. Now, certainly, if his Majesty's government were inclined to select improper persons to fulfil the judicial office, the Welsh judicial system would have been precisely what they would have preferred, from the necessity in which the judges were of practising as barristers. This it was proposed to do away with altogether, as well as the patronage and local machinery connected with these courts. He said that his Majesty's government were not only justified in the course it had pursued, but that it would not have discharged its duty if it had acted otherwise.

On a division, the motion was carried by 129 against 30; majority, 99.

WAYS AND MEANS—SUGAR DUTIES.

JUNE 21, 1830.

In a debate on the resolutions respecting the sugar duties in a committee of ways and means, after a speech of considerable length by Mr. Huskisson; Mr Charles Grant moved, as an amendment, that all brown, Muscovado, or plain sugar, the produce of British possessions in the West-Indies or North America, or the Mauritius, should be admitted, on paying a duty of 20s. the cwt.

SIR R. PEEL said that he wished to say a few words on the last point to which the hon. member for Callington had adverted, and which he considered to be by far the most important consideration which had yet been introduced into the debate. That point was simply this—was it the duty of the House, in the present state of the finances of the country, and after the remission of taxation which had already been made in this session, to run the risk of impairing the revenue further, by making the reduction on those duties which his right hon. friend proposed? The taxes which had been already remitted, by the abolition of the duties on beer and leather, amounted to £3,300,000. His right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had told the House that he expected that loss of revenue to be compensated by the new duties on spirits, to the amount of £400,000, and on stamps to the amount of £200,000, leaving a total loss of revenue amounting to £2,700,000. His right hon. friend behind him now proposed another remission of taxes to the amount of £1,200,000, looking only to the compensation to be derived from the additional duty on spirits, which was calculated to produce £200,000; thus proposing, in reality, another reduction of taxes to no less an amount than £1,000,000. His right hon. friend expressed a hope that the sum so lost to the revenue would be made up by the duties paid on the increased consumption of sugar which would follow the reductions he proposed to make. It was an experiment frightfully hazardous; for could the House calculate that £500,000 would be produced to the revenue, when, in order to raise that sum, there must be an increase in the consumption of sugar amounting to a full eighth part of that which was already consumed in the country? But even if that sum should be produced, there would still be an additional deficit of half a million of revenue to supply: so that upon the whole revenue of the year there must be a deficit of £3,200,000 to be made good upon the most favourable calculation. Such being the case, would it be wise to make any further reduction? His right hon. friend had reminded the House of the savings which the Government would make by the reduction of the 4 per-cents. He wondered how his right hon. friend could have referred to that point, because it was sure to excite in his mind a reminiscence of which he was bound to avail himself. How had the Government been able to effect the reduction of the 4 per-cents? By the maintenance of the public credit. It was by the manner in which it had kept up the public funds that Government had been able to avail itself of its credit to reduce the rate of interest, and to diminish the annual taxation of the country, in that respect, by no less a sum than £700,000. It was on this very account that he doubted the policy of incurring the risk of having any deficiency in the revenue. If they ran the risk of having to make up a deficiency by an issue of Exchequer bills, or a loan from the bank, they must bid adieu to all further hopes of relieving the revenue of the country by a reduction of the rate of interest paid for the support of the public credit. He had heard his right hon. friend behind him talk of the vacillation exhibited by his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now he would remind the House, that this remission of taxes differed from every other. It was impossible to take advice upon it from those who had the best knowledge, because they were deeply interested in the result. If those persons, after the remission was agreed upon, told ministers that they were going to do what was unjust, were they to be blamed if, on learning the injustice which they were going to commit, they changed their original course of action? That the charge of vacillation should have come from that particular quarter certainly did surprise him. For a week past public notice had been given by the right hon. member for Inverness, that the motion which the House would have to discuss was for a reduction of the duty of sugar, not according to a fixed rate of the article, but according to the quality of the sugar. The proposal now made by his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, did not differ from the principle advanced in the notice of motion given by the right hon. member for Inverness, as would appear by a reference to the terms of the notice. The second resolution which the right hon. gentleman had given notice of his intention to move, declared, that it was expedient to levy a duty on sugar according to the value of the different qualities of the article, rather than by a fixed rate. Up to half-past five o'clock that evening, he believed that it was the intention of the right hon. gentleman to propose a reduction of the duty upon that principle. The charge of inconsistency and vacillation, therefore, came with very bad grace from the right hon. gentleman, who had abandoned his original proposal, and substituted a fixed rate of duty instead of a duty imposed according to the value of the article. The right hon. gentleman, it should be recollected, stood in a different situation from his right hon. friend. The former acted only as an individual member of parliament: the latter was Chancellor of the Exchequer. He would remind the House, that the right hon. gentleman had filled an important situation in the government of the country, and was well acquainted with all the bearings of the subject. If the right hon. gentleman with all his experience, found it necessary, after a week's consideration, to propose resolutions not only at variance with those of which he had originally given notice, but directly opposed to them, why should he deny to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the privilege of changing his opinion with respect to the practical operation of a measure which he had propounded? He did not mean to say that the right hon. gentleman had not a good excuse for changing the nature of his resolutions. The resolutions proposed by the right hon. gentleman to-night, did not agree with those which he moved last year. He thought that no imputation rested with any man for changing his course of conduct with reference to matters so complicated. In such circumstances, individuals must be governed by communications from parties interested in the question. No imputation could rest upon any man for changing his course, rather than, by a protracted contest in that House, submit to the chance of keeping the whole country in suspense, and creating great inconvenience. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were convinced that his original proposition was not a convenient one, he thought that so far from its being his duty to occupy the time of the House with a contest on the subject, he did his duty towards the country and towards all parties interested in the question, by announcing the change which his intentions had undergone, and submitting the new proposition to the House. He would not enter into any details respecting the bill, but he saw no difficulty in fixing the duty in the way proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. member who spoke last admitted that the principle of the measure was just. Then why not affirm the resolutions which contained the principle? He hoped that the House would prefer the resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to those proposed by the right hon. gentleman without notice, which called upon the House to relinquish one million of revenue in the present state of the public finances, trusting to an increased consumption to compensate the diminution. In his opinion, the proposition was fraught with consequences so dangerous, that no consideration could induce him to give it his support. He also hoped that the House would by its vote show a determination to maintain the public credit, and to enable the government to make a further remission of taxation by the reduction of the interest of the debt.

On a division, the amendment was negatived by 182 against 144—majority, 38; and, on another division, the original resolution, for 22s. per cwt., was agreed to by 161 against 144—majority, 17.

SUITS IN EQUITY BILL.—COURT OF CHANCERY.

JUNE 24, 1830.

In the resumed debate on the Court of Chancery Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he was sorry to interpose between the long array of legal combatants who had addressed the House; but there were, he thought, some considerations not legal, which might with propriety be addressed to the House by a layman. It was a question in which they were all deeply interested; their comforts and their property were deeply involved in it; and therefore, though they were not legal men, they might form an opinion concerning it. The question for the House to decide was, not whether the bill would prevent delay, but whether a preliminary obstacle should be suffered to prevent the consideration even of a measure which had been sent down from the other House of Parliament, and the object of which was to diminish the expense and shorten the proceedings in a suit in Chancery. He considered that the discussion at present was, whether or not they would proceed and take into consideration, according to the ordinary forms, a bill to improve the Court of Chancery? All the measures, however, for the improvement of that Court were met—by what? By a demand for further enquiry. He thought that at present a practical measure was called for; and when it was produced, it was found that enquiry was wanted. After all the debates on this subject, to ask for further enquiry when a practical measure was proposed, was to imitate the course of those alarming proceedings in the Court of Chancery which they were all ready to condemn. It was fifteen years since that cause had been first set down for a hearing. There was lying before him the first volume of the Commissioners' Report; it had been set down again and again for further exceptions, for rehearings to be spoken to. Again there was no decision; and the House wanted to follow the example of the Court of Chancery: and though one half of the Report, made three years before, contained no less than 569 pages, the House wanted further enquiry. There were three measures proposed—the first was, to diminish the interval between the setting down of a cause and the hearing of it; the second was, to lessen the delay which intervened before passing the decree; and the third had for its object, to diminish the motives now attributed (though he believed unjustly) to the Masters for delay, on account of delay turning to their own profit. These measures were calculated to prevent delay; and now, after so much enquiry, to stop them, on the ground of further enquiry being necessary, seemed to him a solemn mockery. To show the necessity of the measures, what, he would ask, was the state of business in the Court of Chancery? Had the business of the Court of Chancery increased? He would not go back 200 years, he would take the business before the Court during the last three years—1827, 1828, and 1829, and compare it with the business before the Court in 1814, 1815, and 1816, the three years immediately subsequent to the creation of the Vice-chancellor. The number of causes set down for hearing of all descriptions, in these three years, was 4,801; while the number set down in 1827, 1828, and 1829, was 6,772, showing an actual increase in the business of the Court, arising from the increase of the people, and the increase of wealth, and the increase of litigation, of 1,971 causes in the three last years, as compared to the three years ending with 1816. He stated this as a strong presumption that additional aid was necessary to get through the business. What was the arrear of business? He would take the first seal before Easter during the last four years, and see what was the total number of causes standing on the paper ready for hearing, but which could not be heard. In 1827, on the first seal before Easter, including all causes set down, the arrear was 742; in 1828, it was 588; in 1829, it was 853; and in 1830, on the first seal before Easter, it was 655. The parties were anxious to have a hearing—they were ready; but, on an average, there were 600 causes remaining unheard, from the impossibility of hearing them. That the time was come when some remedy ought to be applied, could not, he thought, be doubted, though there might be some difference of opinion as to the remedy to be applied. It was the duty of the House to provide against further delay. What was the state of the business at present? The number of causes of all descriptions entered on the Vice-chancellor's paper, in January and February, 1829, was 265. The average of the time before these causes could be heard was one year and a quarter, although they were all ready for hearing. It would be fifteen months before a proper opportunity arrived for hearing any one of these causes after it had been set down. Were those facts not sufficient to call for a remedy? That was a question which he thought satisfactorily answered. The next question was, Is the remedy proposed the fitting one? The object of the measure was to appoint an additional judge. He wished to meet the objections to this proposition with candour. It was said that in 1828 he had opposed a similar motion. He had not done so. There had been no such proposition. He had moved the previous question on a motion of the hon. gentleman's, but that was not for the appointment of an additional judge. But even if he were not clear of all such objections, he claimed for himself the liberty of deciding all questions by the circumstances under which they were brought before the House for discussion; and he contended that it was not proper to bind down members to the words of their former speeches. He begged therefore to decide the question of this additional judge without any reference to his own previous votes, or the previous speeches of other hon. members. The hon. member for Kirkcudbright (Mr. Ferguson) had declared, if it could be proved to his satisfaction that the present triumph over the arrear of business in the Court of Chancery was only temporary, he would vote for the appointment of a new judge. Now, he would show that the impression on that arrear was temporary; he would prove that the business of the Court of Chancery was increasing, and he would claim that hon. member's vote. Since the returns connected with the business of that Court had been presented to the House, the number of causes on the paper had materially increased. On the 1st of June, in Trinity Term, there were down for hearing before the Vice-chancellor, an arrear of 353 causes. Since that time there had been thirteen disposed of, but thirty-two new causes had been set down; so that the number of causes, according to that return, was increased nearly threefold. In the same manner, in the Court of the Master of the Rolls, there were on the same day 305 causes, or whatever else they were called; of these there had been disposed of since that time fifty, and there were entered on the paper seventy. This was the boasted diminution of the arrear of causes of which they had heard so much. This was the prospect they had of getting rid of the delays of the Court of Chancery. Independent of all this, however, he doubted the policy or the expediency of trusting to the continuance of the good health of the judge, or the unceasing exertion of his faculties in the constant discharge of the arduous duties of his office. He doubted much whether it were politic or prudent, either in official or in legal situations, to keep those who held them fourteen or fifteen hours a-day employed in the mere drudgery of their department. He confessed it appeared to him that such a course was calculated to disqualify them for the performance of some of the more important and higher duties of their station—an opinion in which he was confirmed by Mr. Burke, who, in a letter to a member of the French Convention, declared that the judgment of those who were so laboriously employed must be deficient in that wisdom and forethought which should distinguish such a situation. It had been objected, also, that the number of appeals which must be made to the decisions of inferior judges was an argument against the appointment of another judge; but he believed that the benefit derived from such appeals, when under proper restrictions, counterbalanced, in a great degree, any evils which might arise from their number. Another objection to this measure was, that the additional judge would be the mere deputy of the Lord Chancellor, a mere Jack Rugby. * He confessed he did not well know what the allusion of the hon. and learned member for Plympton aimed at by this Jack Rugby; but he thought he could find enough in the speech of Mr. Wetherell, in 1813, to neutralize the objections of Sir Charles Wetherell, in 1830. The hon. and learned member, on the debate on the appointment of the Vice-chancellor in 1813, had spoken a speech in favour of the appointment of a new judge so good, that he wished he had as good a one on his side now. The hon. and learned member at that time contended, as he found it reported in Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, "that the bill offered the most efficacious and constitutional means for redressing the grievances under which the subjects of these realms now laboured from the necessary delay and arrear of business in the Court of Chancery and House of Lords. He denied that the new officer would be either inefficient or degraded, and, on the contrary, argued that men of competent legal knowledge, high character, and excellent abilities, would be found eligible to and ready to undertake the discharge of its important functions. He justified the application of the Dead fund to the payment of part of the salary of the new officer, and closed his observations by warmly approving of every part of the bill." His hon. and learned friend might oppose the bill, but he was not justified, after having expressed such an opinion, to declare that it would degrade the Lord Chancellor. After observing that the increase of the business of the Court year after year had fully justified the appointment of an additional judge now as it did then, the right hon. baronet entreated the House not to lose the good which this bill held out the hope of attaining, because it might not go to the full length which some sanguine persons anticipated, and that, too, when no other proposition of any feasible nature was before them, to prevent the delays which had been so often a subject of complaint. Above all, he implored them not to yield to the demand for a new and indefinite enquiry, at a time when they had before them a bill, founded on the report of those able commissioners who had enquired into the whole of the practice of the courts, and whose recommendations formed the substance of the bill. He thought he had done enough to prove that he was the friend of gradual reform in the administration of the law. This was one of the measures by which he hoped to lay the foundation of that reform; and if there were any who objected to the permanent expense, they would learn with satisfaction, that when the temporary relief had been afforded to the judges of the court, the bill left it in the power of his majesty, on the resignation or death of the new judge, to dispense with the necessity of appointing a successor. He trusted, therefore, that no amendment would be allowed to interfere with an object so really beneficial; and being himself deeply impressed with a sense of its importance, he should at once move, as an amendment on the amendment of the hon. and learned gentleman (Sir C. Wetherell), "That the bill be now read a second time."

On a division, Sir Charles Wetherell's amendment was negatived, and Sir Robert Peel consented to the postponement of the second reading of the bill to the 28th instant.

ROYAL MESSAGE ON THE DEMISE OF THE CROWN.

JUNE 29, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL brought up the following message from his Majesty (William IV.), which was read by the Speaker:—

"William, R.

"The King feels assured, that the House of Commons entertains a just sense of the loss which his majesty and the country have sustained in the death of his majesty's lamented brother, the late king; and that the House sympathizes with his majesty in the deep affliction in which his majesty is plunged by this mournful event. The king, taking into his serious consideration the advanced period of the session, and the state of the public business, feels unwilling to recommend the introduction of any new matter, which, by its postponement, would tend to the detriment of the public service. His majesty has adverted to the provisions of the law which decrees the determination of parliament within an early period after the demise of the crown; and being of opinion that it will be much conducive to the general convenience and to the public interests of the country, to call, with as little delay as possible, a new parliament, his majesty recommends the House of Commons to make such temporary provision as may be requisite for the public service in the interval that may elapse between the close of the present session, and the meeting of another parliament."

[During the reading of the message, the members, in compliance with a very general call to that effect, remained uncovered, and the whole proceeding evidently attracted deep attention.]

Sir Robert Peel then rose to move an address in answer to this message, and spoke nearly as follows:—Sir, I propose to defer until to-morrow the consideration of any part of this message, the answer to which can by possibility provoke any difference of opinion in this House. But I am sure, sir, I should not be acting in consonance with the prevailing—and, I trust I may say, the unanimous—feeling of this House, if I postponed even for the shortest period, the moving an address to his majesty, condoling with his majesty on account of the severe loss which he, in common with the country, has sustained by the demise of our late much-lamented sovereign; and offering, at the same time, to his majesty, the assurances of our earnest hope and prayer, that his reign may be a reign of honour and of happiness to his majesty and to his people. That principle of the constitution which forbids the possibility of there being any suspension or interruption of the exercise of the regal power, makes it necessary that we should unite the discordant and strongly-contrasted topics of condolence on the death of the late sovereign, his Majesty's brother, and of congratulation on his Majesty's accession to the throne of his ancestors; but yet, I am confident that no expression of congratulation, however strong—no prayer for his Majesty's health, happiness, or prosperity, could be more gratifying or more consolatory to his Majesty, than the assurance that this House deeply sympathises with him in his affliction for the loss he has sustained in the death of a beloved brother; and that it is also deeply sensible of the loss to him and to his people in being deprived of that sovereign whom they now unfeignedly deplore. The House will bear in mind that his late Majesty administered the affairs of this country for a period of twenty years, a great portion of which time the nation was involved in a war, during which the reign of the Sovereign was signalised by some of the most brilliant achievements recorded in history, and the military reputation and renown of this country exalted to the highest pinnacle of glory. But in the course of a considerable portion of that time, during which his late Majesty reigned over this country, we enjoyed the highest blessings which could be conferred by peace; and I believe that much of the benefits we have derived from the mild and temperate administration of the laws during that period, were owing to the mild and generous character of his Majesty himself. Sir, we live too near the period of those occurrences to be able to estimate in their full force all the benefits we have derived from the mild and beneficent government of the late king; but I cannot help thinking that a more remote posterity will pronounce that reign to have been one of the brightest, and I may add, one of the most honourable as well as most beneficial, in the annals of this country. It will regard the late king as a sovereign who in war maintained, in its highest state, the honour, and character, and glory of England; and who, whether in peace or in war, during the whole course of his delegated power, whether as regent or as king, never exercised, or expressed any wish to exercise, the prerogatives of the Crown, except for the safety and the advantage of his people. I am sure I shall not be considered as overstepping the language of truth when I say that the king was a liberal patron of the arts and of artists; and I may add, from much personal experience, that no appeal to his Majesty for the affliction or distresses of his subjects ever remained unnoticed, and that his generosity was widely and frequently extended to those whose situation demanded relief. Sir, this address, while it condoles with his Majesty on the loss of his brother, congratulates him on his accession to the throne of his ancestors; and I am sure I shall best consult the feelings and wishes of his Majesty, by refraining on the present occasion from any of that laboured or overstrained language of panegyric which the occasion might seem to demand. The life of the princes of the royal family of this country is familiar to almost the whole of its people. I think it right to assure the House that his present Majesty has openly declared, that the greatest relief he feels under his present difficulties, is the satisfaction that he has had opportunities of witnessing the conduct of his late revered father and lamented brother, and that he shall ever have his recollection of that conduct before him as his guide in the discharge of his important duties. The House will, however, bear in mind that his Majesty has, from his earliest infancy, been engaged in the active service of his country. His habits and principles in the discharge of the duties of the various stations he has occupied are well known. His conduct, whether as a peer of parliament, or as a private subject, is before the world, and has been displayed to so much advantage on so many occasions, that I think I may be spared the necessity of dilating on the subject at this moment; but I trust the House will cordially and unanimously join with me in voting an answer to this address—declaring our anxious wishes that his Majesty may enjoy all health, and honour, and glory, in the administration of the government, and expressing our confident expectation that his Majesty's reign will be distinguished by an ardent desire to maintain inviolate our religion, our liberty, and our laws, and that he will labour to promote the true and permanent interests of all classes of the people. The right. hon. gentleman then moved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, "To assure his Majesty that this House most cordially sympathises in the deep affliction in which his Majesty has been involved by the death of his lamented brother, the late king; and humbly to condole with his Majesty on the loss of a sovereign so justly dear to his Majesty and his people; to express to his Majesty the deep sense we entertain of the blessings this nation has enjoyed under the reign of his late Majesty, from the long continuance of peace—the anxious efforts of his late Majesty to encourage the arts, to extend the commerce, and to advance the general welfare of the country—to beseech his Majesty to accept of our cordial congratulations on his accession to the throne—to assure his Majesty of our ardent attachment to his person—and to assure his Majesty further of our deep conviction that his reign will be distinguished, under the blessing of Divine Providence, by an anxious desire for the maintenance of our religion and the laws of his kingdom, and for the promotion of the happiness and liberty of all conditions of his people.”

Mr. Brougham having seconded the address, in a brief but suitable speech,—Sir Robert Peel moved that the address should be presented to his Majesty by such members of the House as were of his Majesty's most honourable privy council.

Mr. C. W. Wynn proposed, as it was a subject in which the feelings of the whole House were so immediately concerned, and as it would be more respectful to his Majesty and agreeable to the whole House, that the Address be presented by the House in a body.

Sir R. Peel said, that if it had not been for the approaching funeral of his late Majesty, it would have been more agreeable and right that the House should in a body present the Address to his Majesty, but as it was, it certainly would be better the Address should be presented as he had proposed.

Mr. C. W. Wynn hoped to be excused for pressing his own view upon the House again; but he really believed it would be more agreeable—certainly to his own feelings—and likewise to the whole House, that the House should go in a body, and present the Address.

Mr. Brougham said, that on the occasion of the death of George III., which also happened on a Saturday, the House met on Sunday; but that, owing to some delay on the part of the Lord Chamberlain, in attending to administer the oaths, the House adjourned till Monday; and again adjourned over till Tuesday or Wednesday, and then adjourned, so as to allow the day of the funeral of his Majesty to pass over; then, indeed, the House could not do otherwise than go up in a body.

Sir Robert Peel observed, that, as his Majesty had retired into privacy as much as it was possible for him to do without detriment to any of the important public duties that devolved upon him, he believed it would be more agreeable to his Majesty to receive at the hands of the members of his Privy Council that Address which his Majesty could not but regard as the most unanimous and affectionate feeling of the House.

It was carried unanimously, that the Address be presented by such members of the House as were of the Privy Council.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S MESSAGE.

JUNE 30, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEELE moved the Order of the Day for taking into further consideration his Majesty's most gracious Message. The Order having been read,—

Sir Robert Peel spoke as follows:—Sir, I now rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to that part of the most gracious Message of his Majesty which expresses a hope that this House will make temporary provision for the conduct of the public service in the interval which must elapse between the termination of the present session and the assembling of a new Parliament. But I cannot proceed to the performance of that duty without expressing, so far as an individual can presume to express, my deep sense of the considerate and respectful forbearance with which the House was pleased yesterday to limit its proceedings to that part of the Address which related to condolence and congratulation, and unanimously to refuse to enter upon the consideration of any thing which could provoke angry debate, or lead to the expression of a difference of opinion. Sir, upon the recent demise of the Crown, there necessarily devolved upon the ministers a duty of giving advice to his Majesty as to the course which it was fitting for him to pursue for the despatch of public business. The House is, no doubt, aware that, by an ancient law of this country, the demise of the Crown necessarily terminated the existence of Parliament. The reason assigned for that by Blackstone is, that the king, being the head and soul of Parliament—its “caput, principium, et finis”—the demise of the Crown put an end to the proceedings and existence of Parliament, and it was not till the reign of King William that any alteration was made in the law in that respect. By an Act of that Sovereign (the 7th and 8th William and Mary) it was provided, that the demise of the Crown, during the existence of Parliament, should not necessarily terminate its existence, but that it might continue to sit, unless expressly prorogued or dissolved, for six months after such demise. The preamble to that Act sufficiently sets out the causes of it; stating, amongst other things, "the dangers likely to accrue upon the demise of the Crown from the invasion of foreign enemies, or the conspiracies of evil and wickedly-disposed persons at home." And the alteration in that law, no doubt, had relation to the peculiar circumstances of those times, and the danger which then existed of a disputed succession to the Throne of this country. It has been said that this was a temporary Act; but, from all that I can understand of the matter, I am disposed to believe it was intended to be a permanent measure; and the more firmly, because I find it repeated, almost in the same terms, and re-enacted by the subsequent statutes of Queen Anne. But, Sir, whatever may have been the circumstances of that precedent, and whether the provident precaution then taken, of allowing the Parliament, notwithstanding the demise of the Crown, to continue to sit, provided the circumstances of the country required its uninterrupted deliberations, was or was not expedient, is not now the question: the question now is, whether or no, in the present state of public business, and referring to the proceedings incident to the demise of the Crown, and the accession of a new Sovereign, it is more advisable to dissolve the present Parliament, or to continue to sit for the consideration and despatch of such public business as is now unfinished? This is the question, and, Sir, after the most mature consideration of it in all its bearings, the ministers, whose duty it is to advise the Crown, have come to a conclusion that they best discharge that duty by recommending the course pointed out by this message. The question, then, which I have now to put to the House is this—will it accede to the suggestion made by the Crown, of making provision corresponding with the present state of affairs? This is a question which I propose for its immediate consideration. Sir, I think there can be no question that, though circumstances may seem to prove that it is necessary, nay almost advisable, that parliament should continue its deliberations, yet, upon the whole, much inconvenience must arise from its continued sittings, particularly when it is recollected that the period of its natural dissolution—namely, six months—is not very far distant. I would also put it to gentlemen whether the giving a longer time to canvass for elections would not be attended with the greatest inconvenience, and very great expense—for we all know that these long preparations produce no good; they do not facilitate, on the contrary they impede, the free and unbiassed expression of opinion by the electors; and the appeals thus made, and of necessity often repeated, within a large space of time, must have, not a beneficial, but a mischievous and corrupting influence. I hold it too, Sir, that it would expose members of the existing parliament, who are obliged to attend to their duties here, to an unfair disadvantage, as compared with their opponents—candidates for public favour, who, having no business to distract them, will be enabled to apply the whole of their attention to the subject, and to seek means of support which those others have not. These considerations, and the advantage of being personally on the spot canvassing their constituents, must either work injuriously towards the sitting members, if they attend their duties in parliament, or they will affect most mischievously the public business, should gentlemen be selfish enough to yield to them, and absent themselves. And hence it is, that in former periods, when parliament continued to sit under circumstances like the present, there was a constant complaint of the insufficiency of the attendance of members, and there are frequent entries in the journals of those days, of orders made upon members themselves, urging their return to town, or upon sheriffs and returning officers, calling upon them to return them. Upon all these grounds, I think it cannot be denied, that unless there be some special circumstances which require the immediate intervention of parliament, it will be, upon the whole, most conducive to the convenience of gentlemen themselves, most beneficial to the public, and most fair and impartial towards the parties contending for the voices of their constituents, to acknowledge, at the very earliest period we can, consistent with the public business, that the prerogative of the Crown ought to be exercised upon this occasion, and that a new parliament ought to be called. I am aware that, since Queen Anne's reign, instances have occurred of a different course pursued in the reigns of the monarchs who immediately succeeded her. I am aware that it has been usual to send a message to this House, proposing, without delay, the arrangement of the civil list, and that such arrangements were, in fact, made before any prorogation or dissolution took place. But let it be borne in mind that the constitution of the civil list was different then from what it now is; that the sovereign was then in possession of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, and that the sum to be voted by parliament was exactly the difference between the actual amount of the civil list, and the sum of the charges upon it. It is also true, that the time devoted to the discussion of this subject, up to the accession of George III. was not of such a length as, in modern times, so great and important a measure would be thought to require. The bill, for instance, which settled the civil list upon George I. was passed through both Houses with an expedition little known now-a-days. Queen Anne died on the 1st of August, 1714, and the bill for settling the civil list upon her successor was brought into the House on the 12th of August; it was passed through all its stages with great rapidity and little comment; upon the 17th it was taken up to the Lords, returned again upon the 19th, and parliament was prorogued on the 25th of the same month of August. The periods, therefore, in which parliament proceeded to regulate the civil list, upon the demise of the crown, before the parliament was dissolved, cannot, I conceive, be referred to as authorities for our guidance now. It is, I am persuaded, the concurrent and unanimous feeling of the country that, in making a settlement of the civil list upon the present king, under circumstances differing so entirely from those of the late reign, it is desirable that the ministers, upon whom the responsibility of advising the measure rests, should have the fullest opportunity of maturely considering it in all its points; and that the members of this House, who are to sanction such arrangements, should also have the fullest opportunities of weighing and deliberating upon them. Sir, it is to be considered that we have to arrange and settle the civil lists of three different parts of the empire, or, rather, the three civil lists of England, Scotland, and Ireland. A committee which sat upon this subject in 1815—fifteen years ago—gave some general recommendations with respect to the appropriation of the civil list to the Prince, then unrestricted regent, which were closely followed when his Royal Highness succeeded to the Throne; but, at the same time, it is impossible not to admit that there are several circumstances connected with the subject which would admit of additional improvement. I would mention, for instance, several of the public officers of state, who receive their salaries partly from the civil list and partly from the consolidated fund. The judges are so paid; so are some of the officers of the treasury, the expense and charge being defrayed from both sources. Indeed I cannot put the case more strongly than in the instance of my right hon. friend, the chancellor of the exchequer. At this moment the chancellor of the exchequer receives his official emoluments from five different sources, partly from the civil list, part from the consolidated fund of this country, part from the consolidated fund of Ireland, part from other funds arising out of the commutation of fees, and partly from other transactions in his office. It is desirable that this condition of the civil list should be amended, and all charges upon it consolidated. But, adverting to the period which must elapse before government can prepare any well-digested plan for arranging the civil list—adverting to the time which parliament must, of necessity, take in considering that plan—I do not think that the former precedent—a precedent, too, taken from the earliest period, immediately after the death of Queen Anne, by whom the bill was passed—ought to be binding on us; and thinking, therefore, that there will be more advantage in postponing the civil list to a future occasion, than in pressing it on now, and keeping parliament sitting for several weeks, with all the inconveniences of haste in the measure, and expense to the members, we propose to follow the latter precedent of 1820, as the safest course. Sir, it is not that ministers have any doubt that the present parliament would make a just provision for his majesty, for, while members are naturally and justly desirous of curtailing the public expenses, yet they would not be deterred by the fear of meeting their constituents, from making a just and liberal provision for the Crown. We know they would consider that the interests of the state were blended with the ease and splendour of the monarch, and they would find it a pleasure, as well as feel it a duty to the country, to make such a provision,—not regardless of economy—but ample, as would maintain the dignity of the Throne. It is not, therefore, from any distrust in the present parliament, that we do not now lay before it the arrangements of the civil list for the new reign, but solely upon the ground that there is not time enough for the adequate consideration of these matters, consistently with their importance, and the claims of other business. I have, Sir, already said that we have decided upon following the precedent of 1820, but there were many circumstances in that case which do not apply to the present. In 1820 his late Majesty ascended the Throne, after having been unrestricted regent for a number of years, and there was, therefore, no change in the person of the sovereign. In 1820 the parliament, which had been elected under the regency of the Prince, afterwards George IV., had already sat one year and six months, and the demise of the Crown took place the last day of January, at the very period when, under ordinary circumstances, we should be beginning the parliamentary session. But the demise of the Crown has now taken place under very different circumstances. The present parliament has sat, not a year and six months, but four years. There is also a complete change in the person of his Majesty, who was never till now called, like the late king, to exercise any of the prerogatives of the Crown. The demise of the Crown has not taken place at the commencement, but at the end, of the session, and after five months of, I won't say successful, but certainly unremitting and severe labours. It has occurred, too, at a period when some interval between the past and future labours is so desirable, not so much for the personal convenience of members as for the better despatch of public business. Keeping therefore the precedent of 1820 before us, we propose to imitate it, so far as the different circumstances of the two periods will allow; and it will be at once perceived that in the present case, there are more reasons for an immediate dissolution than in 1820. There can be no doubt but that it is competent to the House to sit and transact business, and, if there were any necessity for its continuing to sit, I am sure no feeling of personal inconvenience would induce us to rise, or to forego the consideration of the matters necessary to the public interests. Sir, I will not say, even for the purposes of debate, that this question is free from all difficulty, or that it is one to which we may at once come to a conclusion, without regarding any previous difficulties. The hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Mr. Brougham), and some other members, made some remarks upon omissions in the message from his Majesty. Sir, it would be affectation in me to pretend ignorance of the meaning of these remarks, or not to know that the omissions alluded to must refer to one of two things: first, either to the Civil List; or, secondly, to some arrangements for a Regency. Sir, this latter is a subject of great delicacy and importance; but still it is better to treat it with frankness, that we may, if possible, remove wrong impressions. I admit that it is a question quite open to consideration, and various opinions have been formed upon it; but I can say that, after the most serious consideration of the matter, and after weighing maturely the great importance of the subject, the ministers are of opinion that, upon the whole, we shall best consult the public interests by recommending a postponement of the consideration of that question for the present. We have, it is true, at this moment an heir-presumptive to the throne, who is an infant of tender years; and the question is, whether parliament will go on to provide for an event—possible, no doubt, but which God avert!—namely, the demise of the Crown—to provide for the administration of the Royal prerogative in the interval between such demise and the period when the next heir shall come of mature age, whoever that person may be? I cannot imagine any thing more deeply affecting the interests of this country, or which requires more mature and dispassionate consideration, than the provision for such a case. It is a case of the very last importance and consequence. There have been, indeed, in our history, instances of Regencies before; but, I apprehend, none exactly resembling this. In each of the years 1751 and 1765 there was an heir-apparent to the throne, of tender years, and parliament made provision for the possible demise of the Crown. But yet the subject was so far involved in difficulties, and the circumstances, however near to each other in point of time, were considered so dissimilar in character, that parliament thought it necessary to make a great difference in the arrangements. By the Act of 1751, parliament appointed the Princess Dowager of Wales guardian of the infant prince her son, and Regent of the kingdom, in the event of a demise of the Crown. In 1765 parliament empowered George III. to name the person who should be the guardian of his son, and Regent of the kingdom, restricting his choice to certain individuals. I only refer to these precedents, however, to show, not that they ought to be followed, but that, from the difficulties which presented themselves in the progress of them, they proved that the subject was deserving of the most serious consideration. It will be admitted at once, that to make a permanent provision now, in order to guard against all possible events, and against all contingencies which might happen to the heir-apparent, to make, I say, any permanent provision against a possible state of things, and which would accommodate itself to all possible circumstances, would require the most serious and grave consideration. But then I am asked, "Is there no risk in leaving the case wholly unprovided for till the next meeting of parliament?" To that I answer, that, at the early periods of our history, there are various instances of infant sovereigns coming to the throne of this kingdom, for whose protection no legislative measures had been previously taken. I could name Henry III., Richard II., and Henry VI.,—all of them infant sovereigns—none above eleven years of age—one not a year old; and yet parliament made no provision for a Regency, but, after the accession of the sovereign, appointed persons to govern the kingdom till the infant king had arrived at those years of maturity which the Act appointing the Regency had prescribed. Since the Revolution, in 1751 and 1765, different courses had been pursued; but in neither of these cases was there a provision immediately made for the event of a minority. In 1765 no steps were taken till three years after the birth of the heir-apparent. The late king was born in August, 1762, but it was not till 1765, three years afterwards, that the precaution of appointing a Regency, in the event of a demise of the Crown, was taken. I cannot find that George III. ever acted upon the powers contained in that Act. Sir, this is a delicate subject, but I hope I treat it with the delicacy which becomes us all, though we feel the necessity of doing our duty. But, let me fairly ask, where is the risk of postponing this measure to the next session? In the reign of George III., it was postponed for three years; and in the reign of George II. nearly ten weeks were suffered to elapse, after the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, before any Act was passed for the Regency; of course, under the sanction of that precedent, there can be no necessity for making any provision for a Regency in the interval between the end of the present session and the meeting of a new one. In case such an event should unfortunately happen, as the demise of the Crown, I apprehend that the infant queen would have full power to give her assent to any Act of parliament appointing a guardian for herself, and a Regent of the kingdom, and that in a manner as binding as if it were signed by a sovereign of full age. But, Sir, still it has been thought by those who admit the importance of giving full consideration to the permanent settlement of the Regency, that some temporary provision ought to be made, to give some one of mature age the power of consenting to an Act of parliament for appointing a guardian for an infant Sovereign and Regent of the kingdom. Upon that head too, Sir, all I shall say is, that, after having given to it the best consideration which was in my power, I would press upon the House the impolicy of discussing any such plan. I will not now detail the circumstances which influence my opinion; but it must occur to every one, that any temporary arrangements, which would have the effect of fettering the future and final decision of this question, must be very inconvenient; and the appointment of an individual with such authority, for ever so short a time, and, above all, if the event to be guarded against should occur, would very much impede and embarrass any future arrangements as to the settlement of the Regency question. It must be always the paramount interest of the country to have the matter permanently settled. And having now, Sir, treated of the various views in which this very delicate matter has presented itself to his Majesty's government, and having shown enough to explain the motives of that government why it disapproves of any temporary provision for a Regent being now made, and why it advises the postponement of a permanent provision till the subject can be better discussed and more looked into, I don't know that I can offer any other considerations to the House to induce it to agree in the terms of this part of the Address. I shall, therefore, proceed to state what is the course of public business which his Majesty's government propose to recommend, should the House of Commons agree to the Address which I shall have the honour to submit. That Address will of course assure his Majesty, that the House will, without delay, make temporary provision for the public service in the interval which must elapse between the dissolution of this parliament and the assembling of the next. Assuming those parts of it to be agreed to, then comes the question, what course is to be taken with respect to the public business? If it be determined that a dissolution is to take place, and the House is willing to perform its part as stated in the other branch of the Address, by making a temporary provision for the public service in the interval between the two parliaments;—both these points being conceded, I think the House will be unanimous in agreeing that the sooner we despatch the public business, consistently with the public interests, and with the several measures of great public importance which are now in progress before the House, the better. Under circumstances like these, it is hard to lay down any rule which can guide us in the course we ought to take. With so many measures, and so many of them of such great importance, as we now have unfinished before us, it is hard to expect the concurrence of all parties to any course ministers may suggest; but I do hope, that, under the peculiar situation of the government, occasioned by the demise of the late Crown, gentlemen will extend as much indulgence as they can, consistently with their public duty, to our proposals for the despatch of public business. One rule of our proceeding, in case we agree to go on, shall be to avoid every thing which is likely to provoke discussion, and to forego every measure which is likely to lead to much detailed illustration. After the expectations which were held out to the country by my right hon. friend at the beginning of the session, and more particularly to the lower classes, of relief by the remission of the beer duties, I think it will be the opinion of this House, and of all parties, that the measures which had for their object the carrying these views into effect, and the other measures connected with them, which have not been brought to a conclusion here, the public interests require that these should be passed immediately. Although the bill authorizing the sale of beer on the premises, and the other bill for remitting the duties upon beer, have not kept pace in this House, the one being at the second, and the other at the third reading, yet I think the House will concur with me in the attempt to pass these bills together. There is also another bill, which is not much known, and has not received much consideration in this House, though it is absolutely necessary, as a foundation for every sort of legal reform—I mean the bill for disposing of vested interests in patent offices in courts of justice, in themselves the greatest obstruction to legal reforms: this ought, I think, to be passed also. For, Sir, though we never venture upon any change in the constitution of the courts without taking into account the reasonable claims of persons entitled to compensation, yet these patent rights are great stumbling-blocks in the way of reform, and they must be removed before reform can be effected. I propose to take all these into the hands of the Crown, as a preparatory step to the equalization of the fees in the different courts; for, so long as the fees in the court of Exchequer are three times as much as in the King's Bench, one cannot wonder that the business flows unequally into the latter. The bill for abolishing these privileges stands for the third reading, and I propose that it be passed without delay. With respect to the spirit duties bill, which is before the House, the House will recollect that it was at an early stage of the session proposed by my right hon. friend, as an indemnification to the revenue for the losses which it would sustain by the remission of the leather and beer duties, to impose a duty of 6d. a gallon on British and Colonial spirits, and we think it our duty to press upon the House the propriety of carrying that plan into effect. But the passing of these measures will make it necessary to consider the condition of the whole of the West-India interest, to which we should wish to give all possible attention. [Some member suggested that this should be postponed till next session.] I wish Gentlemen to understand, that by the delay of four or five days we are already in a curious situation, and that no more time ought to be lost in settling the question, for the sugar-duties will expire on Monday next. I hope Parliament will not suffer them to expire before they have substituted some others in their room, for so large an amount of revenue cannot be given up; and, short as the interval is, I do hope that the House will concur with the government in re-enacting those duties before the period when, according to law, they would cease. This is not a time for going into detail on the subject; but as they will expire on Monday, and as the late scheme of the chancellor of the exchequer has been severely contested in the House, and passed by no very large majority, it is impossible that we could call upon Parliament, without great deliberation, to adopt that scheme of duties. It is therefore, to be abandoned [laughter]. Sir, if there be any ridicule attaching itself to those acts of our public duty, I undoubtedly am here to bear my share of it; we advised the measures from a sense of public duty, and from the same feeling we now withdraw them. We have tried to confer some benefit upon the West-India interest, which has not been very graciously received by it; and since, in retaining the additional duty upon rum, which is, after all, only equal to British spirits, we seem called upon to realize the benefit which was promised to that distressed interest, we propose some reduction of the duties upon sugar; and, because of the shortness of the time, it is proposed that the alterations be of the simplest kind. As the resolutions are not now before us, this is not the time to discuss them in detail; and I shall confine myself to stating, that it is the opinion of practical men that the schememight have been carried into effect. For my part I see none of the difficulties which some hon. members have been pleased to point out. However, in order to get over these difficulties, and give relief to the West India interest, we mean to make a reduction in the sugar duties, but that reduction shall be uniform and absolute. The reductions which we propose to make are a reduction of 3s. per cwt. upon West India sugars, and of 5s. per cwt. upon those of the East Indies. This is as great a boon as we can give to the West Indies. The loss to the revenue from these measures, supposing them to be passed into a law this session, will be explained in the statement which I am about to make, one side of which shows the amount contributed to the revenue by the additional duties, and the other the loss sustained by the remission of duties. The revenue then will suffer—

On account of the remission of the beer duties, a loss of.....	£3,000,000
The duties on leather	300,000
Remission of the sugar duties.....	450,000
Total loss.....	£3,750,000
By the additional duties on spirits, British and Colonial, it will gain.....	£600,000
Leaving a nett loss to the revenue of.....	£3,150,000

I have also to state, for the gratification of the hon. and learned member opposite (Mr. O'Connell), and other members for Ireland, that it is not our intention to proceed with the bill for the consolidation of stamp duties in Ireland. We are willing to give up every contested thing, and to sacrifice any principle which may be involved in order to avoid debate. There will remain then to be passed the Appropriation Bill for the votes of the present session. We propose that the House of Commons shall vote a sum on account of the estimates not passed; and under the head of the civil list we ask for some provision to meet the circumstances of the new reign, taking into account the expenses of a queen consort. But we ask nothing which may fetter any decision hereafter, and what we ask is only for the interval between the conclusion of the present session, and the beginning of the next session. What I propose is, a vote on account, not for a whole year, but for such a limited time as circumstances render necessary. I have thus, as briefly as possible, stated my views as to the course which it appears to me most expedient to adopt at the present juncture. I cannot, however, conclude without earnestly expressing a hope that the House will concur with me in the propriety of passing some few measures, in favour of which the House has already expressed its opinion. Among these is the bill with respect to the administration of justice. It will be recollected that the sense of the House having been taken upon the question of the Welsh judicature, an alteration of the existing system has been agreed to, after full and repeated discussions. As to the bill for appointing a new judge in the court of chancery, and the bill for regulating the offices of the master and registrar, his Majesty's ministers think that they should not duly consult the feelings of the House, if they pressed those measures during the present session of parliament, and they are, therefore, willing that further time should be allowed for taking them into consideration. These are the arrangements which ministers consider, upon the whole, most conducive to the general interests of the country. We have advised his Majesty to seek for a temporary provision for the public service during the interval between the conclusion of the present session, and the assembling of a new parliament. I have now plainly and concisely explained the course which the government proposes to pursue in case the House of Commons shall acquiesce in the address which I have now the honour to propose; I shall therefore move it, Sir, which is all that remains for me to perform; and which I hope will meet the approbation of the House.

The right hon. gentleman accordingly moved the following address, precisely similar to that which had been moved by the Duke of Wellington, in the House of Lords, on the preceding day:—

“That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to assure his Majesty that we fully participate in the severe affliction his Majesty is suffering, on account of the death of the late King, his Majesty’s brother, of blessed and glorious memory.

“That we shall ever remember with affectionate gratitude that our late Sovereign, under circumstances of unexampled difficulty, maintained the ancient glory of this country in the war; and during a period of long duration, secured to his people the inestimable blessings of internal concord and external peace.

“To offer his Majesty our humble and heartfelt congratulations on his Majesty’s happy accession to the Throne.

“To assure his Majesty of our loyal devotion to his Majesty’s sacred person, and to express an entire confidence, founded on our experience of his Majesty’s beneficent character, that his Majesty, animated by sincere love for the country which his Majesty has served from his earliest years, will, under the favour of Divine Providence, direct all his efforts to the maintenance of the reformed religion established by law, to the protection of the rights and liberties, and to the advancement of the happiness and prosperity, of all classes of his Majesty’s faithful people.”

Lord Althorp having offered some observations on the speech of the right hon. secretary, moved as an amendment, that the further discussion on the question be adjourned until to-morrow.

Mr. Brougham seconded the amendment.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply to Sir C. Wetherell, rose to deny, that he had offered any such compact to the House as the hon. and learned member for Plympton asserted. Nothing was farther from his wish than to have the statement which he had offered to the House considered as either a bargain or a compact. He had been requested to state what measures government intended to postpone, and what measures it still intended to prosecute this session. In compliance with that request, he had stated the business which ministers proposed to press to a conclusion this session, but he had not done so with any view of compromising the wishes or opinions of any member in that House.

After a protracted debate, involving an extensive variety of subjects,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL begged to recall the members to a consideration of the real question before them. The question was, whether they should reply to the message of his Majesty, declaring themselves ready to facilitate, as far as in their power lay, the despatch of the business of the session, according to the royal wish; or whether they should take twenty-four hours longer to deliberate on the course they might ultimately adopt. Now, he could not desire any better answer in support of the address, than that which was contained in the amendment of the noble lord. They had already had twenty-four hours to consider what they were to do, and the Amendment required twenty-four hours longer. That was the question. They required twenty-four hours longer, to consider that reply to his Majesty which every man knew was already determined on. Could any man doubt, at the time the message was brought down and read, that it was plain from its language the answer must correspond to its wish? Could any man doubt that it contained no allusion to a proposal for a Regency, and therefore that there was nothing of that kind on which it was necessary for members to make up their minds? But what said the learned member for Knaresborough (Mr. Brougham)? Why,—that the whole of the people of this country had for six weeks past been considering the question of a Regency. If that were the case, surely then the members of that House had made up their minds on the subject, and were competent to decide the question of a Regency or not a Regency, without requiring twenty-four hours' longer deliberation. The proposal on the subject of a provisional regency seemed to be abandoned by all parties. What, then, he asked, were they now called on to decide? Why, that they should, as quickly as possible, go over those votes which were necessary as a preparation for an immediate dissolution, and that they should inform his Majesty they were disposed to comply with his wishes in that respect. His right hon. friend the member for Montgomery (Mr. C. W. Wynn) had, however, called on the House to decide, not that point, but other questions, which for a thousand years had not been decided in this country. The right hon. gentleman called on them to decide the question of whether the heiress presumptive was to be queen at the time when the Queen Consort might probably have issue. A question which, although it might have frequently occurred, had yet remained, he repeated, undecided. This was the question, however, which the right hon. gentleman, the member for Montgomery, would allow the House a few days to determine. Here, however, he recollected another specimen of the objections to the address; it was the objection of the right hon. member for Liverpool, that the debate had been taken on a Wednesday. So, because the king died on a Saturday, and that circumstance prevented the communication from the throne being made before Tuesday, they were at this period of the session not to enter on the discussion of most important public business because it was fixed for Wednesday. He confessed it appeared to him that his right hon. friend had to-night as well as on many other occasions, forgotten he had once been in the service of the Crown. There was scarcely one occasion in the course of the present session, whether in describing the state of trade, the distresses of the people, or the consequences of a particular course of policy, that the right hon. gentleman did not cast into oblivion the fact that for more than twenty years no man had been more closely connected with the government, no man had exercised a greater influence over its decisions, than he. If his right hon. friend found such objections to the course now pursued, and condemned it so strongly, how came it that his right hon. friend had, in his capacity of Privy Councillor, given his consent to the very same course in the year 1820? What did the Crown require on the present occasion? A concurrence in its wishes with respect to the despatch of business, in order that it might exercise its undoubted prerogative. The Crown asked the House for no opinion on the course it proposed. Its power to make this use of its prerogative was undoubted; but the House might, nevertheless, as in the case of the continuance of the sugar duties, exercise its privileges to control the exercise of that prerogative. The question, as he said before, was not, therefore, whether they should wait twenty-four hours to deliberate on that question on which every man had already made up his mind; but whether they should adopt the views of the Crown, or refuse to allow the exercise of the royal prerogative until a Regency were appointed. He did not complain of those who had framed the amendment in its present shape. However opposed to the real common-sense question they had to determine, it was a perfectly legitimate method of opposing the proposition of the government. He begged those who contended for the immediate appointment of a Regency to recollect, however, that even supposing the Crown were to devolve on the Princess Victoria, the responsibility of his Majesty's Ministers, in the appointment of a regency, would remain the same, and no difficulty would occur in a case of that kind more than at present. He knew he might be told of the power of the Crown. There were cases certainly in which that power could be exercised to produce strife in the country; but every one knew that all real power was exercised under the responsibility of the ministers, and that the House of Commons, by the stoppage of the supplies, could always compel them to adopt that course which the necessities of the country demanded. He entreated the House, therefore, to go to the vote on the real merits of the question—on the propriety of complying with the wishes of the Crown, and reposing a just confidence in his Majesty's ministers; and not to be deluded by an amendment which professed to require twenty-four hours for the consideration of a question already fully determined on.

Mr. Huskisson was proceeding to deny that he had ever forgotten his duty as a Privy Councillor, when,—

Sir Robert Peel explained, that he had not said any thing of that kind. All he wished to express was, that his right hon. friend had frequently forgotten this session that he had ever been a minister of the Crown.

Mr. Huskisson said, he was unconscious of having acted with the forgetfulness imputed to him; but he bowed with great humility to all lessons received from his right hon. friend on the subject of inconsistency.

After some further discussion, the House divided: For the amendment 139; against it 185—majority 46.

On the question being put on the original address, Lord Althorp said, in his opinion the House had been called upon to decide this question without due notice; and the amendment which he had already moved had expressed his view on the subject. He should now move an amendment to the address itself, which he did to the following effect:—"That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to represent to his majesty that we acknowledge, with every sentiment of gratitude, the communication which his majesty has been pleased to make to his faithful Commons; that his faithful Commons acknowledge as a proof of his majesty's anxiety for the public welfare his majesty's gracious determination that, in consideration of the advanced period of the session, and the state of the public business, he feels unwilling to recommend the introduction of any new matter, which would admit of postponement without detriment to the public service; and his faithful Commons feel it to be their duty to state, that if his majesty, taking the present circumstances of the country into his consideration, should contemplate some provision for guarding against the danger to which the country might otherwise by possibility be exposed, his faithful Commons are ready to take into their consideration such measures as his majesty may be pleased to recommend for this purpose; that his majesty's faithful Commons are at all times ready to assist his majesty in the execution of all public services, and to facilitate the dissolution of parliament whenever it shall appear to his majesty to be requisite for the benefit of his people; and they trust that the furtherance of his majesty's wishes will be most effectually provided for, by diligently carrying through that portion of the ordinary business of the session which still remains incomplete."

Sir Robert Peel did not mean any disrespect to the noble lord; but as the debating this amendment would only be going over the same ground again, he should content himself with generally opposing it.

Mr. Brougham, in a speech of severe animadversion on the conduct of ministers, used nearly the following words:—"We can perceive, Sir, in this country as in that (France) that the day of force is over, and that the minister who hopes to rule by an appeal to royal favour or military power, may be overwhelmed, though I in nowise accuse him of such an attempt. Him I accuse not. It is you I accuse—his flatterers—his mean, fawning parasites."

Sir Robert Peel: I ask the hon. and learned gentleman, as I am one of those on this side of the House to which he is referring, whether he means to accuse me of such conduct? The hon. and learned gentleman addressed himself to this side of the House, when he said, "I mean to accuse you—his flatterers—his mean, fawning parasites." I am sitting on this side of the House; and, speaking in my own individual capacity, I ask him whether he presumes—whether he presumes to call me the mean and fawning parasite of any body?

Mr. Brougham rose amid some cries of "Chair, chair!" How it is possible, Sir, for you to answer the question that has been asked, I do not know. I am not aware how you, by any possibility, can answer a question that has been put to me; but I observe that it is reckoned much easier on that side of the House to have the question put, and then, by a cry of this sort prevent the answer being given. Now, Sir, I beg to answer the right hon. gentleman's question by a question of my own. I ask him whether, in the course of the last two or three sessions, I have ever treated him so disrespectfully as he, for the purpose of putting this question, chooses to consider the case? I ask him whether he has perceived in my conduct, in word or deed, during the last two or three sessions, the slightest tendency towards treating him with personal incivility or disrespect? Sir, I anticipate the right hon. gentleman's answer, and it is in reply to the question which he has demanded of me. Sir, it was impossible that I should allude to him, but what I did allude to was the votes passed, and the resolutions come to, and the cries uttered, all of which I have as much right to canvass as hon. members had to make them. An equal right, too, I claim to comment on the character and conduct—or at least, if not on the character, on the political and official conduct of any one of the ministers to whom the crown is pleased to give its confidence. This, Sir, is my undeniable right; and if, in the course of my comments, I am interrupted by cheers, the meaning of which is as much as to say that those comments are contemptible and unfounded, it is also my undeniable right to impute that interruption to what I please. Let me be understood; I do not ascribe motives, but I ascribe tendencies. It was tendencies that I ascribed. I am in the judgment of the House that I said it was the parasite—pessimum genus inimicorum—that did the mischief. I have a perfect right, Sir, to challenge the conduct of any minister that the crown may please to appoint; and if any minister be defended in an unconstitutional manner, it is my privilege, it is my right, nay more, it is my bounden duty, to attack and expose him, and that shall ever, while I have a seat in this House, be the course which I shall adopt. It is at the same time the course of conduct which it behoves this House to pursue; and I warn his majesty's ministers, that such a course will always be adopted, and that it will be their interest, and their best and safest policy to expect and lay their account to seeing it adopted.

Sir Robert Peel:—Sir, I have no right to speak at this moment; but I trust that the House will permit me to say a few words (I trust in perfect good temper) in allusion to that part of the hon. and learned member's speech in which he referred to my interruption of his observations. I do not suspect that he offered to myself these personal comments of an unjustifiable nature. I do not believe that it was his deliberate intention to offend any one by their use; but at the same time I must say, that it would have been better for him to have withdrawn the expression altogether, to have said that it was uttered in the warmth of debate, rather than to attempt, in this unsatisfactory manner, to justify it. No one has contested his perfect right to attack ministers for their public conduct; but he said, "if the Duke of Wellington should resort to intrigue or employ force," and at that word, Sir, a cheer was given, on which the hon. and learned member turned around and said, "Do I accuse him of this? No, Sir, no such thing—I accuse you, his fawning parasites"—and then there was a cheer of indignant remonstrance at an attack thus made, and then declared to be meant, not as against the minister, but against his fawning parasites. Now, giving the hon. and learned member every advantage of the right of free discussion, I must say that he has no right to accuse men as honest, independent, and upright as himself, of being parasites. Sir, it will be bad indeed if we are not able to conduct these debates, which naturally lead to sufficient asperity of expression and warmth of feeling, without these personal imputations. These words, Sir (for I will make the apology and retraction, for the hon. and learned gentleman) were not meant to apply to any one—they were not meant to apply to me; the hon. and learned member said so himself, and I am sure that his feeling of honour and candour will acquiesce in the statement I now make, that they were uttered in the warmth of debate, and without reference to any individual application.

Mr. Brougham:—I have no hesitation in saying, that the right hon. baronet is quite correct. I did not charge any member more than himself with being a parasite. I was myself offended that I was suspected of applying the words to him. They were not deliberately directed to any individual. All that I did was to state my feelings in language perhaps a little warmer than usual. I will only add, that what I said of parasites is in fact true; and that the worst sort of enemies a man can have are those who obsequiously call themselves his friends.

After some farther remarks by Mr. Dundas and Mr. Brougham, Mr. Huskisson suggested the propriety of allowing the further consideration of this question to be postponed for twenty-four hours.

Sir Robert Peel could not consent to that postponement.

The House divided: for the amendment 146—against it 193; majority against the amendment 47.

The original address was then put and carried.

LABOURERS' WAGES BILL.

JULY 1, 1830.

A debate arose on the order of the day having been moved for the resumption of the adjourned debate upon the amendment proposed to be made to the motion of the 23rd of June—"That this House do agree with the Committee in the first Amendment made by the Committee on the Bill;" which amendment was, to leave out from the word "that," to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "the Bill be re-committed" instead thereof.

Mr. Hume, Mr. Littleton, and Mr. Alexander Baring, having spoken,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that the hon. member for Aberdeen had asked him, why he did not include this among the bills to which he had on a former occasion referred? When he had spoken the other night, it was of the bills the government meant to carry forward; and it came to that resolution because, if those bills were not passed, it would leave the country in a worse state than before. The truck-system, as had been said by an honourable member opposite (Mr. Baring), had a tendency to debase the labourers, and was objectionable because they alone who adopted it were benefited by it; although they obtained that benefit by evading the operation of the law. He knew that the hon. member for Aberdeen was an able advocate for the poor man, but he could not go the whole length with him in his argument. The hon. member said, that every man was the best judge of what was for his own interest, but that maxim had been carried into execution in reference to the passengers who were allowed to go out to Canada; and the House must recollect the horrible scenes which ensued in 1828, and which compelled the House to limit the numbers, and to lay down rules to prevent a too great number of persons from following in this particular what they might consider their best interests. With regard to these poor workmen, it would be, he thought, better to take them under the protection of the legislature, and rescue them from their present state of degradation, than leave them to be the prey of the truck-master. He believed that it was wise to repeal the combination-laws; but when the hon. gentleman said that unmixed good had arisen from that step he went too far. In the manufacturing districts, committees were formed, and a system existed of preventing men from working except at a certain rate of wages. It was not, he admitted, against any provisions of the law that such committees were formed; but although they did not openly dictate the rate of wages, yet they had amongst them an understanding upon that subject, and persons were appointed as spies, to ascertain that no one worked for less wages than that which was agreed upon in the committee. By this means, although in an indirect manner, a system of intimidation was kept up; and an evil was created very difficult to guard against. The hon. gentleman said, that there had been no discussion upon this bill, and yet he had heard him deliver what he regarded as a very able speech, which lasted not less than three-quarters of an hour, in which he advanced many arguments against the principle of the bill. He could not understand why any hon. gentleman should not be able to compress all which it was necessary to say upon the principle of a bill of that kind, within a speech of three-quarters of an hour. Some of his hon. friends near him said, that the hon. member's speech occupied an hour and a half. At all events, whether the hon. member spoke an hour and a half, or only three-quarters of an hour, he had occupied time enough to say all that was necessary upon a bill of this kind. [Mr. Hume admitted that he said all that he wished.] Then why require a postponement? Surely there could be no use in travelling the same ground over and over again, when all argument was exhausted. When the House came to a decision on the principle of this bill, there were forty members on one side, and only four on the other—a sufficient indication of the feeling of the House upon the subject; and, as it was highly desirable that the measure should be carried through before the close of the present session, he hoped it would be allowed to go through that stage to night.

Colonel Davies did not mean to occupy the House for an hour, or for three quarters of an hour, as all he wished to say was, that he regarded this bill as erroneous in principle. The hon. member for Stafford admitted that there would be no objection to a workman purchasing goods at his master's shop, provided he were first paid in money. If that were to be allowed, what good could possibly arise from the man's having been paid in money? He would still have goods of an inferior quality palmed upon him at a high price, and consequently no advantage could possibly result to him. But, not to occupy the time of the House at that late hour, he would only say that the whole question appeared to him to be of such serious importance, that it required some further consideration; and he agreed with the hon. member behind him, that it should be allowed to stand over until the next session. In his opinion, also, a committee should be appointed to enquire into the whole subject.

After some farther discussion the amendment was withdrawn, and the House went into a committee on the bill. On a division in the committee, however, there were found to be only thirty-five members present, and the House was in consequence counted out.

REPORTS OF PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

JULY 2, 1830.

In a debate which arose on the presentation of a petition, by Lord Morpeth, from the letter-press printers of London, praying for a reduction of the duties on newspaper stamps and advertisements,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. E. Davenport, assured that hon. member that he had no power to direct that the speeches of ministers should be reported, and that the speeches of persons opposed to them should be suppressed. He must say that the reports of the proceedings of that House were given with singular correctness upon the whole, and, what was still higher praise, with great impartiality. He very much doubted the policy of that arrangement which the hon. gentleman had suggested, that every word uttered in that House, and the exact terms of every sentence, should be faithfully and accurately reported. On the whole, he did not think there was any reason to complain of the manner in which the speeches in that House were reported. Indeed, he considered that a very wise and useful discretion was employed in lopping off some of the superfluities which were uttered. Besides, the arrangements suggested by the hon. gentleman would lead to reporters being paid at the public expense. He was of opinion that hon. members—and he included himself in the remark—would gain nothing by having every word spoken in the House reported. That would neither be advantageous to the public, nor very creditable to themselves.

Towards the close of the discussion,—Sir Robert Peel begged to state, in reply to the hon. member (Mr. Davenport), who seemed to think that he was pleased at having his speeches fully reported, that he was very glad that his speeches were not always reported verbatim.

SUPPLY—FOUR AND A HALF PER CENT. DUTIES.

JULY 2, 1830.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, Sir James Graham rose to submit a motion to the House relative to the four and a half per cents. At the close of a speech of considerable length, the hon. member moved the following Resolution, as an amendment on the original motion;—"That the Sugars, the produce of the Four and a half per cent Duty, levied in the Islands of Barbados, Antigua, Montserrat, Nevis, Tortola, and St. Christopher, have for a great number of years been sold in the like manner as all duty-paying sugars from the British plantations are usually sold in this country, namely, at the long price, in which is included the duty of Customs payable on sugar; and that there has been no difference in this mode of sale since the date of the Treasury minute of the 15th of April, 1828. That the said sugars have been uniformly entitled to the drawback or bounty payable by law on duty-paid sugars, and that there has been no difference in this respect since the date aforesaid. That the drawback or bounty on any such sugars exported since the date aforesaid, has been paid out of the revenue of the customs, into which no duty has been paid on account of such sugars. That the nett proceeds of all moneys received on account of his Majesty's revenue of customs ought by law to be paid into his Majesty's Exchequer, to the account of the Consolidated Fund. That these duties virtually levied on the purchasers of the said sugars since the 25th of March, 1828, have not been paid into his Majesty's revenue of Customs, and have been appropriated without the cognizance or consent of Parliament. That this House, having called for an account of the appropriation of the nett proceeds of the four and a half per cent duty, for the year ending 5th of January, 1830, an account was furnished, by which it appears that the pensions paid by the husband in that year amounted to £20,890 : 1 : 4 ; that the salaries and other charges amounted to £1,502 : 5 : 11 ; that the salaries and pensions paid at the Exchequer amounted to £20,412 : 16 : 1, making a total of £42,805 : 3 : 4 ; and it further appears, that the nett proceeds of the said duties for the same year were £61,059 : 16 : 2, leaving a balance of £18,254 : 12 : 10 not accounted for by the said return. That the nett proceeds of the said duties for the year ending 5th January, 1829, were £66,992 : 15 : 1. That no part of the surplus arising from the nett proceeds of the said duties for the years ending 5th January, 1829 and 1830, after paying the pensions, salaries, and charges thereupon for the said years respectively, has been appropriated to the payment of the Ecclesiastical Establishments in the West Indies; and that no account has been rendered to Parliament of the manner in which such surplus has been applied. That to exempt from duty any article of merchandise imported for the Crown, but not intended for the use of the Sovereign, is an extension of the King's prerogative of dangerous example, and that to levy the parliamentary duties payable upon such article when sold for home consumption, and to appropriate the amount thereof without the knowledge and consent of Parliament, is an unconstitutional violation of the undoubted privileges of this House."

After a reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and some remarks from Mr. Hume and Mr. Huskisson,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose. The question, said he, which is now under the consideration of the House lies within a very narrow compass. If there be any doubt as to the appropriation of these funds, let any individual move for any returns, I care not of what nature, which he conceives likely to throw light upon it, and I will gladly second his motion for their production. I say that there has been no misappropriation of them. But at the same time I admit that it is only right that parliament should be put into possession of every official guarantee that there has been no misappropriation. My right hon. friend, the member for Liverpool, says, that the proceeds of these duties for two years have been £128,000. My right hon. friend is wrong: they will amount to that sum. but the sugars are sold, as he well knows, at a long credit, and as yet no part of the purchase money for those sold this year has been received; so that, from my right hon. friend's £128,000, £61,000 must for the present be deducted. If there be any doubt upon that point, let any man, I repeat, call for the official guarantees which will remove it, and I will immediately grant them, if it be in my power. There is no ground for the censure which the hon. baronet's resolutions cast upon ministers; for, in point of fact, no new charge had been fixed upon these funds. They are already regulated by law, and the proceeds of these sugars, with the remission of duty, will, pro tanto, go to the Consolidated Fund in case of a surplus.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in consequence of an observation of Mr. Huskisson's, the purport of which was not understood, interposed to explain. The Act of parliament stated that the surplus of these funds should go to defray the expense of the Ecclesiastical Establishments, which was before defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund. The Treasury minute authorized the payment of that expense from the Consolidated Fund, directing the proceeds of the four and a half per cents. to be paid to that fund: so that, in point of fact, the Ecclesiastical Establishments are ultimately paid out of the proceeds of the four and a half per cents.

Sir Robert Peel, in continuation, said, that such was his understanding, and such, he believed, was the understanding of the House. With regard to the other part of the question which the hon. baronet had raised that evening, he thought that he (Sir R. Peel) had a right to complain. It was now a fortnight since his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had prepared a bill in consequence of the pledge which he (Sir R. Peel) had given publicly to the House, that a legal enactment should be introduced, restoring the former practice with respect to these sugars. That bill would be submitted to their consideration in the course of the present evening. He thought that the circumstances which had occurred in the interval since his right hon. friend had first mentioned this bill to him, would account for the delay which had taken place with regard to its introduction. When he read to the House, on a former evening, a list of the measures which he thought it necessary to abandon for the present session, and also a list of those which he thought it advisable to carry through the House, the reason why he did not include that bill in the latter list was, that he had drawn up both lists from the Orders, and that that bill had not then been inserted in them. He would remind the hon. member for Cumberland of the private communication which took place between them on the 4th of June last, when he told the hon. member that it was the intention of ministers to bring in a bill to restore the former practice, and levy the usual duties on all goods imported for the Crown. After such a communication, he did not expect to find the conduct of ministers made the subject of a hostile motion by the hon. baronet, who ought to have previously ascertained, by a private communication with him, whether ministers were inclined to redeem the pledge which they had given, or not. He should most willingly have given the hon. baronet an answer in the affirmative if he had condescended to ask for it. It was placing ministers in a very unfavourable situation, if, after they had, in private communications, afforded hon. gentlemen every information in their power, they were still to be made the objects of hostile motions. It would be better for them not to hold private communication, than to be liable, after they had granted all the information in their power, to the attacks of hon. members, who persevered in complaints after the groundwork of them was removed. It appeared to him that the hon. baronet had in this instance departed from that courtesy which he usually displayed. He trusted, however, that after the explanation which had been given by his right hon. friend near him, no hon. member would join the hon. baronet, should the hon. baronet persevere, which he hoped he would not, in doing an act of injustice for the mere purpose of inflicting a personal censure on the members of government.

After some explanations on the part of Sir James Graham, Sir Robert Peel, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and others, Sir James Graham consented to withdraw his motion.

SUPPLY—IRISH ESTIMATES, &c.

JULY 2, 1830.

In a Committee of Supply, a debate arose on the resolution for granting to his Majesty the sum of £1,126,554, for defraying the charges of Miscellaneous Services in Ireland, the Army Extraordinaries, the Commissariat, the Civil Contingencies, and the Repairs and Improvements of Windsor Castle for nine months of 1830.

Mr. Spring Rice, Lord F. L. Gower, Mr. Brougham, and Mr. Maberley, having respectively addressed the chair,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply to Mr. Brougham, said, that in considering the argument of the hon. and learned gentleman opposite, he should treat of the two objections which he had made to this estimate, but did not mean to treat of them in the order in which they had been suggested. His second objection, that it would prevent them from entering into the Regency Question, deserved a primary consideration, as it was by far the more important. The other related merely to the form of the vote. He held in his hand the second communication that had been sent by that House since the late accession to the throne, in reply to a most gracious message from his Majesty [the right hon. baronet here read the address], which promised, in compliance with the royal message, to make temporary provision for the public service, and meet the immediate exigencies of the State without delay. Owing to the arrangement made on the occasion, an answer to such address had not yet reached that House, but the purport of their resolution was of course immediately made known to his Majesty. How then, he asked, could they now think of doing what the hon. and learned gentleman proposed? How could they retract on Friday that to which they had assented on Wednesday? With what grace could they say that they had already changed their minds, and immediately press the Crown to recommend a Regency, by exercising the compulsory power which was given them by their control over the finances of the country? Would such a course, he put it to the candour of the House, be respectful to the Crown, or satisfactory to the people? Consistency required that they should refuse to adopt it, the whole House having been pledged by the act of the majority. At the same time it was competent for the hon. and learned gentleman to give a notice of motion on the subject if he thought proper. He doubted, nevertheless, whether any member of the late minority would now recommend such a proceeding. As to the form of the vote, he thought that all those with whom the argument already mentioned had no weight must approve of it, as thus taking a general vote for a limited time was a sufficient guarantee that Parliament would be assembled early, and the objection against voting on account was obviated by the clause in the Appropriation Act, which required that each item of the Estimates should be distributed according to what was due to it, instead of allowing the surplus from one to make good the deficiencies of another. On the whole, therefore, he submitted it would appear that government had resorted to the expedient best calculated to satisfy the scruples of the House, and least liable to objection.

Sir Robert Peel said, he should be very glad if there were any authority belonging to the ministers to procure a refractory House of Commons to side with them. But it was not possible for ministers to tell members that they should not bring forward motions, and give notices of motions; the members would do as they pleased, and he was afraid that he should not again see a tractable House of Commons. When his right hon. friend complained of the delay of business, he might, perhaps, recollect that he was in the ministry when the army estimates were debated for sixteen nights.

In reply to Sir Richard Vyvyan, who had spoken at considerable length,—

Sir Robert Peel said, the hon. baronet had requested that he would repeat the statement which he had made in an early part of the session, that the English government were in no way connected with the appointment of the Prince de Polignac as the head of the ministry in France. It really seemed scarcely necessary to repeat the denial of an assertion so absurd as that the government of this country would attempt to force a minister upon such a country as France; but as it might prevent the continuance of any delusion on the subject, he had no hesitation in doing so.

The resolution was agreed to.

JULY 5, 1830.

In a debate on the Order of the House for going into a Committee on this Bill, Mr. Hume was interrupted in a certain part of his speech, by the exclamation of "Question!" from Sir Robert Peel. At the close of Mr. Hume's speech,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE arose and said, he was sorry that, by any impatience on his part, he had been betrayed into such a want of courtesy as to call "Question;" but he could assure the hon. gentleman, that it was only meant as an appeal to him to consider whether he had not nearly exhausted his argument, and whether he would not, in the state of the session and of the House, attempt to compress what he had to say within as narrow limits as possible: by not doing that, a great deal of time was wasted. What did the argument of the hon. gentleman consist in? He said, "I am not unwilling that you should enforce contracts, and I think it an advantage that one man should undersell another." Enforce contracts! yes, but a contract by which a man was paid in truck could not be enforced, for it was to be decided by one party, and suffered by another, just as the interest and inclination of the first might dictate. If a man contracted to pay another 1s. for his labour, he could tell whether he got a bad shilling, or whether he were paid 11*d.* or 12*d.*; but if the contract were for provisions, by what regulations could the legislature ensure the workman good articles? what rule would it abide by?

Mr. Hume said, across the table, "the market price."

Sir Robert Peel: the hon. member then admitted the justice of the rule, and said, take the market price if you please. But the market price of what?—if a man had cheese or bread of inferior quality, the market price would be inferior. The truck contract was manifestly to the advantage of one party, for that one fulfilled it as he thought proper. Persons engaged in the manufacture of cotton were not the best judges of the qualities of provisions; but having bought a stock, although they deteriorated, they still paid them away to their workmen, who, having entered into a contract to receive provisions, had no tribunal to which to apply for relief. This was a radical, a fatal objection to the system; and when the hon. gentleman said, that it was against all principle to interfere in this manner, would he say why we had any regulations with respect to weights and measures, when, according to his doctrine, every one ought to be left to weigh and measure as he pleased? Again, with respect to the medical profession, why did the legislature throw difficulties in the way of incompetent persons acting as surgeons? why should it not allow any man who might wish to set up for a doctor so to do? for its not doing so, according to the hon. gentleman, must be against all principle. The general rule certainly was, to leave each person free to transact his own concerns in his own manner, and there ought to be special reasons to induce the House to interfere with them. Here the special reasons existed, and the question was, whether the advantages to be gained by special interference outweighed the advantages of abiding by the general rule. In his opinion, the truck system had a direct tendency to undermine the independence of the workmen. The doctrine of the hon. gentleman was, that to undersell at any rate, and by any measure, was an advantage to the community. That he denied, and he affirmed, that when one man was able to undersell another upon profits derived from extorting the comforts of the workmen, he accomplished it by a positive disadvantage. The great evil of the present day was a tendency to diminish the enjoyments of the poorer classes—to lower them in the scale of society—and widen their separation from the upper classes; and he could conceive nothing more likely to reduce them to a state of servitude than that their master, who might be getting £8,000 or £10,000 a year by his manufactory, should take from them £2,000 or £3,000 more, by dealing in bacon and cheese. He hoped that if this bill were lost by the means which the hon. member possessed, and might use, to defeat it, that the working classes would understand that it was he who was responsible for the consequences.

The House went into a committee, discussed several clauses of the bill, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.—THE REGENCY QUESTION.

JULY 6, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL laid upon the Table the Answer of his Majesty to the Address of the House of June 30th. It was to the following effect:—

"I feel grateful to you for this loyal and dutiful Address, and I thank you for the assurance that you will apply yourselves without delay to the making such provision as may be required for the public service, during the interval that may elapse between the termination of the present and the calling of a new Parliament."

Mr. Robert Grant then, pursuant to notice, moved, at the close of a speech of considerable length, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, assuring his Majesty that, deeply affected by the gracious declaration made by his Majesty on his accession to the Throne, of his Majesty's attachment to the Constitution of these realms, we, his Majesty's faithful Commons, should not be doing our humble duty to his Majesty, if, amidst our general feelings of gratitude, mingled with our ardent prayers for the prolonged duration of a reign so auspiciously commenced, we omitted to make known to his Majesty the anxiety felt by his Majesty's loyal subjects at the possibility of a misfortune which might deprive them of the blessings of his Majesty's paternal reign, and in its consequences endanger the best interests of the empire, that we are induced to lay the expression of this anxiety at the foot of the Throne, from the deep attachment which we feel to his Majesty, and his Majesty's august family, and from the conviction which we entertain that the safety of the state, and the stability of our institutions, essentially depend on the unimpaired exercise of the powers vested in the Crown as the first of the three Estates composing the Constitution of this limited monarchy. That under the impression of these sentiments we approach his Majesty with the dutiful assurance of our readiness to take into immediate consideration any measure which, in his Majesty's royal solicitude for the happiness of his people, his Majesty might be graciously pleased to recommend, in order to guard against the possible hazard of those evils which cannot but be apprehended from the demise of the Crown under the present circumstances of the succession."

In the course of the debate which followed, Sir Robert Peel said he could not help thinking, that the apathy which had appeared during this debate was an evidence that this was not a desirable period to enter on such a protracted discussion as must necessarily ensue, should the Regency Question be brought forward. If it were now commenced, it would probably be so far advanced at the end of August, that the bill might be got to the second reading, when neither the attention of the House, nor the number of members in attendance, would be such as the importance of the subject required. He could enter into the feelings of those who were in the minority the other night, who felt themselves included by the vote of the House, thanking his Majesty for being unwilling to recommend to them, at this advanced period of the session, and the state of public business, any new matter, and assuring his Majesty that the House would apply, without delay, to make temporary provision for the conduct of the public service during the interval between the close of the present session and the meeting of a new parliament. He could enter, he said, into their feelings, but that ought not to induce the House of Commons to contradict its own resolution. To the Address which the House had formerly agreed to, the Crown had that night returned an answer, and his Majesty thanked the House of Commons for its dutiful Address. If the motion were carried, they must go up to the Crown with a very different Address, which would require another answer. The Address moved by the hon. and learned gentleman could not, however, have the approbation of the House of Commons. It was hardly respectful to the Crown, after the king had communicated to the House of Commons that he had no intention to recommend to it the consideration of a Regency, or any other matter which would have the effect of delaying the proceedings of parliament, to vote an Address to compel the Crown to deliver a message which it declared it had no intention to deliver. It would be not a very auspicious commencement of a new reign for the House to oblige the king to do what he had declared he had no intention of doing. The proposal of his Majesty's government, to permit a sufficient time to elapse for maturely considering the proposal of the Crown, was reasonable and proper. He could conceive nothing more difficult than to determine what were the contingencies likely to happen on the demise of the Crown, so that they might be properly provided for beforehand. There were very many contingencies which might occur, and which it might be extremely difficult to provide for; and after exerting the utmost ingenuity in devising remedies, they might produce ten thousand times more danger than if the contingencies took place without the remedies. Some specific calamities, to which the Crown was subject, as well as private individuals, had been adverted to; and his hon. friend had instanced the calamity which had befallen Lord Liverpool, who was in the full possession of his health and strength, and in one short week was struck to the ground, and deprived of his mental faculties. But was it proposed to make provision for every possible contingency by which the exercise of the regal functions might be suspended? If not, what had the case of Lord Liverpool to do with the question? The House would recollect what had passed in the reign of George III. In 1788, when a calamity had visited the sovereign, proceedings were taken to provide a Regency. But did parliament think it desirable to provide against the recurrence of such an event? No; for in 1810 it did recur, and did not parliament find itself without any provision for that contingency? It did; and why, after having obtained the knowledge that the royal faculties might decay, did it refuse to provide for such a future contingency? Because it would rather permit its recurrence than be guilty of the indecency and indelicacy of presuming upon the possible future derangement of the king. The hon. mover had stated eight or ten suppositions, and these only by way of sample. If the contingencies were so numerous, and the difficulty so great, was it decent, before the funeral of one king, to force his successor to deliver a message, requiring the House to consider all the contingencies? If the question were so complicated, let it be left to the Crown and its advisers to devote a sufficient time for its consideration. There were two contingencies which had been mainly dwelt on. The first was not a question immediately connected with that of a Regency, because it might occur when the heir-presumptive was not a minor; namely, when on the demise of the Crown there was an heir-presumptive, and also a Queen Consort who might be pregnant. The question in this case was, whether it were desirable to make any provision; and, if so, what provision? When he referred to this case on a former night, he had mentioned its having already occurred, and the possibility of its recurrence, and he then stated that the absence of a remedy was a strong proof of the conviction of the legislature of the difficulty of providing a satisfactory remedy, and of the necessity of mature consideration before any remedy was suggested. The hon. member for Montgomery (Mr. C. W. Wynn) had said that in this case, that of the existence of an heir-presumptive contemporary with a Queen Consort pregnant, was most important, and required to be provided for. His answer was, that that was a case of which there had been examples in our history, and that they had not been provided for; and therefore, before the subject were submitted to parliament, the Crown should have at least six weeks for considering it. He would content himself with taking all the illustrations he should have occasion for, from recent times; and taking the reigns of our monarchs from James I., reign by reign, the result was, that in almost every case, similar circumstances existed as at present. In the reign of James I. the case was similar, at least it was equally necessary for parliament to provide a similar remedy. There was a king in possession of the Crown, an heir-apparent who was a minor, and no provision was made for a Regency. In the reign of Charles I., at least for some period of his reign, the parliament might have felt a deep interest in regulating the succession to the Throne, nor were the contests between that prince and his parliament a reason why they should not feel such an interest. In the reign of Charles II. the king was married, but had no legitimate issue. There was an heir-presumptive (James II.) and a Queen Consort. Charles II. died, and the Queen Consort might have been pregnant. The heir-presumptive was of full age, and he begged to say, that the danger of a struggle was far greater when the heir, as in that case, had been accustomed to military service. In the reign of James II. this was the state of things. James, by his first wife, had two daughters, who were the heirs-presumptive. Thus, in every reign hitherto, a case might be found parallel to the present. In the reign of Anne there was something, if not parallel, at least analogous. During the lifetime of George, Prince of Denmark, Parliament made a provision as to the successor to the throne, who then resided abroad,—the Princess Sophia or George I.; but it made no provision for the possible case of the pregnancy of the reigning queen. Then came the case of George III., in which, for three years, the contingency might have occurred, and yet no provision was made: so that he did not despair of Parliament finding a remedy, if the contingency should occur; nor was Parliament so dependent on mere forms that it could not make a precedent. In the case of the abdication of James II., Parliament had found a remedy, as well as on the occasion of the mental indisposition of George III. God forbid that he should exclude all consideration of provisions against possible dangers; but they should be adopted after due consideration, and he could not admit, that at present the risk was so great as in former instances. In all instances prior to the Reformation, no regent was ever appointed till after the demise of the Crown. His hon. friend observed, that it was not wise to refer to such precedents. Perhaps so; but he would remark, that Lord Coke, in writing of the office of Regent, said, that it was unknown to the common law. He had referred to the regency appointed by Henry VIII., and said, that it was for the king to appoint a guardian or regent, with the advice of the great council of the kingdom. If precedents upon this subject were always clear, then nothing could be more easy than the adjustment of this question; but it was singular that there was no one precedent which had ever been followed in the appointment of a regency. There had been no fewer than five cases in modern times, and every one of them had been different. This fact showed the immense importance of the question, and how each case was accommodated to the circumstances of the times, so that one was in opposition to the succeeding case. In the reign of Henry VIII. an Act of Parliament was passed, authorizing the king to nominate the regent, and a more complicated regulation could not well be conceived than that contained in the Act of Henry VIII. The regency in the reign of Anne was a commission composed of seven great officers of the Crown. In the reign of George II., one regent was appointed, who was the Princess Augusta, Dowager of Wales. In the reign of George III. there was a totally different precedent. Parliament did not nominate the regency, but left the nomination to the king, limiting his choice to a certain number of persons named in the Act. All the instances, therefore, varied according to the circumstances of the case and of the times. There being, then, two difficulties to provide for,—one the minority of the heir-presumptive to the crown, the other the possible pregnancy of the Queen Consort,—and no case being in existence which would serve as a precedent, it was too much to force the Crown to devise a remedy before his Majesty's ministers could apply their consideration to so grave a question. It was but decent to give the Crown an opportunity of maturely deliberating upon the subject. As five different cases had occurred, in each of which the provision had varied, that very fact was a proof that this was a question environed with difficulties, and requiring mature deliberation before a decision could be formed. It was a question on which it was dangerous to pronounce hasty opinions,—præpropera concilia, as Lord Coke called them. The Crown should have ample time and opportunity for consideration. There was not such great risk of evil occurring to render it necessary to make hasty provisions; at the same time it was unwise to presume that no contingency would occur. But if it did, that was no reason to apprehend the calamities which had been referred to. The good sense and the reason of the country would, he was convinced, support the decision of the House of Commons. It had been asked, to whom the House of Commons should swear the oath of allegiance in that event? He would ask, where was the Act of Parliament which required the oath to be taken at the meeting of that assembly? It had been said by one hon. member, that Parliament could not take the oaths until after the proclamation of the new king. That was, however, a mistake. It certainly was the practice of the House of Commons to take the oaths subsequent to the proclamation; but suppose that the Privy Council proclaimed a sovereign who ought not to be proclaimed, it would then become the duty of the House to abstain from taking the oath of allegiance to the person so proclaimed. The House of Lords, he believed, proceeded to take the oath of allegiance to the Crown previously to the proclamation of the king by the Privy Council; and the Earl of Eldon, a high authority in such a case, was the first to do so on the late occasion. Therefore, the difficulty could not occur which had been stated, of the necessity of taking the oath of allegiance to some person, it being uncertain who that person might be. On the demise of King William and the accession of Queen Anne, Parliament, for some reason, proceeded to act without taking the oaths at all. Some of the inconsistencies which had been pointed out would not arise, and many of the difficulties which had been started would not occur. At the same time he was not contending against Parliament, at a proper season and after due deliberation, providing for a regency; yet he would not attempt, considering the variation of human affairs, to foresee every contingency, or to devise too much beforehand for what must necessarily occur at a distant period. If immediate dangers pressed, he would advise the House to provide a remedy; but he believed that more danger would arise from an inconsiderate provision for a regency, and he would therefore rather incur the risk of delay. On these grounds he should vote in opposition to the proposal of the hon. and learned member. He did hope that the House, before coming to a division for the purpose of finally disposing of this question, would well consider whether, after the course which the House had already taken,—after an address had been presented to the Crown, if not by a preponderating, at least by a considerable majority,—after the amendments on that address, which were precisely in conformity with the address of to-night, had been negatived,—after the House had led the Crown to believe that it was prepared to act in conformity with his Majesty's recommendations,—after having received that very day the grateful acknowledgment of the Crown for the assurances given,—he hoped the House would well consider, he repeated, whether, after taking that course, it would be compatible with its own dignity, and whether, in the words of the address, it would “tend to make the commencement of his Majesty's reign auspicious,” if the House were now to approach the Crown, informing the Crown that it had repented of its determinations, and that, scared by the approach of its own dissolution, it begged for a more distant day, in order to consider the question of the regency.

On a division, the numbers were : for the motion, 93 ; against it, 247 ; majority, 154.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION.

JULY 7, 1830.

In a committee on the Consolidated Fund Bill, Mr. Hume availed himself of the opportunity, as it was the last time he should have an opportunity of speaking during that session, on the subject of the supplies, to enter at considerable length into the present state of parliamentary representation.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply, said he had listened with the utmost attention to the recipe given by the hon. member for securing those large and overwhelming majorities by which he seemed to think the government ought to be supported. The hon. member had truly stated, that the government often laboured under difficulties in bringing forward many of those measures by which the public interest was to be promoted. There were individual interests which were often opposed, and but too powerfully, to such measures. Notwithstanding the exhortations of the hon. gentleman, he believed it would be found, that constituents were always ready to assert their particular interests, and that as they looked to that interest their representatives consulted their own by obeying the wishes of those that sent them there. The government had often, during the present session, proposed measures, the adoption of which they supposed would promote the public interest—the sale of beer bill was one of the instances he might select. Conceiving it desirable to destroy a monopoly in a necessary article of life, the government had brought forward that measure; but it did happen that there were hon. gentlemen who, though they declared that they agreed with the principle of the bill, yet met the bill itself with a most decided opposition. Such hon. gentlemen laid it down as a general principle, that individual interest ought always to be sacrificed to the public welfare; but when the principle was to be applied to themselves, they manifested a strange dislike to its operation. They declared at one time that they would give their unhesitating support to any measure for the public benefit; but then they felt some nicely scrupulous doubts as to what measures were likely to be for the public benefit. This was a practical instance of the difficulty of disregarding those vested rights which in argument were passed over, but which in practice it was often necessary to attend to, as the observance of them would conciliate a powerful body; hon. gentlemen, with respect to such rights, looked to the poll, and giving their support to vested interests, thus maintained monopolies. The hon. member, however, forgetting all these things, had taken the opportunity, on the eve of a general election, of issuing his exhortations to the constituency. He seemed to be relieved from all anxiety as to his own return, and manifested more interest than an individual generally showed at such a period for the event of the general election. He had no doubt that the hon. member was actuated by a sincere desire to promote what, in his opinion, was the cause of public interest; and he hoped to see the hon. member in the next parliament swelling that large majority by which, in his opinion, the government ought to be supported.

LIBEL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

JULY 9, 1830.

The Bill having been read a third time, the Attorney-general proposed an Amendment to increase the amount of recognizances. In the debate which ensued,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he was sorry that the early part of this discussion had been mixed up with reflections of a personal nature on his hon. and learned friend, the Attorney-general, for he was certain that this measure was one which in the opinion of the well-meaning part of the community would reflect credit upon his hon. and learned friend. Yes, he repeated the expression, it would reflect credit on his hon. and learned friend. Those gentlemen who supposed that his hon. and learned friend was courting the favour of either the press or the public in bringing this bill forward, might think that his hon. and learned friend would fail in securing it. But that was not the object of his hon. and learned friend. His hon. and learned friend wanted to do what was just and right, being indifferent, in the first instance, to popular applause, and being fully satisfied that the time would at last come when his motives would be properly appreciated. He had always understood, that the complaints against the law affecting the press of this country were in their nature twofold. The first complaint he understood to be this,—that the punishment of banishment for the second conviction for libel was grievous and too severe; that its continuance on the statute-book was a reflection upon the law itself; and that, in spite of its severity, it was not valid to restrain from offence, as nobody ever thought of enforcing it, seeing that if ever it were enforced, it would be so much superior to the offence committed as to constitute a positive act of injustice to the individual on whom it might be inflicted. His hon. and learned friend had endeavoured to meet that complaint by repealing the punishment of banishment altogether, for offences of the press. The next complaint was directed against the difficulty which there was, under the existing law, of restraining the licentiousness of the press, and punishing its calumnies upon private individuals. Now, however anxious gentlemen on the other side might be to defend the liberty of the press, could any one of them deny, that of late the press had evinced a prurient desire to examine into the conduct and character of private individuals, and particularly of females, who never ought to be needlessly dragged from retirement into public? Ought not the law to provide a remedy for such a mischief? Fictitious characters had their names entered at the Stamp-office, and thus females were left without the protection to which they were entitled, and could gain no redress from the parties who had endeavoured to inflict the severest injuries on their characters and feelings. But, said the hon. member for Westminster,—“The Times” newspaper will not care for this additional security.” “The Times” newspaper, and journals of the same high character, had no occasion to mind it, for papers of such distinguished character never indulged in calumnious attacks on private individuals. The high character which papers like “The Times,” had to support, was a security far stronger than any pecuniary security which the legislature could devise, that they would not disgrace their columns by the insertion of such slanders on individuals as every member that heard him must have seen elsewhere, and as every gentleman amongst them on seeing must have reprobated. Though individuals moving in the same rank with those whom he then had the honour of addressing might despise such slanders, and think them too contemptible for notice, there were others who, from their situations in life, could not bring themselves to the same state of feeling, and who might receive deep and lasting injury, if they permitted them to pass unproved. Admitting it to be true that the papers conducted by proprietors whose means were small, and capital limited, were the papers which his hon. and learned friend’s bill would most affect, was it not, he would ask, from journals of that description that these malicious and injurious calumnies most frequently proceeded? Whether it would be received by the country as a boon or not, he could not tell; but he looked upon it as an improvement in the law of libel, as it diminished the undue severity against political libels, and increased the securities by which the public ought to be protected against private libels.

The bill, with its amendment, was passed.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

JULY 13, 1830.

Mr. H. Grattan called the attention of His Majesty's government to the existing distress in Ireland; a distress which arose not from a scarcity of provisions, but from want of employment. The required employment, he contended, might be afforded by the reclamation of the waste lands in Ireland, of which there existed 4,500,000 acres, and which would give a profitable return of 4 per cent. on the capital expended on their cultivation.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he trusted that when he stated it was not the intention of his Majesty's government to propose to parliament any such measure for the relief of the distress in Ireland, it would not be supposed that though it had come to such a determination, it did not at the same time feel the deepest sympathy for the sufferings of the people of Ireland. That distress he hoped would be mitigated, if not entirely removed, by the further progress of the potato harvest, and of the harvest generally. The voting of the public money for the relief of that distress, by forcing employment when there was not naturally a demand for it, might afford temporary relief, but it would be sure to be followed hereafter by an aggravation of the evil in every respect, and one of its immediate effects would be, to paralyze at once those efforts of private charity and benevolence, from which sources alone such relief should properly be derived. He did hope that the landed proprietors of Ireland would feel it incumbent upon them to relieve that distress at present. Measures were now under the consideration of parliament, with a view to afford a permanent remedy for the evils under which the poor of Ireland laboured; but the existing temporary distress would be best remedied by the charitable exertions of the gentry and landed proprietors of that country. From his experience in Ireland, he never saw any permanent good effected by votes of public money for forcing employment there—it was only postponing the evil day, which came at a later period with additional aggravation. He hoped that, whatever might be the inclination of his right hon. friend, some body of constituents would be found who would compel him to continue to exercise his talents and abilities for the good of his country. He thought, however, that his right hon. friend, in arguing the question of emigration, had assumed that there was now no relief administered to the distress of the country through that channel. Now he (Sir R. Peel) contended, that there was always a stream of emigration flowing towards our colonies. He hoped that that stream would flow quicker than at present; but even now he was obliged to confess that it had set in too rapidly for some particular colonies. There had been a new colony recently established at Swan river. He had read over the report, and a very able report it was, that had been sent home within a few days by the governor, Captain Stirling. In that report Captain Stirling stated, that the new colony was suffering great inconvenience from the number of emigrants who were flocking to it. Persons, he said, came to the Swan river without having the mental enterprise or the physical strength that was requisite to triumph over the difficulties which beset every infant settlement. He therefore added, "Instead of encouraging emigration to this quarter, discourage it; for the parties who come out are only likely to find the distress aggravated under which they are suffering at home." He could assure his right hon. friend, that government had by no means neglected the subject of emigration. A gentleman of great ability and high character, who had considerable experience in the settlement of new countries, was now travelling, by direction of the government, through our North American colonies. He was to draw up an account of their present condition, their present resources, and their future capabilities; and he trusted that, when that gentleman's report should be received, there would be an opportunity of carrying into effect, to some extent at least, the projects of his right hon. friend. Some previous arrangement must be made with the colonies to which the stream of emigration was to be directed, otherwise it would be productive of mischief both to the party emigrating, and to the country to which he emigrated. For his own part, he frankly confessed that he saw a better chance of relieving the distress of Ireland, by arranging a scheme of emigration from that country with some of our colonies, than by setting its surplus population to cultivate its waste lands.

Mr. Hume wished to know whether the government would have any objection to let the report of Captain Stirling, from the Swan river, be published?

Sir R. Peel said, that he had no objection to allow the greater part of that report to be published; on the contrary, he thought that the publication of it would have the tendency to disabuse the over-sanguine expectations which the country seemed inclined to entertain at present respecting that colony.

SLAVERY IN THE COLONIES.

JULY 13, 1830.

Mr. Brougham closed a long and impressive speech by moving, "That this House do resolve, at the earliest practicable period of the next session, to take into its serious consideration the state of the slaves in the colonies of Great Britain, in order to the mitigation and final abolition of their slavery, and more especially in order to the amendment of the administration of justice within the same."

Lord Morpeth seconded the motion.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he had never listened to a speech with greater pleasure than to that of the hon. baronet (Sir Francis Burdett) on the other side of the House. It was a speech calculated to advance that moral improvement, to which alone they could look for the extinction of slavery. He feared that they never could confer much advantage on the slave by forced legislation. He did not object to the motion as pledging the Parliament to a particular course, for they had a right to consider Parliament as a continuous body, though now on the eve of dissolution—they had done so in 1806, when that resolution was passed, which a future Parliament had recognised and carried into effect; but he thought that, except in very extraordinary and pressing cases, pledges ought not to be given, for, if they were not redeemed, they must operate to depreciate the character of Parliament. The resolution professed to contemplate the final abolition of slavery—a proposition to which he was unwilling to pledge himself, without knowing in what manner it was to be brought about. That was one of his objections to the motion; another was, that it said nothing about compensation. Arguing with the slave as to the right by which we held him, he must confess that he had no reply; but arguing with the West-India proprietor as to the effect which the abolition of slavery must have upon his property, he would contend, that the proprietor had as strong a claim to compensation as the possessor of any other description of property that could be mentioned. If it were the resolve of that House to remove the blot which he would frankly admit still rested on the national character in this respect, still he felt it ought to be accompanied by another measure, which would show that the legislature had not, in its zeal for humanity, forgotten the interests of those individual proprietors which might probably be affected, if not materially injured, by its determination to effect a great change in our colonial policy. Would it be wise in the House to determine, in the present state of things, that it would take into its consideration the propriety of an immediate emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies, without maturely weighing and considering the character and the probable effect which this measure would most likely have on the condition of the slaves themselves, in whose favour the measure of emancipation had been agreed to be conceded? The hon. and learned gentleman, in the eloquent speech they had heard with so much pleasure, dwelt on the dangers which were to be apprehended from the attempt to force a measure of the kind which he recommended on the colonial legislatures, despite of their feelings and predilections on this delicate subject, and had asked if there could be traced any resemblance in the situation of these colonies and our North American colonies previous to their revolt in the last century.

Mr. Brougham said, across the table, his observation was confined to the right of this country to tax the colonies, not to legislate for them in respect to measures of general applicability to the colonies.

Sir Robert Peel continued—Could any one dwell for a moment on the horrors to be apprehended from being, in consequence of such an interference by parliament with the internal concerns of these islands, forced to the awful emergency of waging war upon the white population of our own colonies and the colonial legislatures? With what dangers must such a measure be surrounded, from the probable widening of the breach between the colonists and the coloured population! a breach which must ever, he feared, continue so long as slavery itself continued in those colonies. The case of the West Indian population was singular. They were prepared to look on this subject with very different eyes from those with which we viewed it. "Virtus non sine moribus viget." And much as he should be sorry to find that the conduct of the slave-proprietor in the Bahama Islands, Henry Moss, was not an exception to the conduct of other slave-proprietors, he should still more regret that, by any conduct of our own at home, such a person should be hence considered an object proper to excite the sympathy of slave-proprietors generally in the West Indies. Without going to the extent which the hon. and learned gentleman's motion would pledge the House, he would ask, were there not means in their power of effecting much for the amelioration of the slave, and the elevation of his moral character in the social scale;—for instance, by enabling the slave to give his evidence in courts of law, and in other respects fitting and preparing him to enjoy that blessing which it was the object of all our late measures to impart to him—liberty? Such a preparatory course had not been considered unwise by the legislatures in Grenada and in Tobago. But he knew, from an intelligent individual, that though there might be less hesitation as to enabling the slave to give evidence generally in courts of law, even against the taskmaster or the overseer, still there were scruples as to the propriety of allowing him to be a witness against his owner, or one who unavoidably had, from his rights of property in him, such a control over the slave. He trusted the hon. and learned member would, upon mature deliberation, be of opinion that this was not a proper occasion to press the House to a division on the subject. If he were to persist in the intention he had avowed, and divide the House, there would be possibly a fresh ground of remonstrance taken up, on the smallness of the number of members now present when such an important question was under discussion. He hoped the colonists would take the wished-for hint furnished by this and other motions previously submitted to the British legislature, and begin to improve and ameliorate the condition of the slave population; and that the West Indian colonists would be fully convinced there was no intention on the part of the legislature here to interfere, so as to interrupt their efforts to improve the morals and condition of those more immediately committed to their charge, and in whom they had every reason to feel the most lively interest. For his part, he was anxious to maintain, and bound to maintain, the authority of parliament—not to tax the colonies, but to ensure there, as well as at home, the due administration of justice. He hoped the concession, enabling the slave to give evidence in courts of law, would pave the way to other arrangements of the local legislatures, which would engender and foster more kindly feelings between the owners of slaves and the slaves themselves; that there would be no pretext furnished to their over-anxiety for their own interests, by the forcible interference of the legislature at home, to attempt to prolong the dependence of their slaves, and that the West Indian legislatures would set about, in good earnest, improving the condition of the negroes, in order to prepare them for the reception of more important concessions hereafter; thus warding off in time the dangers which were possibly to be anticipated from that interference of which they were so apprehensive, but for which nothing but their own disinclination to attempt the improvement of their slave-population could furnish parliament with a motive, or their enemies with a pretext.

On a division, the numbers were—for Mr. Brougham's motion, 27; against it, 56; majority, 29.

PUNISHMENT OF DEATH FOR FORGERY.

JULY 20, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose to move, that the amendments made by the Lords, in the Forgery Laws Amendment Bill, should be taken into consideration by the House, for the purpose of acceding to them. In making that motion it would not be necessary for him to enter into any lengthened discussion. The House were aware that the amendments of the Lords placed the bill in a shape adverse to the opinions expressed by the majority of the House. Still, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, he trusted that the members would not feel a difficulty in acceding to those amendments. They would not, by acceding to them, at all affect or compromise their own opinions. The effect of rejecting the amendments would be, to leave the law in a state of greater severity than it would be in by the House acceding to the amendments. As therefore, by rejecting the amendments, the House would make the law of greater severity, he thought the House would not in the slightest degree relinquish its own opinion by not adopting that course. He need not say, that the amendments were in accordance with his own views. He trusted that the House would accede to them without delay. On a former evening he had most readily yielded to the wish of an hon. and learned gentleman, that the further consideration should be postponed for a day or two. The effect of such postponement had been, that as the bill now stood, it would come into operation to-morrow, July 21st. Under these circumstances, it was of great importance that the bill should pass, if it were to become a law, at as early a period as possible.

Mr. F. Buxton said, there was one amendment which he should wish to add to those made by the Lords,—and that was, that the duration of this bill should be limited to one year. That would compel the government to introduce another bill to the House next session, more consonant to the humane views so generally adopted by their constituency throughout the whole country.

The amendment having been ordered to be taken into consideration,—

Sir Robert said, he attributed the apparent delay in sending the bill back from the Lords, to which the right hon. gentleman (Mr. C. W. Wynn) had adverted, to the unfortunate demise of his late Majesty. The bill, in its present shape, was decidedly an improvement on the old law, not only because it simplified and consolidated it, but also because it repealed the penalty of death in all cases of forgery upon the Stamp-office. He trusted, that the House would not concur in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Weymouth. If the duration of the bill were limited, as he advised, in what situation would it place those who were entrusted with the duty of superintending the due administration of the law? To that amendment he should offer his decided opposition. As to the observation, that no Secretary of State would ever be found to advise the infliction of capital punishment in those cases of forgery in which the House had declared that the punishment of death ought to be abolished, he had only to remark, that he (Sir R. Peel) would always give the Crown such advice, with regard to the execution of the law of the land, as he thought the interests of justice required, without reference to what might, or might not be the opinion of the majority of the House of Commons respecting it.

The amendments of the Lords were agreed to.

[On Saturday, the 24th of July, the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.]

OPENING OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT— CHOICE OF A SPEAKER.

OCTOBER 26, 1830.

The Commons having received his Majesty's command, through a commission appointed for the purpose of opening the New Parliament, to choose a Speaker, Sir Edward Hyde East, member for Winchester, moved that the Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton be chosen for that office.

The motion was seconded by Mr. N. Calvert, and agreed to nem. con.; after which, and Mr. Manners Sutton having addressed the House in acknowledgment of the honour conferred upon him,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose, and in moving that the House do adjourn, begged to take that opportunity of offering to the Speaker his most sincere congratulations at the unanimity with which he had obtained an honour he so well deserved. He begged also to congratulate the House that it was enabled to place in the chair a gentleman of great experience in public business, and well entitled, by his conduct in the chair, to the approbation and confidence of the House. In the fourteen years which had elapsed since he had been first placed in that situation, he believed that during those fourteen years there had been only one single day in which the right hon. gentleman had asked, or rather consented, to a remission of his public labours. No considerations of personal convenience—no consideration of his private affairs—nothing but the claims of private affliction, could make him even consent to abstract that day from the public service. During these fourteen years, whatever might have been the conflict of parties, all his opinions and all his decisions had been given with the strictest impartiality, and received with satisfaction by the House. But the right hon. gentleman's merits were so familiarly known to all the members, that it was unnecessary for him to say more. The unanimous vote of that evening secured the devotion of the House to its Speaker, and it was impossible that the public and the country should not find that, in addressing the members, the unanimity would give authority to his opinions and weight to his decision.

Mr. Brougham seconded the motion, which was agreed to, and the House adjourned accordingly.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S SPEECH.

NOVEMBER 2, 1830.

The address in answer to his Majesty's speech having been moved by Lord Grimstone, and seconded by Mr. R. A. Dundas, the Marquis of Blandford moved an amendment, which was seconded by Mr. O'Connell.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. Hume in the debate which followed, said, it appeared to him that it was the wish of the members to come to an early expression of their sentiments on the address; and he was glad, therefore, that he was not called upon to detain them at any length, either in support of his Majesty's speech, or in answer to the objections which had been made against it. With regard to the speech of the noble lord—the fair, the temperate, and the candid speech of the noble lord, for so he could only in justice characterise it—that speech showed that it was not at all necessary for him to detain the House at any length; for with one single exception only, the noble lord fully concurred in the speech from the throne. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, had, it was true, pronounced a loud and angry denunciation against his Majesty's speech, but that hon. member had been able to find fault with it by no other means than an intentional misrepresentation of every part of it upon which he had treated.

Mr. Hume rose to order, and said, that he was incapable of intentional misrepresentation.

Sir Robert Peel assured the hon. gentleman, that he had meant to say unintentional misrepresentation. He was sure the hon. member would do him the justice to suppose, that if he had said "intentional" it was by mistake. The hon. gentleman had said, that his Majesty, in his speech, charged the people of England with disaffection; but, so far from this being the fact, his Majesty had expressed the satisfaction which resulted to him from the conviction, that he could rely with safety on the loyalty and the attachment of his people. "I reflect (these were the words of his Majesty) with the highest satisfaction on the loyalty and affectionate attachment of the great body of my people." It was altogether contrary to the fact, therefore, to say that his Majesty had charged the people with disaffection. His Majesty had, however, said, that he could not view without grief and indignation the attempt of some to traffic with the distresses and the sufferings of the people, and to raise themselves into unenviable notoriety by aggravating calamities where they did exist, and by raising imaginary evils where none were in reality to be found. This was a conjuncture which required all the temper, all the moderation, and all the patience they could command in their deliberations; and he must therefore say, that he regretted the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hume) should—not with bad intentions, he was sure—have indulged in inflammatory language, which, to say the least of it, could not conduce to that cool and temperate discussion which was always desirable, and never more necessary than at present. He put it to the hon. gentleman whether it were right,—whether it were consistent with the fact,—to represent the people of this country as in a starving condition? If there were suffering in some parts of the country, no man, he was sure, could more deeply lament or more sincerely commiserate it, than himself; and, however firm might be the determination he had taken to put down disturbance and acts of violence by every legal means, he could assure the hon. gentleman that the consideration of how the causes of the people's distress could be removed should never be absent from his mind. But the people were not in a starving condition, as the hon. member must know, or might have known, if he had enquired. That there was severe suffering and distress in some parts of the country, could not be denied; but that was a condition of things which, notwithstanding the general state of the people, was, he feared, in many places almost unavoidable. In approaching that part of his Majesty's speech which related to our foreign policy, the hon. gentleman had, he must say, broached a doctrine that was altogether new in the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman had said that foreign policy was not interesting to the House of Commons, and that the people of England cared nothing about foreign policy. When the hon. gentleman talked about economy, let him tell the hon. gentleman, that foreign affairs must not, could not, be lost sight of; and that they would force themselves upon his consideration. If the hon. gentleman would not be economical with reference to other than the internal affairs of the country,—if the hon. gentleman's economical policy were based upon the exclusion of all reference to other countries,—the hon. gentleman would be a very dangerous adviser of the crown, and would find himself ultimately no true economist. With regard to what the hon. gentleman had said upon that part of the speech from the throne which related to France, let him tell the hon. gentleman, that though it was only a short time since he had been in possession of the speech, yet that time was quite long enough to have enabled the hon. member to ascertain what it contained. And here he must protest against the notion which the hon. gentleman had inculcated, that the government was responsible for every word which fell from the mover and seconder of the address. He had heard nothing in the speeches of the two hon. members who moved and seconded the address which, rightly understood, he dissented from; but let him tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hume), that he was not a little surprised to find him supposing it to be necessary that any gentleman who moved and seconded the address should be previously tutored by a minister of the crown, and that, consequently, the government was responsible for all that fell from gentlemen on such occasions. This was hardly consistent with the doctrines usually propounded by the hon. member. The hon. gentleman had said, first, that his Majesty had regretted the events that had taken place in France; and, secondly, that the government, being disappointed in the successful opposition that had been made to the ordinances, must consequently have approved of those ordinances having been issued. Now, with regard to the first assertion of the hon. gentleman, that was in a moment destroyed by the mere observation, that it was contrary to the fact. His Majesty, so far from expressing any feeling upon the subject, had merely narrated the simple fact, that “the elder branch of the house of Bourbon no longer reigned in France, and that the Duke of Orleans had been called to the throne by the title of the King of the French.” The hon. gentleman might, he thought, very easily understand, when he considered the present situation of the elder branch of the house of Bourbon, who were exiles in this country, that his Majesty could not describe, in terms of very severe reprehension, those acts which had led to this result. As to the government or his Majesty approving of those acts, what ground, he would ask, had the hon. gentleman for making any such assertion? If the hon. gentleman, who accused him of participating in this approbation, meant to say that he (Sir R. Peel) thought that the ordinances referred to were consistent with good policy, or with the fundamental law of France, the hon. gentleman was very much mistaken; for, God knew, he could not say that such were their characters. That he lamented what had occurred in France was quite true; he did lament it, and for that very reason he deeply deplored the cause. It had been attempted in various quarters to raise a prejudice against the government, by repeating a charge which, on a former occasion, he had intended—and he thought he fulfilled that intention—positively and unequivocally to deny. He had stated distinctly, as he thought, that no charge could be more wholly and entirely unfounded, than that the government of this country had interfered in the appointment of Prince Polignac. He had said that, neither directly nor indirectly, had there been any interference on the part of the government, or of any member of the government, in the nomination of the Polignac administration. He begged once more to repeat this statement, and to say that, in using the expression “neither direct nor indirect interference,” he meant to include all possible modes of interference which could be suggested or imagined. It had been said, moreover, that the government had counselled the issue of those ordinances which had led to the recent events in France. But the government had not the slightest conception that it was intended to resort to any such means. Further than this, allow him to observe, that the utter secrecy in which the intention to issue the ordinances was kept, precluded all interference on the part of the government, by friendly advice, to prevent that intention being carried into execution. Upon this subject he trusted it was unnecessary that he should say more; and he thought that, with regard to France, he must have satisfied even the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hume) himself; for the hon. gentleman must see, that the fact was, that his Majesty had expressed no regret at the events that had taken place in France; and the hon. gentleman would perhaps, on consideration, admit that silence on the part of his Majesty, as to the character of the ordinances, was not under the circumstances any ground for concluding that either his Majesty or the government approved of them. With regard to Belgium, allow him to observe, that there was a very wide distinction between the affairs of the Netherlands and those of France, as well as between the causes of the events which had taken place in the two countries. The hon. gentleman had said, “Look at Antwerp;” but there was no mention made of Antwerp in the speech from the throne; and all that was said about the government of the Netherlands applied to the condition and character of that government previous to the revolt. “But (said the hon. gentleman) the speech from the throne breathed war. At the very time that it mentioned the intended recognition of Don Miguel, and the actual recognition of the French king, it would be an inconsistency, as well as an impropriety, to interfere in the affairs of Belgium.” In answer to this, allow him, first, to observe, that he did not know what expression in his Majesty’s speech it was from which the hon. gentleman inferred that we were about to interfere by war. Next, let him remind the hon. gentleman, that, with reference to this country, there were peculiar circumstances in the condition of the Netherlands. No person, with even the most moderate knowledge of history, could be ignorant that the Belgic provinces had, at one period, been under the dominion of Austria, at another under that of Spain, and at another incorporated with France; and that, whether under the one or the other, they had always been the ground on which the great conflicts of Europe had been determined. For this reason, the condition of these provinces had always been a subject of deep interest to every state in Europe, and especially to England—not with regard to the form of government, but with respect to their tranquillity. In the year 1814, when the fall of Buonaparte rendered a settlement of Europe necessary, the Netherlands were in the occupation of Austria, and Baron Vincent was the governor of them. The government of the Netherlands was at that time offered to the King of the Netherlands by the Five Powers, on condition that they should be governed in a certain manner. Whether they had or had not been so governed was not at present the question; but these were the terms offered to, and accepted by, the King of the Netherlands. A great part of the provisions then entered into, had for their object the benefit of the Belgic provinces, and the good government of the country. He would contend that we ourselves were greatly concerned in the maintenance of the connexion between Holland and Belgium. He was surprised, he must confess, at what had fallen from the hon. gentleman opposite on that point. He was astonished to hear him assert, that the separation of Holland from Belgium was a matter of indifference. He was the more surprised at hearing such an assertion from the hon. gentleman, as it struck him that he had heard the hon. member himself admit, upon former occasions, that the position of Holland always must be contemplated as an object of the greatest importance to England. Well, a revolution had taken place in Belgium—a contest had arisen—the object of which was, to procure the separation of that country from Holland, and, in the course of which, circumstances had occurred afflicting to all the friends of humanity. At that very moment a bloody civil war was raging between the Belgians and the Dutch; and he would ask, would it be proper, would it be wise, under such circumstances, to allow them to settle the matter themselves, and to effect whatever accommodation they could? He would put it to the hon. gentleman, and to the House, whether, in such a case, it were unwise on the part of those foreign powers, parties to the treaty in 1814, which had given the Netherlands to Holland,—whether it were inconsistent with the policy and humanity of those powers to attempt, in the words of his Majesty's speech, “to devise such means of restoring tranquillity as may be compatible with the good government of the Netherlands, and with the future security of other states?” If any one single power were to interfere by offers of mediation between the contending parties, it might excite jealousy, but it could not be denied that the treaty of 1814 authorized such an interference, and that it was a right possessed by all the powers, parties to that treaty. Now, he (Sir R. Peel) could state, that the same course of policy which had in this instance appeared advisable to the government of England, was also that which appeared advisable to the government of the King of the French; and that the other powers, parties to the treaty of 1814, had acquiesced in a proceeding by which an attempt would be made to bring about an adjustment of the affairs of the Netherlands, by the interposition of all those parties who were so deeply interested in the settlement of that country. So much for that topic in his Majesty's speech. With regard to Portugal, it appeared to him that the policy which it had been determined to adopt was precisely that which the interests of the country demanded; and when the speech from the throne recommended the recognition of Don Miguel, it by no means implied that the slightest variation had taken place in those opinions which his Majesty's ministers still entertained, and which they had repeatedly expressed, respecting his acts. He could assure the hon. member for Middlesex, and the House, that whenever the acts of Don Miguel had interfered with the rights of British subjects, his Majesty's government had demanded, and had received, immediate satisfaction. Without, in the slightest degree, departing from those opinions which they had expressed regarding the means by which Don Miguel had become possessed of the sovereign authority in Portugal, his Majesty's ministers had determined to adopt the course of policy announced in the speech from the throne; and was the House prepared to condemn his Majesty's government for thinking that the time had arrived when, a certain act of justice and humanity being performed by the government of Portugal, the interests of British subjects should be consulted by effecting a renewal of our diplomatic relations with that country? His Majesty's government had certainly refused to recognise Don Miguel until the performance of the act to which he had just referred; an act of general amnesty, on account of those political proceedings which had been directed against him while assuming the power which he now possessed in Portugal, had been promised on his part, and they had now his positive assurance that such an act was about being immediately carried into execution. They had not made it a condition of the recognition which had been already determined upon; but, until that act was performed, they would not make the recognition complete. Two years and seven months had elapsed since the accession of Don Miguel to the sovereign power in Portugal, and his own subjects appeared to acquiesce in his possession of that power. The interests of British subjects were seriously affected by the non-recognition of Don Miguel; and, with at least the apparent acquiescence of his own subjects in his authority, was the government of this country still to refuse to recognise him, and was it to allow the interests of British subjects to be materially injured by the continued interruption of our relations with Portugal? Looking at the matter in every point of view, he entertained a confident hope that the policy of the British government, with regard to Portugal, would not be deemed undeserving the approbation of that House. He did not know that there were any other portions of our foreign policy into which it would be necessary for him to enter upon this occasion. He had endeavoured to confine himself merely to a reply to the observations of those hon. members who had preceded him, being of opinion that the present was not the proper opportunity for entering into the general details. The hon. gentleman had admitted that his Majesty's declaration respecting the civil list was quite satisfactory. His Majesty, it would be seen, had placed at the disposal of Parliament his interest in the hereditary revenues, in those funds which may be derived from the droits of the Admiralty, and in other revenues that had been hitherto reserved to the crown; and had trusted entirely to Parliament for a just and liberal provision for the maintenance of the honour and dignity of his crown. He could not sit down without shortly referring to the hon. gentleman's observations with regard to the course which had been pursued towards Ireland. The hon. gentleman had characterised as a disgraceful act the issuing of the proclamation which had been directed against an attempt to disturb the repose of that country, and to involve it again in that agitation from which he (Sir R. Peel) had believed the Catholic Relief bill would have redeemed it, and from which, as he still believed, it would have been by that measure redeemed, if it had not been for the events at Paris and in Belgium, which had been taken advantage of for the purpose of propagating an impression amongst a high-spirited and unreflecting people, that the same success might, perhaps, attend their efforts. The hon. gentleman had asked, was a man in that House to be prevented from moving for a repeal of the Union?—and was the hon. and learned member for Waterford, if he had got such a whim in his head, to be prevented from bringing it forward there, and having it fairly and openly argued and discussed? But such was not the course pursued by the hon. member for Waterford. That was not the way in which he had brought forward the discussion of the question; and was it, he would ask, for the indulgence of what the hon. member for Middlesex had called "a whim," that the repose of a whole country was to be hazarded, and that it was to be made a scene of confusion and bloodshed? What was not the responsibility—how great—how tremendous—he spoke not of the legal responsibility, but of the responsibility before God and their country,—which those men took upon themselves, who could excite a whole population in the manner against which the proclamation to which reference had been made, was directed? The hon. gentleman was not to suppose, that they were to be gulled and deluded into the idea, that the simple object of the assembly which that proclamation put down, was to promote petitions to Parliament. Had the hon. gentleman read the declarations which had accompanied the acts of that assembly? Surely the hon. member for Waterford would not stand up and affirm of that association, that its sole object was to prefer a temperate appeal to the Legislature on the question? That hon. gentleman had himself declared, that Ireland was not yet ripe for revolt—that she was not yet ready to oppose force to force. Could any man, after that, doubt that the intention of that hon. gentleman was to form a permanent association, meeting in Dublin, the object of which would be to organize the people of Ireland on this question,—to form their minds upon the subject, and to keep them in continual agitation until the time should arrive when they might look to the employment of force with success, and it would become dangerous to refuse the concession of their demands? He believed that that was the very assertion made by the hon. and learned gentleman himself in the association alluded to; and it was because he believed it to be true mercy to put an end at once to such an attempt to organize the popular mind of Ireland, that he, in conjunction with the rest of the ministers of the crown, gave his sanction to the instrument for extinguishing that association. In doing so, did he mean to deny that the situation of Ireland called for enquiry; or did he mean to say, that he was prepared to withhold his assent from such measures as he might think calculated to relieve her distresses? No such thing. He was anxious to see the condition relieved and ameliorated: but having the power to prevent the agitation he had described, and to render ineffectual the mischievous efforts to organize and inflame the people of Ireland, he, for one, dared not incur the responsibility—not of issuing that proclamation, for that he had incurred, but the awful responsibility of withholding it. Let them not, by suffering such agitation to continue, prevent the accomplishment of those good effects which the healing measure of emancipation was calculated to produce. Let them not again bring into play parties and factions. Let them not revive the religious animosities which had so long disturbed that unfortunate country. Let them not trifle with a subject of such tremendous importance. Let not an inflammable population be excited by attempting the mad, but peculiarly exciting, project of a dissolution of the Union. Was it come to this, that after having, by successive efforts, improved the condition of the country by consolidating and binding together the various parts of which this great empire was composed,—after having, in the early period of our history, succeeded in putting an end to the divisions of the heptarchy,—after having united Wales to England, and subsequently Scotland to this country,—and after having consummated the great object of concord by uniting Ireland to Great Britain,—were they, after having accomplished all that, now to begin to retrace their steps, and to dissolve the connexion between the component parts of this great empire? If they should begin by dissolving the union with Ireland, what reason was there why they should not proceed to dissolve the union which had been effected with the other parts of the empire,—to repeal the union with Scotland, and to dissolve the connexion with Wales? He should not argue this question further at present; but if ever the time should arrive when such a question as the repeal of the legislative union with Ireland should be submitted for calm and dispassionate discussion and argument in that House, he did not despair of being able to show, from experience of the past, from what had taken place when Ireland had a Parliament of its own, and from the sympathy for Ireland which had, since that time, grown up in the English mind;—he did not, he would repeat it, despair of being able to show, by arguments drawn from all those sources, that this speculation was calculated only to raise one individual to a bad eminence, at the expense of the best blood of the two countries, and of the repose and tranquillity of both.

Sir Robert Peel, rising in explanation after Mr. Hodges, denied having said that the sufferings of the country were such as could not be remedied. When it had been asserted that the people of England were in a starving condition, he had maintained that such was not the fact; but he had always admitted and deeply lamented the existence of severe distress. He had also observed, that, in so complicated a state of society as that in this country, there could scarcely be a time in which there would not be much local suffering.

The amendment was negatived without a division, and the address agreed to.

MANAGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

NOVEMBER 3, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that before he made the motions which were usual at the commencement of every session, for giving precedence on certain days to orders, and on certain days to notices, he wished to make a few observations on the general conduct of the business of that House. It was quite evident, from the occurrences of the last session, and it was quite evident, even from the notices which had that evening been given (all of them, he willingly acknowledged, on subjects of great importance), that it would be a matter of exceeding difficulty to devise the means of satisfactorily transacting the public business. In point of fact, the great difficulty was, for the House to find time for the adequate performance of its several duties. It would undoubtedly be a very easy matter to pass a resolution that the House of Commons should meet at ten o'clock every morning; and if to such a proposition there was no objection, but that it would interfere with the private business of the members, that objection ought not to be considered as one of sufficient validity. His objection, however, to such a proposition was, that it would interfere not with the private business of members, but with their public, and most important duties. The greater part of the mornings of many of the members of that House was occupied, necessarily occupied, by their attendance on public duties. Without in the slightest degree disparaging the importance of the discussions in that House, he was not sure that their importance was exceeded by the importance of the deliberations of those committees which were appointed to investigate and to communicate to the House the facts on which their subsequent proceedings were to be founded. He was at a loss to know how both these descriptions of duties—the duty of attending upon committees, and the duty of attending in their places in that House—could be carried on, if the House were to meet at the early hour to which he had alluded.

He was exceedingly unwilling, without some absolute and imperative necessity should present itself, to propose any very material departure from the present course. But he did think, that if the House were to avail itself of the regulations which, with that devotion to the public service which had ever marked his conduct, Mr. Speaker had himself suggested to him (Sir Robert Peel), and were to meet at three o'clock, instead of at four, such a change would not materially interfere with the duties of members in attendance on committees, while it would evidently add an hour to the period for the transaction of business in the House itself. If the Speaker took the chair at three o'clock, and it was generally understood that the ordinary hour for commencing public business should be, without fail, at five o'clock, and if every hon. member would lend his adherence to the plan, it did not appear to him that he could suggest any thing better calculated to facilitate the object in view. This arrangement would of course render it necessary that the committees above stairs should terminate their proceedings at three o'clock. It might also be necessary that those committees should meet at eleven o'clock instead of at twelve. But he by no means thought that the dispatch of public business would be advanced by the plan of the House meeting at an earlier hour than three, or by committees meeting at an earlier hour than eleven. In the first place, he exceedingly doubted the policy of abstracting members of the House from the means of communicating with their constituents. The letters from the General Post-office were not delivered until half-past nine; if members had not the period from half-past nine to eleven for the purpose, how was it possible that they could satisfactorily answer the various applications which they received from their constituents? He was by no means prepared to say, that extreme pressure of business might not render some other arrangement necessary; but he should be very unwilling to go any further than his present proposition, without some urgent necessity, and after mature consideration.

Sir Robert said, that all that had taken place during this discussion confirmed him in the opinion he had expressed at the outset,—namely, that the question was one of extreme difficulty. All that could be hoped for was, that hon. members would use their individual discretion. Any gentleman might, if he pleased, detain the House for four or five hours, and unless gentlemen would curtail their speeches, or the House put down the practice of enlarging unnecessarily upon fertile topics of argument and oratory, he did not see what good any regulation could answer. They had got now into the habit of printing almost every petition, and the reason assigned for this course was, the prevention of lengthy discussions upon petitions; yet, since this plan had been adopted, he was sure that debates upon petitions had been considerably lengthened. All that could be done by way of regulation on the subject was, as it appeared to him, to give up two hours to private business,—the public business being brought on always at five o'clock. At the same time it should be understood, that any gentleman who thought proper might present a petition at any other period of the evening, if there should be no public business before the House. After all, however, almost every thing must depend upon the individual discretion of hon. members, who could do much more than any regulation could effect towards the attainment of the desired end, if they would address themselves fairly and seriously to the subject under debate, laying aside all extraneous matter, and not indulging in surplus eloquence, which never carried conviction with it, and which often tended rather to obscure than to throw light upon the subject before the House. Some of the suggestions that had been thrown out were, he thought obviously impracticable. If, for instance, they should agree to adjourn the House for an hour, at five o'clock, in order that members might take their dinner, such a regulation would, he was sure, make no alteration in the dinner-hours of the majority of the House. They who were accustomed to dine at seven o'clock, would still dine at that hour, and not between five and six. Then again as to the proposal of the hon. member for Waterford (Mr. O'Connell), of setting aside three days for private business, he thought they would rather lose than gain by that arrangement. It was impossible to get through the public business in three days, and the evenings of the three days devoted to private business would be spent in some other way, and not in that anticipated by the hon. member. Indeed, he did not see how gentlemen who had been attending committees all day, could be expected to devote their evenings to a similar employment. What he proposed, therefore, was, that the House for the future should meet at three o'clock; that the time from three to five should be devoted to private business; and that the public business should always commence at five o'clock. If, however, this did not meet the wishes of the House, then he thought the only course to be taken was to appoint a Select Committee on the subject, as his hon. friend (Mr. N. Calvert) opposite had recommended. * * * * * He thought it impossible to fix any hour for the adjournment of the House. A regulation of that character would, he was convinced, be extremely mischievous. They must not make it peremptory to break off in the midst of a discussion, no matter how important and how pressing that discussion might be. It would be better to leave it to the House to determine, on motion made at the time, whether they should adjourn or continue to sit. As to adding Wednesday to the days of public business, his only objection to that was, that he thought it beyond the strength of hon. members to sit for five days in succession. If it should be insisted upon that Wednesday should be a day of public business, he was quite sure that on Friday hon. members would find themselves too much jaded—too much exhausted—to apply themselves to the public business, so as to transact it in the manner its importance required. He could not, as he thought the House would see, promise to be present every day during the presentation of petitions. The duties of his office would not allow him to make any such promise. This, however, he would promise—namely, that he would do all he could, consistently with his duty to the country, to be present every day.

REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

NOVEMBER 3, 1830.

In the debate on bringing up the report on the address,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the discussion which had just taken place, imposed on him the duty of making one or two observations on the subject of parliamentary reform, respecting which the hon. and learned member for York had so recently given notice of a motion. This task he would rather, on the present occasion, have avoided, as he was unwilling to express an opinion on such a question, until it should have been legitimately brought under the consideration of the House. A construction, however, had been put on the declarations of his right hon. friend, which deprived him of an alternative. With regard to the question generally, he might remark, that he had never hitherto taken a very decided part. Opposed to it he admitted he certainly had been, but at the same time (with very few exceptions), he had contented himself with a silent vote. It appeared that a passage in the speech of his right hon. friend had been interpreted as expressive of the sentiments of government generally on the subject. Now he fully admitted that he saw difficulties about the question of reform which he was by no means prepared to solve. He wished, nevertheless, to say nothing then which might in any degree prejudice the discussion hereafter, or interfere with its advancement to a satisfactory termination. He saw considerable difficulties attendant on the mere agitation of the topic, and he confessed himself at a loss to conjecture the principle of limitation which the hon. and learned member appeared to contemplate as the guarantee of a moderate reform. The member for Nottingham (Mr. Denman) had intimated, as he understood him, that no measure of reform which still allowed of the interference of peers in the return of members of the House of Commons would satisfy him. His argument, he concluded from the tenor of his speech, must be directed against an aristocratic government altogether. To such an extent he was not prepared to go; nor did he at present see any prospect that such a measure of safe, moderate reform, as his Majesty's government might be inclined to sanction, would satisfy the demands or expectations of the reformers. This only he would now premise, reserving a fuller exposition of his sentiments to the opportunity when they could be regularly and seasonably explained. As to the interference with Belgium, he owned he was surprised to find such difference of opinion after the speech which they had heard from the noble lord opposite last night. They had but one of three courses to pursue—either to disavow all interest in the affairs of Belgium, as the hon. member for Middlesex suggested, allowing French soldiers to make what incursions they pleased, and take possession of Antwerp and other fortifications unmolested; or, by military interference, to compel the submission of the provinces to their king (neither of which we adopted); or lastly, when civil war was raging in a part of Europe, from its position peculiarly calculated to embroil neighbouring states, to mediate with a view to restore tranquillity, and not for the purpose of subjugating the Netherlands—and this was the species of interference to which the British government had had recourse. The speech from the throne did not contain a word which necessarily implied the re-annexation of the provinces to the crown from which they had revolted. Did those expressions, at a time when civil war was devastating two of the finest cities on the Continent—did those expressions imply that the object of government was quiet mediation? He contended that they did. What was the end to be answered by the interferences alluded to? Was it the subjugation of Belgium? No, in the words of the speech it was, “to restore the tranquillity and the good government of the Netherlands.” He denied that the expressions used implied another meaning. It yet remained open for the government to take any steps that might appear most advantageous. Had this country, after Antwerp and Brussels had been completely ransacked and ruined—after the people in those cities had suffered grievously—this country had said, “we leave you to settle your matters as you best can,” we should have thrown the Netherlands open to others, and that would have been the most probable way of ensuring the complete annihilation of their recently-acquired liberties. England had, as on all former occasions, acted on a different principle. The hon. and learned gentleman, the member for Yorkshire, last night said, that this was the first instance of the mention in any King’s speech, of the internal disturbances of a foreign state, and he referred to the line of conduct adopted in the case of Poland. But there was not the slightest analogy between the two cases. The partition of Poland was not occasioned by internal hostility. It was the dismemberment of a country by foreign powers; and what the partition of Poland had to do with the Netherlands he could not comprehend. The question, in that instance, was fully discussed, and it was determined that this country should not take part in it. But the hon. and learned gentleman was not correct in stating that this was the first occasion on which the King’s speech had mentioned matters of this nature. In contradiction of his assertion he would refer to the speeches in 1787 and 1792; and then he was sure the hon. and learned gentleman would hardly maintain his assertion. The first of those documents contained a reference to the state of France; and in addition, there was a reference made in the King’s speech, delivered in 1764, to Holland itself. The speech delivered on the 30th of May, 1787, said—“But dissensions unhappily prevail among the states of the United Provinces, which, as a friend and well-wisher to the republic, I cannot see without the most real concern.” Here was a distinct reference to the internal condition of a foreign state. In the same year, when the government of France evinced a disposition towards an invasion of the Netherlands, this country took steps which fully proved, that the policy of non-interference was dependent on the policy of other states. At the opening of the session of Parliament, on the 27th of November, 1787, the king’s speech stated—“At the close of the last session I informed you of the concern with which I observed the disputes unhappily subsisting in the republic of the United Provinces. Their situation soon afterwards became more critical and alarming, and the danger which threatened their constitution and independence, seemed likely, in its consequence, to affect the security and interests of my dominions.” These facts shewed that the present government had not struck out any new line of conduct. He did not mean then to argue the right of taking the step alluded to in his Majesty’s speech, but he contended that it was neither proper nor fair for the hon. and learned gentleman to state, that this was the first time when such a step had been taken. The act might be wrong or right; he would not discuss that; he only meant to show, that this was not the first instance in which his Majesty’s speech had expressed sentiments relative to the internal state of foreign countries, and the interference of this country with disturbances in them. The speech from the Throne also stated—“In conformity to the principle which I had before explained,

I did not hesitate, on receiving this notification, to declare, that I could not remain a quiet spectator of the armed interference of France, and I gave immediate orders for augmenting my forces both by sea and land." Had the hon. and learned gentleman adverted to the conduct of Mr. Fox on that occasion, he would have found that Mr. Fox said,—that he considered the course adopted was perfectly just, and he objected only to the use of the word "lawful" in the Address. There were other occasions when mention was made in the speech from the Throne, of disturbances abroad. In 1790 the hon. and learned gentleman might have found that a reference was made to the internal state of a foreign country, and the declaration on that occasion was as nearly as possible the same as that of the present speech. In 1790, the king coming to parliament, stated from the throne, "Since the last session of parliament a foundation has been laid for a pacification between Austria and the Porte, and I am now employing my mediation, in conjunction with my allies, for the purpose of negotiating a definitive treaty between those Powers, and of endeavouring to put an end to the dissensions in the Netherlands, in whose situation I am necessarily concerned, from considerations of national interest, as well as from the engagements of treaties." If other proofs were wanting to refute the assertion, that on no former occasion had reference been made in a King's Speech to the internal dissensions of a foreign country, it would only be necessary to refer to the year 1787. He was not asking whether the mention of the internal state of foreign countries was wrong; he only wished to show, that it would be foreign to the policy which England had pursued on former occasions, not to have done as had been done in the present instance. The hon. and learned gentleman had referred to former occasions, and had taunted his Majesty's government with their present proceedings; but he would contend that it was a matter of great importance to the condition of that country, and, in fact, to the whole continent of Europe, that his Majesty should express his opinion of the unhappy state of affairs in the Netherlands. As he had before stated, there were only three courses for this country to pursue. Indifference to the proceedings in the Netherlands would have given a notice to other countries that England abandoned them to their fate. To have used a military force to compel a restoration of tranquillity in that country, would not have been consistent with the policy of Mr. Pitt? He begged to recall to the mind of the hon. and learned gentleman, that part of the history of the proceedings of this country in which it was proposed by the late Mr. Pitt to give to the Russian ambassador a written statement, as conclusive of his opinion, as to what ought to be done in the year 1805. In that document Mr. Pitt separated the case of those countries with respect to which, owing to their situation, the interference of this country would be just and proper, from those other countries, which, being only remotely connected with Great Britain, interference could seldom or never be justified, and Mr. Pitt included the Netherlands under the former division. That opinion was given by him a short time only before his death. Thus, he had, as he thought, satisfactorily proved two cases in which the King's speech had mentioned the state of the Netherlands, notwithstanding the assertion of the hon. and learned gentleman to the contrary. But it was said, What right had the government to characterise the Belgians as revolted subjects? Had we not, it was said, passed a warm eulogium on the revolution of the French? We had, but he contended that the condition of the two countries was totally different. With respect to Belgium, the political condition of that country was settled by the Congress assembled at Vienna. The arrangement was laid before Parliament, and in all the discussions in 1815, but few objections were made to it. There was a distinct motion made with respect to Genoa, but not with respect to the Netherlands. The result of the arrangements made by the Congress at Vienna was, that Belgium was intrusted to the sovereignty of the King of Holland, under certain restrictions or fundamental laws, which were imposed on the King of Holland for the exclusive benefit of the Belgians themselves. Some of the conditions were—that no innovation should be made in the articles of the constitution—that the fundamental law should remain inviolate—that free access to the throne should be allowed to the citizens, in order that they might lay their grievances before his Majesty—and that no impediment should be offered to the Belgian subjects for the benefit of the Dutch. In fact, all these articles were intended for the advantage of the Belgians, and the King of Holland took that people with the understanding that a violation of them by him would authorize the Belgians to apply to the Allied Powers, the parties to the treaty, for redress; thereby reducing the question for the consideration of his Majesty's government to the simple fact—did or did not the King of Holland violate the fundamental laws on which rested his sovereignty over Belgium? He contended for one, that the King of Holland had not violated those laws, but that, on the contrary, he had always manifested the greatest readiness to submit the redress of any grievances of which his Belgian subjects might complain, to the proper constitutional authority—the States-General. In his opinion the King of the Netherlands intended to do right, and the conduct of that monarch had not been contrary to the laws laid down by the congress. The hon. and learned member for Nottingham, in stating his reasons for not agreeing with that part of the address which alluded to the disturbances in the Netherlands, passed the severest condemnation on the conduct of the Belgians he had yet heard. That hon. and learned member said, that the Belgians had imitated in their conduct the last Paris fashion. Could there be a stronger term used in speaking of a civil war, than to describe it as merely imitating a fashion? There was neither prudence nor justice in confounding the events which gave rise to the occurrences in France with those of Belgium. Not only was there no similarity between the circumstances of the two cases, but there was a ready disposition on the part of the King of the Netherlands to submit the grievances of the people to the proper tribunal, to the States-General, for consideration. In the address of the King of the Netherlands to the States-General, his Majesty said, "I am disposed to comply with reasonable desires." Again, in the message he afterwards sent down to that assembly, he leaves these two questions for their consideration—whether experience had shown the necessity of revising the fundamental law? Whether, in that case, the system established by treaty and by the fundamental laws between the two great divisions of the kingdom, for the promotion of their common interests, require to be altered in their form or nature? These were the terms which that sovereign used when he left the subject for the consideration of the States-General. The hon. and learned gentleman said last night, that the march of Prince Frederick to Brussels was a violation of the Belgian compact. But he believed that Prince Frederick's march to Brussels was not a preconcerted act. His advance on that town was not made with any intention of bringing the military force under him into action. For what were the facts? At first, the insurrection in Brussels did not appear to have any definite object; and Prince Frederick's march to that town was equally without any decided purpose of committing violence. Brussels had just before been the scene of an undefined commotion, the objects of which were the removal of an unpopular minister, and of a municipal tax. To check the excesses of the agents in this insurrection, the inhabitants organized themselves into a burgher guard, which most probably would have succeeded, but for the foreigners and unemployed poor in the neighbourhood, who flocked into the town, and ultimately enabled the insurgents to defeat the burgher guard. Prince Frederick had no other object than to support this guard in protecting property, and was astonished when he met with the resistance which was offered to his entry. The charge of treachery made against him was without any foundation. The real question before the House was, whether it would come to a resolution to vote, in answer to the speech of his Majesty, the address before it. Without going further at present into a consideration of these questions, he would merely observe that the address did not pledge the house to adopt the course recommended by government; and that the hon. member for Westminster (Mr Hobhouse) entertained that view of it, was evident, from his having given a notice of a distinct motion on the subject that day. He disclaimed all idea of interference by force of arms; but he was satisfied that the interference his Majesty's ministers contemplated was more likely to contribute to the attainment of a peaceful issue than if they were to follow the advice of some of the hon. members opposite, and maintain a contemptuous indifference towards the present condition of Belgium. He begged it to be understood that such interference by no means contemplated the restoration of arrangements as they stood before; the word Netherlands having been introduced into the speech for the express purpose of leaving the whole question open to the consideration of the representatives of the Allied Powers.

In explanation to Mr. Brougham, who had spoken immediately after him,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he was desirous of saying a few words with reference to what had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman respecting the recognition of Don Miguel; because he was as anxious as the hon. and learned gentleman that a good understanding should subsist between this country and France. In the last speech from the Throne, which was delivered on the 4th of February, 1830, an allusion was made to the probability of the recognition of Don Miguel. His Majesty saw, that numerous embarrassments in our relations made that desirable. It was unnecessary to state that at that time no events had occurred in France which rendered the recognition of Louis Philippe necessary. The latter had been immediately recognized—the recognition of the former had not yet taken place; it must be evident therefore to all, that the two events were not connected.

Mr. Brougham expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the explanation which had been given by the right honourable secretary.

Lord Palmerston wished to know, whether, in the event of Don Miguel granting the amnesty, it was the intention of the British government to interfere to compel him to execute it if he should be disposed not to do so. Unless there should be some guarantee for the execution of the amnesty, individuals would not venture to place themselves within Don Miguel's power.

Sir Robert Peel said, he could best answer the question by stating the circumstances connected with the proposed amnesty. We had done all in our power, by advice and friendly interference, to consult the interests of those who were denounced by the present government of Portugal. The language we held was, that we did not require the issuing of that amnesty, as the condition of our recognition of the Portuguese government; but we declared, that unless it should be published to the world, the recognition would not take place. We did not promise that the recognition would take place if the amnesty should be offered; but we stated that the withholding of the amnesty would prevent that recognition. He did not think it would be prudent in him to state what steps this government might be called upon to take, in the event of a particular case arising. He would, however, state that we were not guaranties for the fulfilment of the amnesty.

The report brought up. Mr. Tennyson's amendment was negatived without a division.

ABOLITION OF THE OATH OF ABJURATION.

NOVEMBER 4, 1830.

Mr. C. W. Wynn moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the Acts of 13 William III., c. 6; 1 Anne, c. 22; 6 Anne, c. 23: 1 George I., c. 13; 6 George III., c. 53; 5 Elizabeth, c. 1: 7 James I., c. 6, and 1 William and Mary, c. 8; as requires the Oath of Abjuration to be taken, and the assurances to be subscribed in Scotland, and as directs certain oaths to be taken by members of the House of Commons, before the Lord Steward or his deputy.

In the debate which followed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he understood his right hon. friend to have two objects in view in his present motion. The first was, to dispense with the necessity of taking, before the Lord Steward, oaths which were afterwards taken with greater solemnity at the table of the House; and the second was, to dispense with the necessity of declaring, that the descendants of the person falsely pretending to be Prince of Wales, had no claim whatever to the throne. He would candidly confess that he had not had leisure to consider this subject; but his first impression was, that there was no objection to the accomplishment of those two objects. At the same time that he said this, he reserved to himself the liberty of further considering this question; and if he discovered any objections to his right hon. friend's proposal, he should reserve to himself the right of opposing his bill at some future stage. At present he saw no difficulties in the way of his right hon. friend's proposition, and he acquiesced in granting permission to bring in the bill. He must confess, that the longer he lived, the more clearly did he see the folly of yielding a rash and precipitate assent to any political measure. He therefore would not pledge himself not to oppose this bill. There might be objects attained by it, which even his right hon. friend himself did not at that moment perceive. If it should appear to him that there were such objects, that would be an additional reason to him to oppose the bill. He should certainly object to the total repeal of the Oath of Abjuration, though there were parts of it which might now unquestionably be dispensed with. It was right to require individuals to pledge themselves to support the succession to the throne, as limited to the Princess Sophia and her heirs, being Protestants; but it was unnecessary to retain that part of it which abjured all allegiance to the descendants of James II. Indeed, the House, in framing the oath to be taken by its Roman Catholic members, had omitted that part of the Oath of Abjuration which contained the declaration against James II. and his descendants. The oath taken by the Catholic member was this, "I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend, to the utmost of my power, the succession of the crown, which succession, by an Act entitled, 'An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject,' is, and stands, limited to the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience and allegiance unto any other person claiming or pretending a right to the Crown of these realms." Now, there could be no claimant for the throne at present, as a descendant of James II.; but if the strictness of hereditary descent were to be considered, other claimants for it might, perhaps, be found, deriving their claim from a higher stock than James II. He was unwilling to make any distinction between the oaths taken by Protestants, and those taken by Roman Catholic members. He should therefore reserve to himself, if he so thought fit, the right of retaining all those parts of the Oath of Abjuration which had no reference to the claims of the descendants of James II. He thought that the time had now fully come, in which the House might safely omit all reference to the Pretender and his family; and, if so, it was wrong to encumber the oath by an abjuration of allegiance, which no circumstances could call again into existence. He hoped that he had sufficiently explained the limitations under which he was willing to grant to his right hon. friend leave to bring in his bill. With respect to what his right hon. friend had said on the subject of taking the oaths before the Lord Steward, he was not prepared to say, that his right hon. friend had convinced him that members ought to vote for a Speaker without taking some oath, although he had convinced him that there might be much inconvenience in their being compelled to take the oaths exclusively before the Lord Steward.

Mr. Cutlar Ferguson wished to ask the right hon. baronet, if he did not think that the Oath of Allegiance was the only oath which ought to be taken by members of parliament on their admission to their seats.

Sir R. Peel observed, that the enquiry of the hon. member showed the necessity of the caution which he had already recommended. The effect of declaring that the Oath of Allegiance was sufficient, would be at once to decide the question agitated last session, with respect to the admission of Jews into the House. If it were proper that such an admission should take place, the object ought to be effected by a direct motion, and not by a side wind. Leave was given to bring in the bill.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

NOVEMBER 5, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in answer to a question from Mr. Kenyon, said, it was not his intention to propose the appointment of a committee to take into consideration the general distress of the country. As to the specific measures which his Majesty's ministers intended to adopt, he hoped that their whole policy would show the disposition which they entertained to advance the prosperity of the country; although it could not be expected that he should now enumerate the precise measures that they might take. The hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing that any part of his Majesty's speech alluded to measures of coercion. What his Majesty stated was, that he would exert all the existing means which the law and the constitution had placed at his disposal.

Later in the evening, Sir Robert Peel expressed his surprise, that the hon. member for Middlesex should charge him with want of courtesy, in not answering his question yesterday. What he had understood the hon. gentleman to say yesterday was, that he would put to him (Sir Robert Peel) this day, a question as to the probability of the occurrence of war. He had intended, if the hon. gentleman had this day repeated his question, to have answered—that a perfect confidence might be entertained that the same motives which had hitherto induced his Majesty's government to pursue a pacific policy, would continue; and that his Majesty's government would make every possible effort, consistently, of course, with the honour and permanent interests of England, to maintain peace with the whole world. His Majesty's government was deeply interested in the preservation of the general tranquillity. His Majesty, in his speech from the throne, declared that “the assurances of a friendly disposition, which he continued to receive from all foreign powers, justified the expectation that he should be enabled to preserve for his people the blessings of peace.” It was impossible for him, consistently with his duty, to say more on the subject, than, that since that declaration from the throne, nothing had occurred to change or diminish the expectation which his Majesty had been induced to entertain, “that he should be enabled to preserve for his people the blessings of peace.” The hon. member for Middlesex now asked, and required a positive and decisive answer to the question, whether his Majesty's government intended to propose any reduction of taxation? He was confident, that on reflection the hon. gentleman's experience would show him that the question was a very improper one. He must certainly decline giving any answer to the question, either affirmatively or negatively. But suppose he were to answer the question affirmatively, did not the hon. member well know that such an answer must be followed up at once by enumerating the specific objects to which the intended reduction was to be applied? No inference whatever ought to be drawn from his declining to answer the question, except that to do so would be inconvenient to the public. He appealed to every member, of parliamentary experience, if any thing could be more prejudicial than for one of his Majesty's ministers, at the commencement of a session, to give any answer to such a question as that which the hon. gentleman had put to him? The hon. gentleman talked of some pledge which he (Sir Robert Peel) had given last session of the disposition of his Majesty's government to defer to public opinion. What he had stated last session was this fact:—that his Majesty's government had made such an extensive reduction in the patronage of the Crown, that no administration could rely upon the permanent possession of office unless they felt themselves supported by the confidence of parliament and the country. But the hon. gentleman must not conclude from that declaration that any vulgar or common opinion, though expressed by the hon. gentleman, would at all influence him in the discharge of his duty. If the hon. gentleman joined in the vulgar imputation on public men, that they were unduly influenced by their wish to retain the paltry emoluments of office; if he thought it necessary to caution the people against listening to the advice of such persons because they were interested in giving that advice; he knew not by what test the hon. gentleman was prepared to prove the truth of his insinuations, but he knew that they were most uncharitable, and most unjust. The only considerations which his Majesty's government had in contemplation were, the welfare of the people, and their permanent interest. The people must judge of their motives by their measures. If the House and the country suspected the motives and condemned the measures of his Majesty's ministers, no inherent power or influence they possessed could maintain them in the administration. When the hon. gentleman talked of the proceedings of misguided men, he would ask him if the language which had been used in that House by himself, now the representative of the metropolitan county, and therefore, perhaps, possessed of a degree of importance greater than he had before enjoyed; he would ask him whether the language which he had used in the course of the present session were not calculated to produce excitement and inflammation? When the hon. member characterised the whole population of the country, without exception, as being in a starving condition—as reduced to a state of actual famine; or when he declared that unless certain measures were adopted, the day of vengeance would come, might not the excitement and inflammation which the hon. gentleman lamented, be unintentionally aggravated by the unguarded language he employed?

Later in the evening, Sir Robert Peel repeated his former declaration, that our interference with the Netherlands was not made with a view of exciting, but of preventing, war. His Majesty had declared in his speech, that he entertained the expectation that he should be able to preserve for his people the blessings of peace; and he had already assured the House—and he would repeat the assurance—that nothing had occurred since the delivery of that speech which induced him to think that that expectation would be disappointed. In reply to the observations of the hon. member for Worcester, which, he said, proceeded throughout upon the erroneous supposition that he had accused the gentlemen opposite of throwing fire-brands among the people, he should only say, that he had made no such accusation. On a former evening he had used the word “intentionally,” where he intended to have said “unintentionally.” On the present occasion he had laid particular emphasis on the word “unintentionally,” when he said that an hon. member was using language which was calculated—unintentionally on his part—to create great excitement and inflammation among the people. He repeated his assertion that such language had been used. He asked whether it was consistent with truth to call the people of England a starving population? There might be partial distress in the country; some distress there always must be, from the very nature of things; but it was a gross exaggeration to say that the people of England were starving. He acquitted the hon. member, as freely as the hon. member acquitted the Duke of Wellington, of all intention to do mischief; but when he said, that, in his opinion, the government ought to be displaced, there was a better and a milder way of saying it than by using such a phrase as “the day of vengeance will come.” When the hon. member was talking of a misguided and easily excited people, it was better to avoid using such language.

THE KING'S INTENDED VISIT TO THE CITY.

NOVEMBER 8, 1830.

On the entrance of Sir Robert Peel into the house, Lord Althorp expressed a wish to ask him for some explanation of one of the most extraordinary and alarming events that he had ever known in the course of his public experience. He was desirous to know what could have induced his Majesty's ministers to expose his Majesty to the great unpopularity which might follow from his disappointing the expectations of thousands of his faithful subjects, by advising his Majesty to decline fulfilling the promise he had made to dine with the Lord Mayor to-morrow? It was not in London alone that the most serious effects would result from this affair. The alarm which the intelligence of it would create from one end of the kingdom to the other, would necessarily be excessive. He supposed that his Majesty's ministers had not taken an important step like this without proceeding on the most authentic information, and without the most deliberate consideration. Were it not so, their conduct would deserve the severest censure. Under these circumstances, he begged to ask the right hon. gentleman the grounds of the measure which he had adopted.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that however anxious he might be fully to answer the question which had been put to him by the noble lord, and to give every information on the subject referred to which it was in his power to give, he was sure the noble lord would not expect from him—he was sure the House would not expect from him—any declaration or statement that might be prejudicial to, or in any way interfere with, the course of the public service. The letter which had appeared in all the newspapers of the day, addressed to the Lord Mayor, was authentic, and the signature to that letter was his. That letter conveyed the deliberate opinion of his Majesty's confidential servants, that they had felt it to be their duty to advise his Majesty to postpone the visit which their Majesties intended to pay to the City of London on Tuesday next. The opinion was founded on the firm belief entertained by his Majesty's government, that a collision of a very serious nature might take place in the attempt to maintain the public peace. Such a collision was at all times to be avoided; but peculiarly so on an occasion such as that in question. If ever an anxiety could be justly entertained to avoid such a collision, it must be at a time when an immense concourse of innocent and unsuspecting persons were assembled at night, in the streets of the metropolis, to witness a great public festival.

When it was considered that such an evil might be avoided, since there was no obligation that the festival in question must take place, and when to that was added the fact, that information had been received of an intention on the part of evil disposed persons to make that festival a scene of tumult, and probably of bloodshed, he thought no man would deny that it was the duty of his Majesty's ministers to give his Majesty the advice which they had given. It was his firm belief, while he was ready to do the most ample justice to the loyalty of the people of London, while he was convinced of the warmth of their attachment to their sovereign, while he was perfectly assured that the most implicit reliance might be placed on their affection to his Majesty, while he admitted that in the great body of the people he was disposed to place the most unbounded confidence—he was perfectly persuaded, that if their Majesties were to visit the city of London, a tumult and riot would ensue, involving consequences of a most deplorable character, and perhaps leading to bloodshed. I should be doing (continued the right hon. baronet) injustice to the feelings and character of the great body of the inhabitants of this metropolis, if I did not make an avowal of my sincere belief in their loyalty in the most distinct terms; yet, though my information leads me to believe that in their zeal and affection the utmost confidence may be placed, it also made me perceive that it was in the power—and, unfortunately, I learnt that it was also the intention, of a few abandoned and desperate characters, to promote disorder and tumult, which it would be difficult to repress by night, without incurring the risk of inflicting that punishment on the innocent which ought to fall upon the guilty alone. On that night there would be in the streets of London not merely many good citizens and loyal men, but also an immense concourse of women and children. Supposing that an attempt should be made to involve a part of the town in darkness, in order to facilitate an attack upon either the lives or the property of a part of his Majesty's subjects, in what position would those persons who are intrusted with, and are responsible for, the peace of the metropolis be placed, if they should be obliged to resort to force in the midst of a mixed crowd of unoffending women and children? If such a collision can be avoided, is it not right, is it not prudent, is it not the bounden duty of ministers to take such measures as will avoid it? I have now to inform the House, that in the course of Saturday and of Sunday last, a variety of information, from various quarters, came into my office, which led me and the other members of his Majesty's government to believe that there was a possibility of a great tumult arising on Tuesday next, from the acts of a desperate and abandoned set of men, who, though few, were still sufficient in number to create very general and extensive alarm. In the course of Saturday, the Lord Mayor elect of London, the chief magistrate of the metropolis for the ensuing year, felt it to be his duty to make to the Duke of Wellington a communication, which I will now proceed to read to the House, being willing to afford it every information upon this subject which my duty will permit me at present to disclose. This communication was received by his grace the Duke of Wellington on Saturday morning—

“MY LORD DUKE,—From the situation of Lord Mayor, to which I have been elected, numberless communications are made to me, both personally and by letter, in reference to the 9th, and it is on that account I take the liberty of addressing your Grace.

“Although the feelings of all the respectable citizens of London are decidedly loyal, yet it cannot but be known there are, both in London as well as the country, a set of desperate and abandoned characters, who are anxious to avail themselves of any circumstance to create tumult and confusion. While all of any respectability in the city are vying with each other to testify their loyalty on the occasion, from what I learn it is the intention of some of the desperate characters above alluded to, to take the opportunity of making an attack on your Grace's person—

[Very loud cheering, mingled with considerable laughter, from the Opposition benches]. Good God! A sarcastic cheer! (continued Sir R. Peel); and made, too, in the House of Commons, on hearing that the Lord Mayor of London has communicated to the Duke of Wellington that he had reason to believe that an attack would be made on his Grace's life as he accompanied his Majesty to the civic festival! And from an officer in the army, too! [This was an allusion to Colonel Davies, whose cheer was remarkably loud]. Whatever may be the opinions entertained by individuals as to the official acts and political character of the Duke of Wellington, is there a single man in the country—I am sure that the gallant colonel who cheered so loudly, when the heat of debate has passed by, will be among the first to deprecate such attempts—is there, I say, a single man of the slightest respectability in the country, who would wish to carry his political hostility to such an extent? To proceed, however, with the letter—

“While all of any respectability in the city are vying with each other to testify their loyalty on the occasion, from what I learn it is the intention of some of the desperate characters above alluded to, to take the opportunity of making an attack on your Grace's person on your approach to the hall. Every exertion on my part shall be used to make the best possible arrangement in the city; and at the same time I feel, that should any violent attack be made in one quarter, any civil force alone might not be sufficiently effectual, and I should not be doing my duty, after what I have heard, did I not take the liberty of suggesting to your Grace the propriety of coming strongly and sufficiently guarded. I probably may be considered giving you needless trouble; but the respect which I, as well as every person who really wishes the welfare of the country, must have for your Grace, and the gratitude we owe you, have induced me to adopt this course. I have, &c.

(Signed) JOHN KEY, Lord Mayor elect.”

Here, then, was an intimation from the Lord Mayor elect of London to the Duke of Wellington that there was no security for his Grace, on his visit to the city, unless he came provided with a large military guard. Would it be fitting, I ask, for his Grace, after all the services which he has rendered to this country, to be seen going to Guildhall accompanied and guarded by a troop of soldiers? Is that a salutary state of things, in which it is announced that a minister of the king cannot go to meet his sovereign at Guildhall without being exposed, I do not say to the usual symptoms of popular obloquy, but to the risk of an attack upon his person? But this is not all. Intimations reached my office that an attack was to be made upon his Grace's house in the course of the night, when the police were at a distance, under the pretence of calling for lights to illuminate. I say, that any such attack must be accompanied by riot; and that the attempt to suppress such riot by force, when the streets are filled with women and children, must be accompanied by consequences which all of us would lament. That, however, is only one of the causes which I have for believing in the possibility of such an attempt at riot taking place. Every one is aware that there exists in the public mind considerable excitement against those authorities which have been appointed, under the sanction of the House, to maintain the public peace—I allude, of course, to the body which is known by the name of the New Police. To maintain order in that procession, had it taken place, it would have been necessary to draw together all the civil power which the New Metropolitan Police places at the disposal of the magistracy, it being desirable to resort to all civil means, in preference to military means, for the preservation of the public peace. The police must have been collected from nine o'clock in the morning, to line the procession from St. James's-palace, from which his Majesty would start, to Temple-bar, where he would enter the city. If they remained on duty all night, then those parts of the town which it is their special duty to guard, would be left unprotected; and therefore, if there were any mischievous designs entertained against property, those designs might be easily perpetrated. If, however, each party of the police remained separated, then there would be grounds to apprehend that there would not be a sufficient civil force to maintain order in the line of procession, on an occasion when not only the ordinary population of the metropolis was likely to assemble upon it, but also a vast concourse of strangers from all parts of the country. I am now sorry to be obliged to inform the House, that in the course of Saturday and Sunday last, the most industrious attempts were made in various quarters to inflame the public mind against the new police. Thousands of printed hand-bills were circulated, some of which I will read to the House, for the purpose of showing the means employed to inflame the people against that portion of the civil force which is entrusted with the preservation of the public tranquillity. These are not written papers, drawn up by illiterate persons, and casually dropped in the streets, but printed hand-bills, not ill-adapted for the mischievous purposes which they are intended to answer. One of them is in these terms:—

“To arms, to arms!—Liberty or death!—London meets on Tuesday next, an opportunity not to be lost for revenging the wrongs we have suffered so long; come ARMED, be firm, and victory must be ours!!!

“AN ENGLISHMAN.”

Another of them is couched in the following terms:—

“Liberty or Death! Englishmen! Britons!! and honest men!!! The time has at length arrived—all London meets on Tuesday—come armed. We assure you, from ocular demonstration, that 6000 cutlasses have been removed from the Tower, for the immediate use of Peel's Bloody Gang—remember the cursed Speech from the Throne!!—These damned Police are now to be armed. Englishmen, will you put up with this?”

Now, after hearing the inflammatory language of these hand-bills, I call upon the House to consider how great the likelihood is, that after the police had returned to their ordinary duties, in their respective portions of the town, a desperate attack would be made upon them. If it were made, it would, of course, be resisted by the civil force; if the civil force were insufficient to repel it, military aid would be called in; and then, on that night of general festivity and rejoicing, in the midst of crowds of unsuspecting men, women, and children, there might be resistance, and if resistance, bloodshed, occasioned by the necessity of supporting the civil authorities. I am sorry to add, that the experience of what took place at the last popular assembly fortifies the impression which the information transmitted to my office originally created in my mind—that there might be such assaults committed by the people on the police. The last public procession which we had was on the 2nd of November, the day on which his Majesty came down to open the Session of Parliament. In the course of the night of that day, the police having attempted to apprehend certain persons discovered in the commission of crime, were violently attacked by numbers of the lower classes; and the individual who aided the police, by giving them permission to deposit their prisoners in his house, and to shelter themselves under its protection, had his house attacked, and most of his windows broken. The next morning there came before the magistrates of the different police offices in the metropolis, not less than sixty-six cases of assault committed in the course of that night on the police constables. Of those sixty-six there were ordered to find bail to appear at the Sessions, forty-two—there were fined, or in default of payment imprisoned, nineteen—there was remanded one—there were discharged on their own recognisances two—and there were also two absolutely discharged. Still there were sixty-six cases of assault committed on the police constables on the night of the 2nd of November. Such being the case, when on Saturday and Sunday the hand-bills which I have just read to you were industriously circulated, directing the people to attack the police with arms, could we, as ministers, view without apprehension the consequences which might ensue in different parts of the metropolis, when the business of the day was concluded, and the police constables were separated by their duty in their respective districts? If unprovoked attacks were made upon them, and I have decisive evidence before me that such attacks would be made upon them, is there not danger that, in exerting the energies of self-defence, a few desperate characters might, in spite of the great loyalty of the mass of the population of London, have provoked consequences highly injurious to the public tranquillity? The House, I have no doubt, will be glad to hear, that the government asks for no new law to repress these disorders, but is determined to enforce the old, which is sufficient for the purpose. We feel it, however, to be an imperative duty to avoid an occasion by which, in these agitated times, any collision may be produced between the constituted authorities and the people. I know the disappointment which has been experienced by the necessity of postponing the civic entertainment. I know that great sacrifices have been made, by various classes of his Majesty's faithful subjects, to pay every honour to him during his visit to the City. I was this day waited upon by the deputies of various trades, which had undertaken to protect the peace during various portions of the procession, and I could not hear, without regret, the expressions of disappointment which they uttered at finding that, though their Majesties had full confidence in the exertions of their loyalty, they were not to have the proud gratification of escorting them upon their entrance into the city. With a full knowledge of all these circumstances, I cannot help thinking that the disappointment occasioned by not holding this festival is a very subordinate consideration indeed, when placed in the balance against the maintenance of the public peace. These, Sir, are the grounds on which the members of his Majesty's government came to the unanimous resolution of advising his Majesty that this occasion should not be given for assembling on a November night an immense concourse of people of all descriptions. I sincerely believe, that if they were assembled, the public peace would be disturbed. I sincerely believe that recourse to military authority might be necessary for its preservation, and that, in the struggle to secure it, numbers of unsuspecting and unoffending persons must unavoidably be sacrificed. If such results were probable, I ask again whether it was not our duty, as the responsible ministers of the Crown, to advise his Majesty to forego the satisfaction of visiting the city of London, in order to spare him and his consort the permanent pain of having been unconsciously the cause of bloodshed and suffering to their unoffending subjects? I know not whether the House will approve of the course which we have adopted upon this occasion. I know that it will be said that the government is unpopular, whilst his Majesty is most enthusiastically beloved by his people. It is my duty to bear that taunt, rather than forbear from giving that advice, of which the adoption is calculated to secure the tranquillity of the metropolis—to prevent the loss of life—and to prevent, above all, any addition to that excitement of feeling which is at present so much to be deplored. I will submit to any taunt founded on the obloquy or objectionable character of the ministry among the people, rather than give them any cause for excitement which I can possibly avoid."

Mr. Brougham and Colonel Davies having spoken,—

Sir Robert said, that however tempting the occasion might be, he would not enter into any of those questions of party-feeling which the hon. and learned gentleman had raised in the course of his speech. His object was, to co-operate with the honourable and learned gentleman in his endeavour to calm the public feeling. He would therefore endeavour to abstain from replying to the sarcasms into which the honourable and learned gentleman had so naturally fallen. He cordially admitted the honourable and learned gentleman's intentions; and he wished to state, in the most clear and positive terms, that the honourable and learned gentleman had put a correct construction upon his language. "I believe with him," said Sir Robert Peel, "that the King and Queen might safely go to Guildhall to-morrow without any other inconvenience, save that arising from the exuberant loyalty of the people. I believe with him, that from one part of the procession to the other, there would have been nothing but one universal demonstration of loyalty and affection to their Majesties. I believe that every man possessed of property in the metropolis would have been ready to expose himself to any danger for its protection, and for the protection of the public peace. I know that among those who had confederated for that purpose were 1,400 or 1,500 persons connected with the first houses in London. So far am I from wishing to have it inferred that there was any disloyalty among the citizens of London, that I now declare my sincere conviction to be, that never was there an occasion on which greater attachment to the King, and a stronger disposition to maintain the public peace, were displayed. Still let the House reflect on the condition in which the metropolis would have been placed. All the firemen would have been engaged as guardians of the public peace. To maintain order in the line of procession all the ordinary police of London must have been on duty by as early an hour as nine o'clock in the morning. With all the facts which came to the knowledge of the government, I did not think it safe to leave all the suburbs of London exposed to plunder for the whole of to-morrow. What I stated in my former speech, and what I repeat now is, that voluntarily to get together, on a November evening, a large concourse of innocent people, men, women, and children, when certain agents of mischief are known to be at work, may be productive of consequences which should be avoided if possible. The gallant officer says, that in spite of the postponement of his Majesty's visit, the attack on the police may still take place to-morrow night. It may so; but then, mark the difference. The association of the people to-morrow night will be voluntary, and without apparent cause, and, now that warning is given, must be only for mischief; whereas, if the King's visit had not been postponed, the association would have been sanctioned by the magistrates, and would have been, as far as they could discriminate, perfectly innocent. I beg pardon for again intruding so long upon the House. I merely rose to state, that the hon. and learned gentleman has put the exact construction that I could have wished upon my words; and that, if any opinion has got abroad that there is disloyalty in London, that opinion is quite groundless. In conclusion, I beg leave to state my sincere conviction, that there never was a sovereign on the British throne better entitled to, and more in possession of, the undivided affections of his people, than his present Majesty. If I omitted to state that circumstance before, it was only because I thought it too notorious to require mention."

Later in the evening, Sir Robert Peel said, he could only state, that on Saturday two aldermen came to him, as from the city authorities, one of whom was the Lord Mayor elect, and the other a gentleman, who said he was deputed by the late Lord Mayor. These gentlemen told him, that the civil power in the city would not be sufficient for the preservation of the public peace, and asked for the attendance of a body of the military. He referred these gentlemen to the Horse Guards. Now, after receiving such a communication as this, and listening to the speech of the hon. alderman (Thompson), he must say, that, considering the heavy responsibility that rested with him, he wished that the magistrates of the city of London would be good enough to depute proper persons to make communications to the government.

In reply to Mr. Alderman Thompson,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he could not, of course, know what authority those two gentlemen had, but they certainly represented themselves to him as authorized to make the communication he had mentioned. One of them being the Lord Mayor elect, and the other acting for the late Lord Mayor, it never occurred to him to question them as to their authority, and certainly the offices they filled seemed to point them out as very fit persons to make such a communication, for to them, one might naturally suppose would be left the arrangements for the preservation of the public peace.

At the close of the discussion, Sir Robert Peel said, it had been assumed that the communication of the Lord Mayor elect had been the only one that had been received by his Majesty's government, and the hon. member opposite had said that his Majesty's government should have ascertained the grounds upon which that communication was made. An interview had taken place between himself and the Lord Mayor elect after the receipt of that communication, and if the information which had reached his Majesty's government on the subject had been solely derived from him, ministers would certainly have paused before they proceeded to act upon it; but the information received from the Lord Mayor elect had been confirmed by communications from at least twenty other different quarters. He thought that the Lord Mayor elect had acted perfectly right, and he must repeat that ministers had not come to any resolution till after an interview had been had with the Lord Mayor subsequent to the receipt of his communication. He must also take that opportunity of saying, that he could never forget the honourable and candid conduct of the learned gentleman opposite (Mr. Denman) that evening; which did not, however, surprise him (Sir R. Peel), knowing, as he did in common with every other person, the high and honourable character of that learned gentleman. He was gratified but not astonished at hearing the sentiments which that learned gentleman expressed respecting the attacks upon the Duke of Wellington, as well as the brutal attacks made upon humbler but very useful individuals. They were sentiments which might draw down upon him some unpopularity—he spoke of unpopularity amongst the low and the vulgar; but they were the sentiments of all respectable and good citizens in the state.

RELIEF OF THE POOR.

NOVEMBER 9, 1830.

In the course of a conversational discussion, which had called up SIR ROBERT PEEL several times, to answer questions, &c., Sir Robert, in reply to Sir J. Wrottesley, said he thought it would be a great advantage if conversations and remarks of the nature which had just been made, were preceded by some notice; and he must be allowed to observe, that the remarks of the hon. baronet who had just spoken, seemed to convey some reproach upon his Majesty's government for supineness with reference to the late disturbances—a reproach the most entirely unfounded that could possibly be uttered. It was extremely difficult at one and the same time to enforce the strictest economy, and exercise the energy that should belong to the governing power in any state. Infantry and cavalry were to be disbanded, scarcely a soldier was to be allowed in aid of the civil power—government were compelled to dismiss the yeomanry; and when disturbances arose, they were told that they ought not to leave them to be suppressed by the constables, but ought instantly to crush them with a strong hand. He would call upon the hon. member for Kent to say, if his Majesty's government had not done all, under the circumstances, which could be expected of it for the suppression of those disturbances? He had further to state, that though at a great public inconvenience, and to the neglect of other pressing matters, the Secretary for the Treasury was at the present moment at Maidstone, endeavouring to trace the causes of that extraordinary mystery which had, up to the present moment, eluded their most careful investigation; there were also at Maidstone, every police officer who, in the present state of the metropolis, could be spared. To this he had to add, that he had authorized the lord-lieutenant of the county to call out and embody the yeomanry, rather than resort to the regular military force. It would be a gross error to suppose that the disturbance in a neighbouring county was local. Its object, he could have no doubt, was general—the fires constituting its overt acts, were neither executed by the hands, nor devised by the heads, of the peasantry of the county of Kent—no suspicion attached to the resident population—the whole of the matter, whatever might be its origin, was devised by other heads than theirs, and proceeded upon principles, not local, but general. Though, up to the present moment, no detection had taken place; but he did hope that the time was near when not only the hands by which the offences were committed, but, what was more important, the heads by which they were devised, would be brought to condign punishment.

CIVIL LIST.

NOVEMBER 12, 1830.

In a debate in Committee upon the Civil List, SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. Brougham, said,—

The observations of the hon. and learned member seem to me to call for some reply—[Mr. Brougham here rose, as if to leave the House, but Sir R. Peel requested him to remain.]—It is certainly unusual for a member to charge a government with sheer stupidity and gross ignorance; and when a vindication is about to be attempted, for him to leave the House: but I do not ask the hon. and learned member to remain in his place that he may hear my answer, but that he may listen to a charge against him of gross ignorance on his part. I did not think it right to accuse him in his absence, and I therefore entreated him to retain his seat. He asserts that government have been guilty of gross ignorance and want of the common knowledge of grammatical construction—that they also had the intention to mislead, inasmuch as they have put into the king's mouth a proposal to resign all interest in the hereditary revenues of the Crown, and thus exciting an expectation that the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster, among others, were to be relinquished. The hon. and learned gentleman contends that there ought to have been contained in the speech a distinct explanation that his Majesty did not mean to relinquish his interest in the hereditary revenues of the duchy of Lancaster; and with a view to this point, it is material to refer to the language of former sovereigns, when they have invited the settlement of their civil list. George IV. relinquished his interest in the hereditary revenues of the Crown; but he did not on that account give up his interest in the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster; on the contrary, he expressly retained them, and in his speech to parliament in 1820, he said—"The first object to which your attention will be directed is, the provision to be made for the support of the civil government, and of the honour and dignity of the Crown—I leave entirely at your disposal my interest in the hereditary revenues." George IV. did not, nor did he mean to relinquish the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster, and nobody supposed that he did mean it; therefore, it is not the gross ignorance of his Majesty's government that is to be complained of; but the gross ignorance of the hon. and learned gentleman, which has led him to make the unfounded accusation. George III. also in his speech resigned his interest in the hereditary revenue; but he retained his interest in the hereditary revenue of the duchy of Lancaster. The speech, therefore, of his present Majesty, is in exact conformity with the speeches of his predecessors, George III. and George IV.; and I contend with confidence, that the present government are not chargeable with the gross ignorance, which belongs only to the hon. and learned member. But it seems that the terms "casual revenues" imply the relinquishment of the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster."

Mr. Brougham: I contend that the words of the speech imply every thing.

Sir R. Peel: And I contend that they do not. I suppose, that as a lawyer the hon. gentleman will not deny that the construction of particular phrases is to be collected from acts of the legislature, and I refer him to the language of the statute 1 George IV., to establish that it was never intended that the accounts of the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster should annually be laid before parliament, like the accounts of the surplus revenues of Gibraltar, &c., which it was provided should be presented before the 24th March in each year. Here, then, is an act of the legislature, giving an express construction to the words "casual revenues;" and I think I have shown that these words cannot be held to apply to the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster. I contend therefore confidently, that his Majesty's ministers cannot be justly charged with gross ignorance and stupidity for not including those revenues in words to which former speeches and acts of parliament have given a definite meaning, excluding those revenues. It will be more convenient on a future occasion to discuss the proposition of the noble lord for a select committee; though neither he nor the hon. and learned member seems to have made up his mind whether that committee shall have power only to examine accounts, or to send for persons, papers, and records; but let me tell them that the distinction is most material. The whole speech of the hon. member for Middlesex shows, that he would not be satisfied unless the committee had power to investigate the necessity of the most minute items of expenditure; nor do I see, whatever object the noble lord may have in view, how that could be otherwise answered. I beg to state, however, that at no period has parliament yet thought fit to appoint a committee with such extensive powers to enquire into the Civil List; though I will reserve until the proper occasion my objections to the nomination of a committee, now first proposed, to examine every particular connected with the Royal household, and the maintenance of the dignity of the crown. I hold in my hand a statement of the amount of every bill for the last ten years, and it has been prepared in order that the House may be able to compare the estimate of the present year with the expenditure of the past. If, however, the House of Commons deems it consistent with propriety to ascertain whether it was fit, in every instance, that the money laid out should have been so expended, all I can say is, that such a course will spare the King's servants some labour; but I do not think it is well calculated to uphold the dignity of the monarchy. There is no instance of the appointment of such a committee, excepting where a debt was incurred by the Civil List, and where resort was had to parliament for the payment of it. It seems to me that the accounts already produced, and those that will be laid upon the table this evening, contain so full an explanation of every item of charge, that I cannot believe the House will not be as competent to form its judgment upon every point on which its judgment will be required, as if a committee were to be named, with the limitations imposed on former committees on the same subject. On this question the House cannot possibly decide until it sees all the documents; but this I may say, that the King's government would have been justly chargeable with an attempt to throw the responsibility of the settlement of the Civil List on the House of Commons, if it had not itself proposed the estimate of what it thought consistent with public economy, and a due regard to the comfort and dignity of the throne. I apprehend that the House will feel that we have pursued a course both accordant with propriety and conformable to ancient usage. The hon. and learned gentleman complains of the complexity of the accounts. Now, I cannot see how the accounts could be simplified by merely transferring some particular items from one account to another. Any man of sense, who will take the trouble of reading the act of parliament, will understand that those expenses have no connection with the personal expenditure of the sovereign. It may be right or it may be wrong to include them in the Civil List; but I, for my part, cannot understand how their omission could serve in the least to simplify the accounts. The hon. and learned gentleman says, that it is not fair to the monarchy to include in the Civil List expenses which are incurred for the public service, and not for the personal comfort of the sovereign, or for the dignity of the crown. But, Sir, for my part, I think it by no means expedient to separate the personal expenses of the monarch from every other expense. Such an arrangement, at least, would be contrary to that which has been hitherto adopted, and which met the assent of Mr. Fox, and of many other eminent men who were usually opposed to the ministers of their day, and equally alive to preserving the welfare and independence of the people, and the dignity of the crown. It never before has been suggested that there exists any necessity to make a separation of those articles of expenditure which are applied to the maintenance of the splendour of the crown from those which are applied to the service of the state. I am sure, Sir, that no arrangement could be made, of which mischievous and artful persons could not take advantage for the purpose of inflaming the minds of the ignorant and thoughtless. Look to the hand-bills which some designing persons have found means to circulate extensively, representing the Marquis of Bute to receive vast sums of the public money, while the truth is, that nobleman has never received from the public one farthing. The name of the noble Marquis is placed at the head of a list of persons who are described as receiving immense sums from the taxes. Now, Sir, I know that great dissatisfaction has been excited among the least informed of the people by those gross misrepresentations. But by what arrangements shall we be able to prevent mischievous men from making such statements, and ignorant and foolish men from believing them? Now, in what respect is confusion occasioned by the present arrangement? and in what degree would simplification be effected by setting aside, in a separate account from every other branch of the public expenditure, £400,000 or £500,000, or whatever sum parliament may see fit to allow, for the personal expenses of the crown? The impression on my mind is, that such an arrangement would be, for many reasons, inexpedient. And so far as public economy is concerned, it is of no consequence whatever upon what fund those other expenses (now included in the Civil List) are charged; for there is an express provision, that should any saving be effected in them, the sum saved shall not go into the privy purse, but shall be transferred to the exchequer. As regards public economy, therefore, I say, Sir, there is no difference whether those expenses be placed in this account or in that. But further, Sir, as to this sum of £400,000 or £500,000, which is said to be voted for the personal comfort of his Majesty, I deny that it is intended to contribute to his personal comfort. It is voted to enable him to maintain that splendour, the maintenance of which is inseparably connected, not with the personal comforts of the King, but with the public interest. Is the office of the Lord High Steward, or of the Lord Chamberlain, or any other of the officers of the household, instituted for the personal comfort of the sovereign? Certainly not. They are connecting links between the throne and the aristocracy, and unite together the separate bodies which, without some such connection and mutual dependence, might come into hostility and conflict. They are subservient to that dignity which the sovereign should uphold for the honour and interest of the nation, and which he sometimes upholds with great inconvenience to himself. Therefore, Sir, I doubt whether it be expedient to make an entire separation of the expense of every public office from the Civil List, and to hold out to the people in a separate sum, the charge which they pay for the monarchy. I say it is a question rather of feeling, or at most of expediency, than of public economy. I believe that every man of intelligence in the kingdom is aware, that the Civil List does not merely include the personal expenses of the monarch, but that it also provides for other branches of the public service. I cannot suppose that we should either dispel illusion, or give satisfaction by the separation proposed. Even the advantages which are represented as likely to be attained by that arrangement do not seem to me of such importance as to counterbalance the inconveniences which would result from it. However, as this seems to me to be a question for the consideration of the committee—whether it be a mere Committee of Supply, or a committee of more extended powers, such as the noble Lord (Althorp) has proposed—for that opportunity I shall reserve the further explanation of my view of this question.

Mr. Brougham having explained,—

Sir Robert Peel again rose, and said that, when the hon. and learned member affirmed that a charge had been made against him, he seemed to forget that he had put them (the ministers) upon their defence, and that no charge had been brought against the hon. and learned member by him (Sir R. Peel), except in retort for a charge previously brought against himself. He had certainly dwelt upon one expression used by the learned gentleman, in which he had charged the ministers with gross ignorance. Throughout that discussion he had been altogether right, and the hon. and learned gentleman altogether wrong, notwithstanding the ingenuity with which he had endeavoured to support his construction of the passage in the King's speech alluded to. The revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall were never, he contended, understood to be comprehended in the phrase "hereditary revenues of the crown." In surrendering the hereditary revenues of the crown to the disposal of that House, his late Majesty King George IV., had used the expression, that he surrendered them "entirely," and his present Majesty had said the same thing in other words—namely, that he surrendered those revenues "without reserve." The difference was only in the phraseology—there was no difference of meaning. The words of his Majesty's speech were these:—"I place, without reserve, at your disposal, my interest in the hereditary revenues, and in those funds which may be derived from any droits of the Crown or Admiralty, from the West India duties," &c. &c. Now, he would ask if it were not clear that his Majesty would have enumerated the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall amongst the others, had he proposed to surrender them? (no, no!) As to the statement that Mr. Fox was only twelve years old when the question of the Civil List was discussed, the fact was, that Mr. Fox was in parliament when Mr. Burke brought forward the act by which the Civil List was divided into the different classes of expenditure which it contains at present; and when that bill was before the House, Mr. Fox did not dissent from the arrangement. The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) asked why the ministers did not correct the mistake respecting the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall. On the second evening he (Sir R. Peel) heard that mistake corrected by his right hon. friend near him. If the hon. and learned gentleman was not in the House on that occasion, perhaps he was attending to his duties elsewhere; but he (Sir R. Peel) was in the House, attending to his duty, when the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. D. W. Harvey) asked whether the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall were included in the surrender, and it was distinctly answered that they were not.

INCENDIARIES IN THE COUNTRY.

NOVEMBER 15, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reply to a question from Mr. H. Sumner, said, I can assure the hon. member, that four or five hours every day of my life are spent in endeavouring to discover the perpetrators of these atrocious crimes. I know that voluntary associations have been formed to establish watch and ward in many threatened situations; and I believe that nothing but extraordinary local vigilance will provide effectual security against these abominable offenders. No military force, no yeomanry force, can, I am afraid, defeat the wicked designs of men who have some ulterior object in view beyond the mere redress of a local evil: that I firmly believe. If any measure can be suggested, by forming local associations, or otherwise, for which the assistance of parliament or of government may be necessary, I shall be most happy to give it every possible consideration. I am perfectly certain that there is no plan, promising to be effectual, which this House would not cheerfully sanction in order to terminate a system so disgraceful. The House will not require me to disclose the measures I am adopting to detect the perpetrators—to do so would defeat the object itself. No expense, no exertion, on my part, has been spared, to bring these iniquitous persons to justice. If any difficulty should arise in forming voluntary associations, or in swearing in special constables, the House will, as I have said, be ready to sanction any mode of removing that difficulty, and I may add, for myself, that I will give any proposition my most willing attention.

Mr. Portman observed, that as the law stood at present, special constables might be sworn in by magistrates.

Sir Robert Peel referred to the statute of the 1st Geo. IV., which enabled magistrates to appoint special constables under certain circumstances. He did not know that it applied to cases where there was a mere apprehension of tumult.

In reply to Mr. Hume, Sir Robert Peel said—I deeply regret that the hon. member has connected two subjects which have not the most remote relation to each other—dissatisfaction with the government and the legal and acknowledged means of showing it—and this infamous system of destroying the property of unoffending individuals. I do not believe that he means what he has been stating; and I form that opinion of the construction of his words from communications he has himself made to me. I appeal to the House, whether it was for the hon. member to hold out even the shadow of a palliation for the late detestable proceedings, by arguing that the ministers are unpopular?

Mr. Hume:—I did not.

Sir Robert Peel:—The hon. member said, that the best law to put an end to them was to get rid of the ministers. Whatever he may do, I acquit those who feel dissatisfied with government of any participation in these infamous acts. I do not believe that there is a thinking man in the community, however opposed to government, who would participate in these excesses, and who would not join any confederacy to put an end to them. Whatever cause of dissatisfaction there may be, there is a clear distinction between that dissatisfaction, and outrage such as every man laments. The hon. member states truly, that voluntary associations have been formed in various situations, to take precautions against crimes of this nature: and I apprehend it will be found that magistrates are empowered, on any reasonable apprehension of meditated felony, to swear in special constables. I am, however, quite ready to consider any further suggestion, by a temporary law, to render that power more effectual. I earnestly recommend, from my experience, the utmost local and personal care; for I believe that these crimes have been frequently committed through the agency of one or two individuals of respectable appearance—so respectable as to disarm suspicion—unconnected with the parish or village where the fire takes place. Such has been the case in more situations than one; and I can suggest nothing but extreme local vigilance, and associations among the inhabitants, to protect their own property. I again repeat, that every measure it may be possible for me to adopt, without local knowledge, shall be adopted. I am prepared to consider any rational law, for any useful purpose.

Mr. Hume hoped the House would allow him to explain. The right hon. baronet had certainly mistaken or misrepresented what he had said. At least, nothing which had fallen from him could have been sufficient to excite much irritation.

Sir Robert Peel did not think that he misrepresented the hon. gentleman. But he must have greatly misunderstood him, if he (Mr. Hume) did not say that “no Act of Parliament which they could pass would have any effect in putting down the disaffection, unless it were accompanied by concessions.” * * * * * He disclaimed any intention to misrepresent the language of the hon. member for Middlesex, or to put a false or an unfair construction upon it. If the hon. gentleman wished the system of the incendiaries to be put down, he (Sir R. Peel) must say, that the observations of the hon. gentleman were but little calculated to effect that object, and were at least ill-timed.

In reply to Mr. H. Sumner, Sir Robert Peel said he believed, that some advantage might be gained by making publicly known what is the true state of the law upon that subject. By the Act of 1 Geo. IV., c. 27, for increasing the power of magistrates under certain circumstances, it was provided, "that in all cases where it should be made appear, upon the oath of five respectable householders, that any riot or other breach of the peace had taken place, or was likely to take place, the magistrates may, by precept in writing, call on any number of householders to act as special constables, whenever they, the magistrates, shall see fit and necessary; in which case it is competent to the justices at the sessions to order the expenses incurred by such appointment of constables to be paid by a rate upon the county." Now, according to that law, when the magistrates are satisfied that reasonable grounds exist for suspecting that incendiary acts are meditated, they are empowered to appoint constables, and charge the expenses to the county.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS.

NOVEMBER 16, 1830.

Alluding to the defeat of ministers last night, in the division of the Committee on the Civil List, upon an amendment proposed on Sir Henry Parnell's motion,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose and spoke as follows:—"Sir,—The deep and unfeigned respect which I owe to this House induces me to take the earliest possible opportunity of publicly stating, here in my place, that, in consequence of what occurred last night, I have felt it my duty to wait upon the king, and humbly and respectfully to inform his Majesty, that I perceive it is no longer in my power to undertake the administration of public affairs, so far as the administration of those affairs depends upon me, either with satisfaction to my own feelings, or with perfect advantage to the country. Sir, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept the resignation thus tendered on my part, and I have to inform the House, therefore, that I consider myself as holding the seals of the Home Department only until his Majesty shall have been enabled to appoint a successor to me in the office which I have resigned. The same, Sir, is the case with the other members of the government. They all consider themselves as holding their respective offices only until their successors shall be appointed.

Lord Althorp and Mr. Brougham having spoken,—

Sir Robert Peel said, I feel it necessary, in order to guard against misunderstanding, to trespass again for a few moments upon the attention of the House. I am not apprehensive of any thing I have said being misunderstood here: but in order to guard against any misapprehension going forth to the country, I may be allowed to notice one expression which fell from the noble lord (Althorp) opposite. I know very well what the noble lord meant, but out of doors the expression to which I allude may possibly be misconstrued. The noble lord said, "There is no longer any administration in existence." This is, no doubt, in effect true; but it ought to be generally known and understood, that until my successor is appointed, I am in full possession of the authority of the Secretary of State for the Home Department; and that I am quite prepared, if public necessity should require me, to exercise that authority to its utmost extent, being quite confident that I shall receive the support of this House and of the country if I exert that authority in any case in which the public welfare calls for the exertion of it.

Lord Althorp said, I assure the right hon. secretary that I did not misunderstand him. God forbid that I should have imputed to him any disposition to allow the public service to suffer injury in consequence of the changes which are about to take place. All I meant was, that under such circumstances, motions of so much importance as that of my hon. and learned friend, have never been discussed in parliament.

Sir Robert Peel said, my explanation was intended to prevent misconception out of doors. I was well aware that the noble lord had not misunderstood me.

DR. PHILLPOTTS, BISHOP OF EXETER.

NOVEMBER 17, 1830.

In reply to a question from Sir J. Graham, relating to the proposed election of the Rev. Dr. Phillpotts as bishop of the see of Exeter,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that his Majesty's pleasure had been taken respecting the issuing of the congé d'elire for the election of Dr. Phillpotts, before his Majesty's government had been dissolved, and before the notice to which the hon. baronet had referred had been given, and his Majesty's intentions had been notified, previous to the giving of that notice, to Dr. Phillpotts, respecting the living of Stanhope in commendam; the instruments for the congé d'elire had been accordingly completed; but no steps had been taken respecting the granting of the living of Stanhope in commendam, and no steps would be taken, until the consecration of Dr. Phillpotts had taken place. He should not feel himself justified in expediting the passing of any such instrument. He should not feel himself warranted in departing from the usual course, and therefore, until the consecration had taken place, he should not take any steps for the issuing of an instrument for the holding of the living in question in commendam. Probably his Majesty's government would be completed before that time, and he should not have the opportunity of taking any such step respecting such an instrument. At the same time, he would say, that with regard to any instrument upon which his Majesty's pleasure had been taken previous to the dissolution of the ministry, he should feel it his duty, as secretary of state, though holding the seals of office only pro tempore, to transmit to his Majesty such an instrument for his Majesty's signature. At the present moment, there were various instruments passing through the Home Office, respecting which his Majesty's pleasure had been already taken. This, however, he would state, for the satisfaction of the hon. baronet, that he might be assured that nothing would be done secretly respecting this; but that, in the event, which was very improbable, of his (Sir Robert Peel's) holding the seals of office when that instrument was to be made out, he should give him previous notice, and the fullest information which was necessary to enable him to bring that matter under the notice of the House. It was extremely improbable, as he had already said, that he should still hold the seals of office then. He could not promise that, in such an event, he would depart from the usual course; but he repeated, that he would give the hon. baronet notice before any step should be taken for making out the instrument. He was aware that any delay in the discussion of the hon. baronet's motion would be most disagreeable to the Bishop of Exeter, after the notice which had been given by the hon. Baronet. After that notice it would be most disagreeable to him if his friends in that House should not have an opportunity, as soon as possible, of stating the reasons upon which he grounded his defence.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

NOVEMBER 18, 1830.

On the bringing up of a petition by Sir Robert Wilson, from the parish of St. John, Southwark,—

Sir Robert Peel said, that if he had remained in office, and if any one had proposed that a select committee should be appointed to enquire into the efficiency of the police, and whether the charge for it could be reduced, he should not have had the slightest difficulty in acceding to such a proposition. He should, on the contrary, be most ready to acquiesce in it; not because the expense of the police had in the slightest degree shaken his conviction that it was absolutely necessary that some such force should exist for the preservation of the persons and property of the inhabitants of this great metropolis, but because he should be glad to be afforded the public opportunity of examining into every proceeding connected with the new establishment, its mode of appointment, its arrangement, the real amount of the expense which was incurred for it, and of having a comparison drawn, both on the score of expense and efficiency, between the present improved system of police and that which formerly existed. He should be glad to be afforded such an opportunity, for the purpose of doing away with the gross misrepresentations which had been spread abroad by interested persons on this subject. If, therefore, any such committee should have been proposed, he, for one, should have been most happy, if he had continued in office, to second the motion, as he felt convinced that the result of the evidence which would be produced before that committee, would be, to establish in every respect the great claims which the new police possessed upon the public approbation and confidence. People supposed that the sole object of the new police establishment in London, was to keep watch upon individual houses. Now no police, no matter how constituted, could do so effectually, if the individual inhabitants of such houses did not respectively exert themselves a little to protect their own property. It should be remembered, that within the last few months, in consequence of his Majesty's accession to the throne, there had been various public occasions,—such as reviews, and other public exhibitions,—upon which immense crowds of people had been assembled, and in all such instances the most perfect order had been maintained by means of the new police. It was obvious at once, that in a population such as existed in this metropolis of upwards of 1,200,000 persons, there should be some civil means for preserving order and regularity. If no such civil means existed, the only alternative would be the maintenance of an immense military force, and a corresponding increase in the army estimates and expenditure. If he had been rightly informed, the most perfect order and regularity had been maintained by the new police on the occasions to which he had alluded; and he had not heard, notwithstanding the immense number of persons that had been congregated on those occasions, that a single accident had occurred. He undoubtedly thought, that it might be made a question whether a portion of the charge for the police might not be fairly borne by the country at large. He believed that if the expense for the police had been limited to 6d. in the pound, they would not have heard a word about the unconstitutional nature of that force. He feared that it would be impossible to maintain the police establishment at a less charge than that now incurred for it; and if that charge was to continue to be defrayed by a local tax, it would be impossible to reduce it below 8d. in the pound. He must say, that when complaints were made of a charge of 2s. 6d. in the pound being imposed in consequence of the establishment of a local police, that such a charge was not countenanced by the law. The maximum charge was fixed by the Act at 8d. in the pound; and if the overseers of the different parishes asked the inhabitants to pay 2s. 6d. on account of the new police, he would tell them that the overseers had no legal authority to levy more than 8d. for that purpose. He knew that a great misunderstanding prevailed in the public on that subject, and he thought it right to say thus much with a view to remove it. He was afraid that the result of the labours of a committee, if the charge were still to be defrayed by local taxation, would not be to reduce its amount. He hoped that a committee, if one should be appointed, would enter minutely into every portion of the financial question with regard to this force—that it would consider the amount of the wages—the mode of forming the various corps; and that it would examine into the condition of every class of the police, and that it would consider whether it was possible to produce an efficient and respectable corps for less than the present charge. He did not think that such a force could be produced for a less charge; but if it could, and he had continued in office, no man would have been more ready to acquiesce in any suggestions from a committee to attain that object. The chief objection which had, in the first instance, been urged against the plan of the new police was, that the amount of salary was not such as would secure respectable persons to fill situations in it. A guinea a-week was the salary, subject to certain deductions for lodgings, and other matters. One great object in the formation of the new police establishment was, that having removed it from the power of the local authorities, Parliament might always have an opportunity of exercising its power of inspection over it, and that from time to time the various matters connected with it should come under the consideration of that House. He conceived that the period had hardly arrived for the institution of such an enquiry; but at the same time, if the excitement of the public mind was such as had been represented, let a committee be appointed, for he would maintain that, having taken away the local authority over the police, that House was bound to institute any enquiry which might be necessary on the subject. He would say, as secretary of state, that if the police force was not honestly managed and conducted, it would be a curse, instead of being an advantage, to the public. He was therefore of opinion that a parliamentary committee should from time to time be appointed on the subject, not with a view to throw any doubts upon the general efficiency of the new police, but for the purpose of seeing whether improvements might not be made in the efficiency and arrangement of that force. With regard to the recommendations of the parishes, they had been always properly attended to; he had shown no favour in the appointment, and he was sure that every gentleman in that House must know that he had not prostituted the appointments in the new police to any private purpose. The parishes should understand that they could recommend individuals who were qualified for the situation, and that their recommendations would be attended to, as well as those from any other quarter. But if the parishes were to recommend those they thought fit, and if there was to be no difficulty whatever in complying with their recommendation, the effect would be to give to the parishes a control over the appointment of the police, which it was the object of the act to take out of their hands. The effect would be to do away with all the benefits resulting from the new police establishment, and to do away with the arrangement of the whole metropolitan police being placed under the control of one head, upon which arrangement the efficiency of the present public establishment so entirely depended. At the same time he thought that there should be always a ready disposition on the part of that head to act in concert, and co-operate with the parish authorities.

Sir Robert Peel afterwards gave notice, that immediately after the Christmas recess he would move for the appointment of a select committee on the subject. He repeated, he would move for such a committee, not from any doubts which he entertained of the efficiency of the new police, but because he was anxious that the whole establishment should be examined.

Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Mr. Wyse, observed, that the hon. member was mistaken, since the expense of the constabulary force in Ireland was not supported by local taxation alone. A considerable part of the expense of that establishment was taken from the consolidated fund. He would now refer again for one moment to the expense of the new police establishment, in order to say, that by the terms of the act which he had introduced for the establishment of the new police, an account was to be laid before parliament, within thirty days of its assembling, of the real amount of the sums paid by each parish on account of the new police. That provision referred to the meeting of parliament after December; and therefore, when parliament did again assemble he should move for that account, with the view of showing that the sums stated to have been paid for the new police had not been really required for that purpose.

NEW MINISTRY.

NOVEMBER 22, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in reference to the hon. member's allusion to, and implied want of vigilance and promptitude in the late cabinet, with respect to the disturbances existing in some parts of the country, could only say, that every aid which it was possible for the counties in question to receive from the military force at the disposal of government, they had received; that every suggestion of the local magistracy—every suggestion calculated to stop the evil—had been adopted by the late government, which paid the most undivided attention to the case. Where parties locally interested co-operated with government—where the disposition towards disturbance had been promptly met by them—it was always suppressed. He had seen individuals, unsupported by any force, refuse to sign papers guaranteeing a reduction of rents and tithes, and he knew of no one case of personal violence having been offered to such individuals, who were uniformly successful in their resistance to such lawless demands. In all case of this nature the rioters had retired, threatening perhaps to return on a future day, but they did not. No doubt, if there was not a sufficient military and local force to support persons who acted thus, and repress disturbance, Parliament would be at least as much in fault as the late government, for having compelled ministers to adopt dangerous reductions. He repeated, every thing which it was possible to do had been done in the way of despatching detachments of the military, and sending portions of the police of the metropolis (although that was a body intended for other purposes), to aid the local force where the exigency called for such assistance. Every species of civil, military, and legal assistance had been promptly given to the local magistracy.

Sir Robert Peel afterwards, in reply to Mr. Baring, ventured to say, that if a proposal had been made by government last year to increase the military force of the country, in anticipation of disturbances such as now existed,—he ventured to say that the proposal would not have met the approbation of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member had said, the disorders might still be put down, and in this sentiment he quite agreed with the hon. gentleman. Indeed, he saw no reason for apprehension. He thought that, even without reference to a military force, the fact of every man that was menaced being, as was doubtless the case, prepared to fight in defence of his property, was sufficient without such an effort. If aggressions were met by a pusillanimous compliance, no military force would suffice to put down the disturbances. Every man who had landed property had dependents more or less numerous—let him arm them, and they would repel all aggression. A case had occurred in which this was done, and one hundred and fifty men put down a riot. Let others follow the example, and refuse to make concessions to tumultuous violence, and he would assure the hon. gentleman that there existed a military force sufficient (when thus aided) to put down the disturbances. But without that, all the military and civil force that could be brought to act—all the efforts of a Secretary of State—were as nothing. Indeed, it would be a perilous state of things if every thing depended upon the energy and sagacity of an individual sitting in an office at Whitehall. It would be impossible for a Secretary of State, or any other functionary, to act with advantage in such cases, unaided by the suggestions of the local magistracy.

SALARIES, PENSIONS, NATIONAL DISTRESS.

DECEMBER 6, 1830.

In a conversational discussion, originated by Mr. Waithman, relating to salaries, pensions, and national distress,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. George Robinson, said, he thought the hon. gentleman had shown, by his own observation, that such an enquiry as he had recommended would be vague and unsatisfactory. He had mentioned one topic on which he desired a special enquiry, namely, the operation of taxation in producing the general distress. For that he wanted a special committee. If a committee were appointed to enquire into the causes of the general distress, that cause would undergo investigation; and was he to be told that it would be possible for one committee to enquire into all the causes of distress? That one committee would have to enquire into the effect of the corn-laws—of the poor-laws—into the effect of taxation; and, after having enquired into the effects of all these things, it would have to find out remedies for the distress. If, however, a committee could be appointed to enquire into the subjects mentioned by the hon. member for Callington, he thought it would be beneficial. The time was come when it would be most expedient for the House to institute some enquiry into the state of the agricultural districts, and into the causes of the disturbances in the southern counties; and particularly into the practical operation and administration of the poor-laws. An enquiry, limited to the defects of the administration of those laws, might be most useful, and he would willingly go into it, without any reference to party or politics, but solely with a view to better the condition of the labouring classes. It was of great importance to get a few facts, so that the present condition of the labourer in some counties—in the weald of Kent and Sussex, for example—might be contrasted with his condition in other counties, under different physical circumstances, and with his condition in past times. He should like, also, to contrast the condition of the agricultural labourers in those districts where wages were paid out of the rates, and where roundsmen were common, with their condition in those districts where the wages of the labourers were wholly paid by the employer, and roundsmen were unknown. The practical operation of the two systems would then be accurately known, which would be of great use. He would enquire also into the influence of rents, and into their amount. At present, it was generally stated that high rents had contributed to the distress. That was not his opinion; but in the committee those who supported that opinion could be heard, and the landowners might have an opportunity of proving its incorrectness. The committee might enquire, too, into the probability of our population finding a vent in our colonies of North America. A gentleman, who had been sent thither to make enquiries into the quantity of land yet unappropriated, and into the best conditions of making grants, had lately returned, and he had made his report to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and a committee, having his information, might examine how far voluntary emigration might be looked to as a means of relief. If he only had complete information as to the present state of the agricultural labourers in two or three counties, and their condition in the same counties forty years ago, and some knowledge of their condition in other counties, he would not say that some remedy for the distress might not be devised; for he still remained of opinion, that a correct arrangement of a few prominent and leading facts was the best foundation for future measures. If he were placed in the committee, he should make it his object to devote his time to the enquiry; and the public time of public men could not be better employed than in investigating such a subject.

Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Sir E. Knatchbull, said he hoped it would be understood that he attributed the present condition of the agricultural classes to no particular persons, nor did he speak of it as caused by the fault of any body of men. He was afraid that the condition of the agricultural labourers had been gradually deteriorating for several years past, but he did not attribute that as a fault to any one class. He wished it also to be understood, that he had never once thought or said, that the deterioration in the condition of the agricultural labourers was caused by the conduct of the upper classes.

THE CIVIL LIST.

DECEMBER 7, 1830.

SIR ROBERT PEEL addressed himself to Lord Althorp across the table, and was understood to say, that as the order of the House had already been made for the appointment of a committee upon the civil list, his Majesty's ministers ought to move to rescind that order, and then to appoint another committee, as it would be very irregular and improper to keep the present committee in abeyance, merely upon a private understanding that the noble lord was preparing papers, and getting ready propositions to lay before it. He apprehended that another committee could not be appointed, nor could the subject, with propriety, be taken out of the hands of the present committee, unless the House first rescinded the order for its appointment.

In reply to some hostile animadversions by Mr. J. Wood, Sir Robert Peel arose, and, thus expressed himself:—Mr. Speaker, I never heard such a speech as that in my life. Is it for the hon. gentleman, because I chose to put a question to his Majesty's ministers on the course they mean to pursue, to lecture me?—Does the hon. gentleman consider himself entitled to lecture me, I say, upon throwing impediments in the way of his Majesty's government? Impediments!—what impediments have I thrown in the way of the noble lord? The noble lord may, perhaps, be perfectly reasonable, perfectly right in his wish, that government should have time to consider what civil list they will propose to the committee, and that the committee shall not meet until the proposition is ready to be made. But what I say is, that an order of the House is already made, that a select committee be appointed, and yet the noble lord says he shall not be prepared to make any proposal to that committee until after the Christmas recess; and therefore two months must elapse before the committee can sit with effect. If this be so, surely there ought to be some distinct proceeding on the part of the House to sanction the non-meeting of the committee. The hon. gentleman says, because I was against the appointment of that committee, I ought to be ready to acquiesce in the proposal of the noble lord. Sir, we are to consider the orders of the House, and not the sentiments of individuals. If the noble lord thinks that the committee ought not to meet till after the Christmas recess, this postponement should have the direct sanction of the House.

After some unimportant remarks from Lord Althorp, and one or two other members, the conversation dropped.

GRAND JURIES IN IRELAND.

DECEMBER 9, 1830.

In a debate upon certain resolutions, moved by Sir John Newport, on the subject of grand juries in Ireland,

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to make a few observations on the course of the proceeding rather than on the substance of the motion. The right hon. baronet had proposed five resolutions in detail, calling on the House to affirm several important matters. The House should be careful how it affirmed those matters; and he would therefore suggest that it would be better, before affirming those matters, that the House should see the resolutions in print, and have an opportunity of well considering the subject. He objected, then, to the course adopted by the right hon. baronet. The object of the resolutions was to declare that the lessee should not pay the cess, which should be paid by the lessor. He wished the House of Commons to declare that the occupier ought not to pay the assessment; but surely the interval between the House of Commons making that declaration and passing a bill to impose the payment on the other class, should be as short as possible. When the right hon. baronet remembered the agitated state of Ireland, he would himself see the propriety of not condemning one system, by a resolution of that House, before the legislature were prepared to establish another. His right hon. friend (Mr M. Fitzgerald) knew that he did not agree to all his views. He objected to establishing any board, whether under the government or not, to regulate local taxation. Local taxation should, he thought, be regulated by local authorities, which he preferred to any board. The object, he thought, should be to establish a local authority, but to place that authority under certain restrictions, and subject its acts to revision. Certainly he objected strongly to the present plan of allowing one individual to name all the members of these little parliaments, as the grand juries were called. All the objections to select vestries applied with great force to a body of twenty-three persons, selected by one individual. He wanted to see the people of Ireland take an interest in such institutions themselves, and he should like to see them establish, with certain checks, institutions for local expenditure, such as were in England. He did not wish to see the body to which this power was intrusted very numerous—it might nearly approach the number of an English grand jury. He wished next to separate the judicial power from the power of levying taxes. If twenty-three gentlemen asserted that a tax was necessary, or if they, as the taxing body, should feel objections to any tax proposed, he should not be disposed to prefer the decision of any other body, particularly if they were taken from the landowners, and the landowners were to be, as was proposed, the rate-payers. On this body, however, there ought to be a check. It should have the absolute power to levy taxes for useful works; but, to have an assurance against jobs, two means might be employed so as to ensure that the money was expended properly. He would give a veto to some Board on any project involving a large expense—such as several thousand pounds; and he would not allow the work to be done except by public contract. He knew no other body so likely as this to determine correctly what works were useful. Then there ought to be, on the part of the public authority, a power to compel the grand jury to give an account of all the money expended. He could not see in this case any objection to give such a power to the government; and he did not know why the treasurer of the county should not be called on to render an account of all the money he was authorized to expend. These were the great principles on which he would proceed. With respect to advancing money for public works—though he admitted that, in particular cases, it had been advantageous—he could not give his assent to it as a general system. To give £100,000 to relieve urgent distress might be necessary; but to employ the public funds to find employment for the people, was likely to stimulate population beyond its due proportion. It would interfere with the natural demand for labour; and, as the stimulus could not be continually and perpetually applied, it must end in a convulsion, and greater distress than it was intended to relieve. It could not confer a permanent benefit on the country. Moreover, to advance money on a great scale for carrying on public works, would not accord in any manner with the general financial system of this country. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman apologised to the House for the length of his remarks, and expressed a hope that they would not be considered as at all tending to undervalue the exertions of the right hon. baronet, or lessen the importance of the object he had in view.

Sir John Newport's resolutions were withdrawn.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES' COMMITTEE.

DECEMBER 10, 1830.

In a conversation respecting the select committee which had been appointed the preceding night, on the motion of Lord Althorp, for an enquiry into the salaries of public officers under the Crown—

SIR ROBERT PEEL admitted that the committee was very fairly formed. If individuals were not included who last night spoke in favour of reduction, it could only have been the result of chance, arising out of the manner in which the appointment of committees was ordinarily arranged. The subject to be considered was an exceedingly delicate one. It would be very difficult to say what would be a sufficient remuneration for a Prime Minister, or a leader in the House of Commons, without enquiring into the private circumstances of the individual. With reference to the circumstances in which he was placed, he could not help thinking that the object of this enquiry would be much better served by omitting him (Sir R. Peel) and his right hon. friend. They were placed in a more painful situation than if they even were subject to the influence of the government; because any honourable man in office would much rather agree to a reduction of his salary, than say that for many years he had been receiving more than the public ought to have paid. In his opinion, therefore, it would be more likely to afford satisfaction to the public, if those who had held office were merely called on to give their evidence. It would be much more agreeable to him to appear before the committee as a witness, than to sit on it as a judge; for if he gave his conscientious opinion that the salaries ought not to be lowered, it might be unjustly supposed that he was only vindicating the character and conduct of himself and of those who had been connected with him in office. If it were necessary that he should act on the committee, he would not shrink from the performance of his duty; but he thought it would be better to omit his name and that of his right hon. friend. He begged leave again to state his willingness to give all the information in his power to facilitate the enquiry; and to say, at the same time, that he thought the committee was very fairly framed.

PROCESSION OF THE TRADES TO ST. JAMES' PALACE.

DECEMBER 10, 1830.

In a discussion which commenced with Mr. Grove Price, respecting the large masses of the people which had accompanied the deputation from different trades, to present an address to his Majesty at St. James' Palace, a few days ago—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, there could be no doubt that a meeting such as that assembled the other day, for the purpose of going up with an address to the sovereign, was illegal. Such a meeting might be, as that was, quite peaceable, but still an actual tumult was not necessary in order to render it illegal. The mobs which assembled under Lord George Gordon, professed that they met for the most peaceable purposes; but, nevertheless, all the authorities of that day, and ever since, had no doubt that they were illegal assemblies. Indeed, it was impossible to consider that an assemblage of 10,000 or 20,000 persons round the doors of Parliament, in times of public calamity, or in a period of great excitement, should not have some undue control on their proceedings; and on this ground such assemblages, however peaceable their professed and even real object might be, were very wisely prohibited. With respect to the case before the House, he was very glad to find that Government looked upon it rather as an exception to the general rule than the rule; for undoubtedly, if such assemblages were to be permitted on the precedent of this, it might lead to serious evils, and certainly would cause very great public inconvenience. He owned he had heard now for the first time, but with great regret, that a tri-colored flag had been borne amongst the banners of that procession. He heard it with the more regret, as, from the communication that had been made to him by the deputation that had waited upon him before he went out of office, he had understood that nothing of this kind was contemplated. Three persons from the trades' societies had waited upon him, acquainting him with the circumstances to which the noble Lord (Althorp) had already alluded in his statement of what occurred before the noble lord now at the head of the Home Department. Those three individuals were not of any high rank in life; but he had received and treated them with a respect which he considered very justly due to the good sense and intelligence which they appeared to possess. They stated the disappointment experienced by the trades at the postponement of his Majesty's intended visit to the city, after the expensive preparations they had made in flags and banners to receive him, and they expressed a wish to be allowed to present their address at the levee. He said, there could be no objection to that course, but it must be with the clear understanding that not many of their body should come up with the deputation. On that understanding they went away; and he had no doubt that a similar understanding was entered into with the noble lord, his successor in office. As to the tri-colored flag, he would admit that, as the flag of a country whose change of government we had acknowledged, and with which we were in perfect amity, it could not be considered as the representative of any crimes which in former times had been committed under it; but, at the same time, he should wish, that in a procession got up to compliment the sovereign of this country, there should be no other flag introduced but our own national flags. He would have said the same last year, had the white flag been borne in any similar procession. Still he must hope that there was some mistake in this, and that a flag belonging to one of the trades, which were of various colours, was mistaken for the tri-color; for he owned he could not have expected, after what had passed between him and the leaders of this procession, that they would have sanctioned any thing of this kind.

Mr. Cornewall said, that he was in Pall-Mall on the day in question, and saw the whole procession pass. He could not tell why, but there had been an impression on his mind, while the procession was passing, that he should see the tri-colored flag among the banners; but it was not there; he could take upon himself to say, that there was no tri-colored flag, and he should be ready even to depose to that fact in a court of justice.

Sir Robert Peel was now more convinced that there must have been some mistake as to the flag being a tri-color; but even if it were, it would be unfair to fix upon it as the act of those who managed the procession. In an assembly of 10,000 persons, it was impossible to guard against the introduction of such a flag, by one or two; and it would therefore be unjust to charge it as the act of the whole.

After some remarks from Lord John Russell,—

Sir Robert Peel said he wished to be understood as not giving any opinion as to the policy of permitting this procession; but he would fully admit that, under the circumstances in which the knowledge of it had reached the noble lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, it would have been impolitic to proscribe the meeting. He had been long enough in office himself to know the cases of difficulty which often presented themselves to the Home Secretary, and he fully admitted the difficulty in which the noble lord was placed when he heard of the intended procession at so very short a period before the day that it was to take place. No doubt, if sufficient notice had been given, the noble lord would, as he ought, have prevented it; but with so little notice, and the preparations that had been made, it was, he admitted, acting with prudence to let it proceed undisturbed.

SLAVERY IN THE WEST INDIES.

DECEMBER 1, 1830.

In a discussion which arose on the presentation of a petition by the Marquis of Chandos, from the West India Planters, and others interested in property in the West Indies,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was impossible to overrate the enormous difficulties of the question presented to the House, or to avoid feeling how much danger there was in the discussion, and how much mischief might be produced by the use of hasty and unguarded expressions. He thought the House could not be too cautious in this respect, and he implored the members to abstain from any language of recrimination or exaggeration, and from raising expectations in the minds of the black population of the colonies which must prove eventually beyond their power to realize. What was at that moment passing in every part of the world must teach them the danger of tampering with such subjects, and he conjured them to take care that, while they were extending instruction, they did not also give expectations of speedy benefits which it would not be in their power to confer, and raise expectations of advantages which would prove wholly illusory. He was sorry to observe that the hon. member for Weymouth (Mr. F. Buxton) had made use of expressions totally at variance with those of the hon. and learned member for Calne (Mr. Macaulay). The hon. member had told them, that there was a third party, independent of the government, and independent of the slave or of his master, whose interests and wishes must be consulted, and who had a right to be heard by the legislature, and a claim on its attention, which could not be postponed. If, therefore, they were prepared to postpone the final settlement for a single day, the effects might be mischievous under such circumstances. Unless they were prepared to dissolve the traffic in this living merchandise on the instant—and who could say that they were?—he entreated them to be cautious of making use of expressions which could only irritate the passions, and might lead to incalculable mischief. Could any man, however, who listened to the speeches of the hon. member for Weymouth, close his eyes to the difficulties of the question? The hon. member for Calne admitted in the fullest manner that there must be compensation made to the planters. If their claim to compensation were admitted, what was to be its amount? Was the country to recompense the owner for the direct loss he would sustain in his slave, or from the consequential loss he must suffer in his property and plantations? These were grave and serious questions to be decided before they came to the point of emancipation; and then, supposing that eighty millions would be required for the purpose, were they prepared at once to demand that sum from the people of this country? Supposing, however, that emancipation was determined, and that compensation was to be granted, what security had they that the colonies would not be involved, before they could carry it into effect, in a general conflagration? Did they consider the consequences of suddenly making such an alteration in the existing state of society? Could they, when the slave was emancipated, secure the control of the planter over him as a freeman? When the planter received compensation for his property, all desire to remain in the colony—all stimulus to watch over its interests, would be taken away from him. The aristocracy—if he might make use of such an expression—would leave the colony, having no inducement to remain. There would be no link by which society could be held together—there would be no magistracy—no power by which wrong was to be punished, or right secured; and the colonies would present a scene of civil war, and a succession of barbarous conflicts, unmitigated by any of those checks which, in the civilized portion of the world, were found to soften the horrors of the fiercest party hostility.

These were a portion of the evils which might flow from an indulgence of intemperance of expression, or from a too hasty compliance with the claims of the abolitionists. He only entreated them to pause until they could fairly approach the evils which they all ardently desired to see mitigated, but which never could be effectually dealt with, unless they looked not more at the pecuniary rights of individuals, than at that which was of even much greater importance—the permanent welfare of the slave.

Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Mr. O'Connell, protested against the consequences which must arise from the proposition of the hon. gentleman. If a bill were brought down conferring immediate freedom upon those who should hereafter be born, what would be the feelings of those who now lived in slavery, and what would be the evil to the colonies? But he did not mean to deny that every effort ought to be made for the amelioration of the system. Slave-evidence ought undoubtedly to be received, he would not say for the benefit of the slaves, but for the interests of the country, as well as of humanity; some other amendments were equally called for.

The petition to lie on the table.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM.

DECEMBER 14, 1830.

In the debate upon Mr. Littleton's motion for leave to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the payment of Wages in Goods,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he meant to support the bill of the hon. member for Staffordshire; but in no stage of it would he consent to a committee of enquiry. The bill was, perhaps, opposed to the rigid rules of political economy. The rules of that science had reference to the production of wealth in a nation, but he must enquire what effect the application of them, in a given case, was likely to have on the morals of a country. Now, if it were shown to him that the application of those rules added to the stock of wealth, but tended, at the same time, to the destruction of morals amongst the people, he certainly, to preserve those morals pure, would overlook and throw aside the principles of political economy. They had established, amongst the greatest improvements in science, a standard of money, by which the value of different commodities was to be obtained. Now, the only commodity over which the poor man had any command was his labour. That being the case, then, he had a right to enquire whether, in giving up that labour, the bargain made with the poor man was a free, just, and equitable one. Supposing that the transaction was not a fair one on the part of the master, he would ask, where was the poor man's remedy? If the poor man were to be paid in money, then it was easy for the magistrate to decide, if a complaint were made to him. If the poor man had stipulated for 2s. and got only 1s. 6d., it was evident that the magistrate could grant redress. But if the labourer agreed to take a certain quantity of goods for his debt, in that case he had no legal remedy by which he could recover the price of his labour, because it then became a question of quality, and not merely of quantity. If the quality be deteriorated, and the quantity was not curtailed, there was no mode by which the poor man could legally enforce justice. On these few, simple, and tangible grounds, he should vote for the bill of the hon. member for Staffordshire. He was favourable to the payment of wages in money, because it encouraged feelings of sobriety and independence. He wished the poor man to have an opportunity of laying by a little money for old age, as a portion for a daughter, or a provision for his widow. This could not be done where the truck system prevailed, and men were paid, not in money, but with bad butter, or bad cheese, which they were obliged to sell at a ruinous loss.

The motion was agreed to, on a division, by 167 against 27; majority, 140.

EVESHAM ELECTION.

DECEMBER 16, 1830.

The Marquis of Chandos having moved, that the Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a supersedeas to the writ that had been issued for the election of two members for the borough of Evesham, a debate arose,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Lord John Russell, said he admitted that the noble lord had placed the question fairly before the House, and had discussed it with that same candour which always distinguished his parliamentary conduct; and he felt confident, from the candour of the noble lord, that he should convince the noble lord that a supersedeas of the writ ought to take place. He agreed with the noble lord, that the considerations urged by the hon. member for Blechingly should be put out of the question. The House ought not to allow any decision as to the general question of Reform, nor any discussion as to what was to be done, if the borough were disfranchised, to interfere with the present motion. The question was, whether the House had evidence before it sufficient to prevent the issuing of the writ, and whether they should call upon the people who had been corrupt at the last election to send two other members to that House? That was the single question before the House, and the objections urged to it were threefold:—first, there was the objection of the hon. member for Staffordshire, that to suspend the issue of the writ would have a tendency to interfere with the provisions of the Grenville Act, and diminish the power of Election Committees. That argument had no foundation. The election committee had chiefly to decide between the sitting members and the candidates; and, as far as they were concerned, the decision of the committee was final. If the House were to interfere with the suspension of the writ, that would not be dealing with the decision of the election committee. The report of that committee related to the sitting members, Lord Kennedy and Sir Charles Cockerell; but the committee had also made a special report, as the noble lord had stated. The ordinary report was, that Lord Kennedy and Sir Charles Cockerell were not duly elected. That was the ordinary report, on which their exclusion was founded. Appended to that, however, was another report, which stated that Sir Charles Cockerell, or his agent, had been guilty of bribery, and that several of the electors had suffered themselves to be bribed. That was the special report. The Grenville Act did not make the special report binding on the House; but it said, that if the committee which is appointed to determine the rights of sitting members shall instruct its chairman to make a special report to the House, the House may conform to or disagree from the resolution of the committee, and make such an order as it liked. If the House adopted any order, or refused to adopt it, contained in any special report, it would only be acting in conformity with the principle laid down by the House of Commons; and, therefore, he considered the objection of the hon. member of no force. The next argument was that of the noble lord, who had referred to precedents, but stated, in which he agreed, that these precedents, though generally founded in reason, were not to be slavishly followed. He would put it to the noble lord, if the precedents he should quote would not make the noble lord admit that the writ ought not to issue. Two precedents might be referred to—those of Penryn and Camelford. In the Penryn case, the special report stated, that John Goodeve, Henry Durnsford, and Abraham Winn, had been guilty of corrupt practices, and Henry Parker, and several other electors, had received bribes to induce them to give their votes. There was no imputation of general corruption. There were three persons accused of attempting bribery; and eight others accused of receiving bribes! and it was thought by the House of Commons, that it was sufficient to justify suspending the writ that only eight persons had been guilty of bribery; that was the Penryn precedent. In the case of Evesham, though there was no special report, it was stated that twenty-two persons received bribes. If in Penryn there were only eight persons bribed, and if, as it could not be doubted, that twenty-two were bribed in Evesham, ought the House not to conclude that the issuing of the writ ought to be suspended in the case of Evesham as in the case of Penryn? The House should consider that the motion was not to suspend the writ indefinitely, but only till the evidence should be laid before the House. Would it be decent even, to give those who had been guilty of corrupt practices the power to renew them, till the House had read the evidence. In the case of Camelford, what was the special report? That John Stewart had acted in a corrupt manner, and been guilty of bribery, and was incapable of sitting; and that John Rounsevel, and four other electors, had corruptly endeavoured to procure the return of two members to serve in Parliament for Camelford. In this case there were only five voters corrupt, and yet the House of Commons suspended the writ. There was no general allegation of corruption. Here, then, were two precedents of suspending the issue of the writ—clear cases; and would not the House, therefore, suspend issuing the writ for Evesham, in which twenty-two voters had been guilty of corrupt practices, and had accepted bribes, only till the House had read the evidence? The noble lord must see, that the precedents were not in his favour, and were in favour of withholding the writ. If the noble lord would reject precedents, and try the case by the principles of common sense and reason, he would probably come to the conclusion, that the writ ought not to be issued. Could there, in fact, be any doubt on the subject? One hon. gentleman had stated, that corruption had been the inveterate practice of the borough for fifty years. In his opinion, among the out-voters the practice was general. They had the testimony, too, of an hon. member, who had stated, that he had relinquished his connexion with the borough, because he could not conscientiously consent to the demands for bribes made on him. That was in evidence before the House; and did not, then, good sense and reason say, that the writ ought to be suspended till the House could institute a full enquiry into all the circumstances? Was it, in fact, possible to hesitate under such circumstances? The hon. gentleman indeed said, let the House consider that we have now an administration pledged to reform, and let it leave to that the task of enquiring. Admitting that we have such an administration, he must deny that the government was competent to enquire into all the peculiarities of resident and out-voters. Was it fit that the House should delegate to the ministers the propriety of deciding the elective franchise of this borough, and of determining, to use a phrase of the hon. member, which he had well remarked and remembered, on the propriety of excising the borough itself? If it were to be done, let it be done by an enquiry instituted at that bar, and not done by a private enquiry instituted by his Majesty's ministers. The government was not fit to institute such an enquiry—it could not receive evidence, and he did not know any plan more likely to be productive of injustice to the parties, than for the government to undertake the enquiry. On the ground, then, of the Grenville Act—on the score of precedents, and on the principles of good sense, and reason, and justice, it would be wise to order a suspension of the writ till the evidence should be before the House. With reference to the new-born zeal with which the hon. and learned gentleman taunted him, he must state, he was not obnoxious to the hon. and learned gentleman's remarks. The hon. and learned gentleman's motion was not opposed by him; on the contrary, he supported that motion, and was satisfied with much less evidence than others, in the cases both of Penryn and East Retford, that the writ ought not to issue. He had always contended that the franchise was given for a public purpose, and that the House had a right to dispose of it when that would benefit the public. He had taken no part in any former debate that should preclude him, on any fit occasion, from transferring a franchise from a corrupt borough to Birmingham or any other large unrepresented town. In the Penryn case, he had been willing to transfer that franchise to Manchester. Upon the former occasion he had been asked what course he would pursue in any future case of delinquency on the part of a borough. He had declined to answer that question, declaring that he would act on every occasion as the circumstances of the case required. He had reserved himself at full liberty to give the franchise to great towns on any fitting occasion. He was not, however, disposed to enter into the general question. He would only ask, whether it would be wise, after the allegation which had been made by the members of the committee, to intrust again the franchise to a borough which had abused it? He did not call on the House to decide that it should not be intrusted—that was not the question—but to decide that it would not give the trust till it had seen the evidence.

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

LEGAL APPOINTMENTS IN IRELAND.

DECEMBER 20, 1830.

In a discussion which arose upon the subject of the removal from office of the Under Secretary of State for Ireland,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that in what he was about to say, and he meant to advert to most of the topics which had that evening been brought before them, he would avoid any reference to party. Indeed, he would not have spoken at all, had there not been a kind of personal appeal to him. In the first place, with reference to the dismissal of Mr. Gregory, he must beg to bear his strong testimony to that gentleman's merits; and he was bound to say, that whatever might be Mr. Gregory's political opinions, he (Sir R. Peel) was perfectly convinced that that gentleman would not withhold that cordial assistance which it was his duty to render to those who were at the head of his department, whatever might be their political conduct. Mr. Gregory, however, like other meritorious public servants, had been the victim of the calumnious press of Ireland. It was well known, that whatever might be the tenor of any man's conduct in that country, he became obnoxious to the severest censure from the press. Be his opinions what they might, he could not escape. He believed that all the attacks which had been made upon Mr. Gregory were unfounded. He believed that that gentleman was incapable of being swayed in his public duty by his political feelings. A man of greater integrity and honour in private life he had never met with. He was bound, however, to admit the soundness of the statement of the right hon. member for Waterford, that those who were responsible for the conduct of the government, should be entitled to choose their own auxiliaries. No doubt, after thirty years' service, Mr. Gregory was entitled to retire. The zeal as well as the length of his services, entitled him to grateful consideration; and he hoped, that no pledge which his Majesty's government had given of retrenchment, would prevent them from taking a just and liberal view of Mr. Gregory's claims. The right hon. baronet had commented on what had fallen from his (Sir R. Peel's) right hon. friend near him (Mr. G. Dawson), respecting the retirement of the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. It was true that his right hon. friend had spoken of that learned judge as "being bribed into retirement"—but what he had meant was, that his services, and the growing infirmities of years, had entitled him to retire, and to an allowance, on the appointment of his successor, but that a promotion of rank had been unnecessarily added. The right hon. baronet was correct as to the Chief Baron's character having been untainted by the investigation which his conduct in a certain instance had given rise to in that House; and he was one of those who concurred with the decision of the House on the matter. When the subject of that learned person's conduct was before the House, he (Sir R. Peel) was in a position which enabled him to examine the circumstances of the case; and, with all due jealousy for the purity of the judicial character, he could not attribute to him any undue motives. He begged to offer a few words of warning and exhortation to the right hon. gentlemen opposite on this point. The next point he would allude to was the implied blame of the present ministers on the late ministry, for not having done as much as they promised to effect. The late government had been denounced as a government indifferent to the wants and feelings of the people, and indisposed to that rigid economy which the necessities of the times required. In fact, however, it had done a great deal towards relieving the burthens of the people. But he would ask the right hon. gentlemen opposite, whether, short as was their experience in office, that experience did not convince them that there existed many more difficulties between them and their wishes, on the score of retrenchment and economy, than they were at all prepared to expect?—whether, in fact, it were not a very different thing, out of office to recommend certain popular measures, and carry them into effect when in office? Without wishing to blame ministers for their declarations, he would say, that he drew this inference from them—namely, that they would, ere long, perceive that they had been too precipitate in pledging themselves to effect reforms and retrenchments which they would find themselves unable fully to realize. With respect to the appointment of Lord Plunkett, he willingly admitted that Lord Plunkett was perfectly qualified for the situation of Lord Chancellor of Ireland; but by the circumstances of his appointment, his Majesty's present ministers had subjected the country to an expense which his Majesty's late ministers had avoided. If the conduct of the late administration with respect to the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland were recollected, it would be evident, that at least they were not so regardless of considerations of public economy as had been imputed to them. Sir Anthony Hart was appointed Lord Chancellor of Ireland by Mr. Canning. When the Duke of Wellington came into power, however, he did not remove Sir Anthony Hart, for the purpose of appointing some individual more favourable to his political opinions. Even after the Catholic question had been carried, the Duke of Wellington acquiesced in the continuance of Sir Anthony Hart in the office of Lord Chancellor, and thereby spared the public the expense of his retiring allowance. The right hon. baronet opposite said, that the office of Lord Chancellor in Ireland was necessarily a political office—that it was so in England, and that it was so in Ireland. Although he would not lay down a general rule on the subject, he could not agree with the right hon. baronet, that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland must be a political character. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland was placed in a situation different from that of the Lord Chancellor of England. The latter was ex officio a minister of state, a member of the cabinet, and exercised great influence: the former was not the political adviser of the Crown. He undoubtedly performed some political acts; chiefly the recommendation of magistrates; but he was not the political adviser of the Lord-lieutenant. He was sometimes called in, on great emergencies, to aid the counsel of the Chief Secretary, who was the civil adviser, and of the Attorney and Solicitor generals, who were the legal advisers, of the Lord-lieutenant. He mentioned this, not by way of hostility to the appointment of Lord Plunkett, but to set the right hon. baronet right as to the nature of the office of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Indeed, as a general rule, ministers could not take too much pains to keep the judicial authorities of the state separate from political interference; and the truth was, that the less the Lord Chancellor of Ireland interfered with politics, the better. He had stated on a former occasion, that the people must not be too vehement in their expectations of the retrenchment which any government, however disposed, could effect. The time was come when the relative claims of public servants on that point would be judged. The right hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham), when he had less experience on the subject than at present, spoke of the indisposition of the Duke of Wellington to retrench to the extent necessary for the public good; now he (Sir Robert Peel) would honestly and frankly, but boldly assert, that no member of any administration had ever been more sincerely desirous of true economy than the Duke of Wellington; and that few members of any administration had ever enjoyed equal advantages for enforcing the execution of his wishes. He allowed that the present administration had reduced the offices of Vice-treasurer of Ireland, of Lieutenant-general of the Ordnance, and of the treasurer of the Navy. [It was here intimated to the right hon. baronet, that the last office was not abolished—that its salary only was saved by its duties being performed by the Vice-president of the Board of Trade]. Well, the salary was saved, but that was a species of popularity easy of attainment, and in which they might find themselves very soon excelled. He would not enter into the question as to which administration had abolished the office of Postmaster-general of Ireland; but he would affirm, that it was the intention of the Duke of Wellington to abolish that office. He attached, however, but little importance to the abolition of one or two offices, and if the present ministers did, could they think that what they had already done would be considered sufficient? Would it not be very easy for any body to outbid them for popularity? Would it not be very easy for any man, with more extravagant views of what was practicable than those of the right hon. baronet and his friends, to say to the people—"I will carry on the public service on cheaper terms: I will abolish the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; I will abolish the office of Lord Privy Seal; I will abolish the office of Paymaster of the Army?" Would he (Sir R. Peel) join in countenancing any such declaration? Certainly not; because he knew the impossibility of carrying it into effect. Did they not feel that the efficient strength of the government for the conduct of public business was not sufficient; and although they might wish to secure to every man throughout the country the full reward of his labours, did they not feel it was but a delusion to hold out to the country at large the expectation of any extensive reduction in the expenses of the government; at least, that any such extensive reduction was inconsistent with the means of properly conducting the public business, considered not with reference to the individuals concerned, but with reference to the discharge of public affairs? He said with them, let every office that was not absolutely necessary be cut down—let them dispense with all those places with which they could dispense; but he hoped that no attempt to catch the shadow of a fleeting popularity would induce the government to waste its proper strength. The question, after all, became one as to the merits of the late government, and must be decided when they could properly see whether the condemnation pronounced against that government, on the ground that it had not sufficiently diminished the public expenditure, was well founded. [Sir J. Graham nodded assent.] If the right hon. baronet could, as by that applauding motion of his head he seemed to intimate, show that much greater reductions than those made by the late government were practicable, no man would be more delighted than he (Sir R. Peel) at such a circumstance. It would certainly prove, that the late government might have done more; and over the advantages which would be obtained by the country he should heartily rejoice, though he must at the same time share in the condemnation of not having before conferred them. He would only caution his right hon. friends, in the most friendly spirit, not to pledge themselves too hastily to a sweeping retrenchment, before they had examined all the details of the offices with which they were connected—not to promise that reduction of salaries which they might afterwards find would weaken the public services, and not to encourage the public too much in expecting that diminution of offices which might afterwards be found inconsistent with the safety of the country. The present ministers had pledged themselves to reform, to economy, and to the maintenance of peace. With respect to reform, that was not the time to say any thing about it. The measure was one of too much importance to be introduced incidentally into discussions of that kind. He would however say, that he trusted that the declaration of his Majesty's prime minister, that no measure of reform not consistent with the maintenance of existing institutions should be introduced, would be strictly adhered to. With respect to retrenchment, that must be the profession of all governments—it was so of the present—it had been so of the last; and though members in opposition might find fault with the continuance of this or that office, it was his firm belief that not five years would elapse without the conviction arising in the public mind that these professions had been fulfilled by the Duke of Wellington's government. With respect to the maintenance of peace, though it was a popular topic, he was sorry to hear the present ministers state it, as a distinguishing mark of policy, that they were determined, at all hazards, to maintain peace. Of course every government must wish to preserve peace. The late government had always stated that to be its wish, and there was no government but what did so; it declared that it would leave no effort untried, consistent with the honour of the country, to preserve peace. No man felt more than he did the immorality of war, and the necessity of avoiding the rekindling of its flames—no man was more deeply convinced than he was, that this country was interested in making peace—but peace was not always the only question; it was not always to be obtained or preserved at the wish of the government, and he doubted the policy of too strong and determined a declaration, that at any hazard the ministers of this country would preserve peace. He knew that the explanation of this was, that they would do all they could to maintain peace, but that explanation brought the matter back to what was said by every government. All he complained of was, that when the government of the Duke of Wellington, which was essentially pacific, had confined its declarations to the limit of maintaining peace to the utmost extent, consistently with the honour of this country, the present ministers should have put it forward prominently, as one of their principles of government which was to distinguish them from the late ministry, that they would maintain peace at all hazards. He concurred with them in thinking that every effort, consistent with the honour of the country, should be made for the preservation of peace; but let not the expressions of their determination to preserve it at all events, be too strong; for the interests of this country, or circumstances, which at this moment it was impossible to foresee, might compel them to change their determination; and those circumstances might possibly be created by too strong a manifestation of their wish to preserve peace. He called on them to show, as the late government had done, that in the event of there being a necessity for resorting to arms, they would at once take up arms. He called on them not only to show this, but their conviction also that, in the event of such a necessity, they could repose with confidence on the belief that the ancient spirit of the country would rally round the government, and carry on with courage, with vigour, and effect, that contest which their judgment had declared to be inevitable. The right hon. baronet had complained of the course pursued by his (Sir Robert Peel's) right hon. friend, as intended to obstruct the proceedings of the government. He denied that such conduct could be justly imputed to his right hon. friend. The right hon. baronet supposed that that course of conduct proceeded from pique at the loss of office. For himself, he could assure the House, that so far as place was concerned, if he never returned to it he should not consider it a misfortune; and that if he ever should be recalled to office, so far as his personal feelings alone were concerned, he should feel it little less than a great calamity. Having said so much with respect to the points on which he could not concur with the present government, he was happy to be able to express his full concurrence with them in one matter of great importance: he was pleased, much pleased, with the declarations they had made, that they would support, at all hazards, the Legislative Union of England and Ireland. He suggested to the right hon. baronet, and to the other advisers of the crown, whether, if those who agitated this question, but were determined not to bring it forward, since they avoided discussion, for the purpose of continuing agitation—he suggested, he said, to the present ministers, whether it would not be better to place on record the opinion of that House—to move a resolution declaratory of the opinion of the legislature? Those who thought that the union ought to be dissolved, ought to submit the question, not to popular agitation in Ireland, but to the deliberation and sanction of those branches of the legislature which were, and ought to be, the sole tribunals for deciding it. He hoped that the young members of that House, the gentlemen who, as Catholic members, now for the first time sat amongst them, would show that, whatever distinctions might have once existed—whatever matters might have once created division—the most heartfelt cordiality united them in preserving that important union. He would gladly sacrifice the office and power he had once enjoyed, if the present ministry, more than the last, could secure the declaration of parliament, that England and Ireland should share their fortunes in peace; and if war were unavoidable, that they would fight united together, and by their union attain that triumphant success which they could not hope to enjoy if they were divided. He hoped, too, that out of doors the people would not be misled by the declamation of affected patriots. He hoped that before the inhabitants of Dublin could be induced to follow the example of Belgium and Paris, they would well consider whether they had the same justifiable cause of opposition to the government; and even when they had settled that point, he trusted that they would well consider what was the present condition of those countries in which revolutions had taken place, and compare it with the state in which they were before the revolutions had begun. In saying that, it was not necessary to call in question the justice of the resistance these people had offered to their late governments, it was not necessary for him (and indeed no circumstance could induce him to do it) to palliate the conduct of those governments; but although the resistance was justifiable, he had a right to enquire whether revolution were not a great evil: and when he looked to the condition of France and of Paris, and particularly to the condition of the working classes, he could not help thinking he was justified even in believing, though resistance might be justifiable, that it involved those who engaged in it in almost irremediable ruin. He called on the House to compare the state of the public funds in France with their state before the revolution. The resistance was right; it had been successful; the most popular men were in office; yet how was it that property was deemed insecure, that employment was almost at an end; that industry was paralysed; that strangers were withdrawing from the country, and that the condition of the lower classes was infinitely worse than it was before the revolution? If it were so, as he believed it was, then he asserted it to be true, that great changes in any government could not take place without exciting alarm and despondency, and without materially and injuriously influencing property in the country in which the revolution took place. He called on the House—he called on all people of property—to be fully aware of the mistake they would be committing, in dividing this country and Ireland, and to be aware of the irreparable evils that must result to both from such a measure. All people of property were interested in this question, and on them he called for a calm, considerate, and full attention to this subject. In what he had said, he had not any intention to stop the course of fair economy, but it was impossible to read the public press of this country, and to see its appeals to the passions of the people, without knowing that while economy was put forward as the avowed object, the covert design was, to degrade and lower all the constituted authorities of the country, and to secure for public writers that power and authority which would be denied them under all other circumstances. To gain that end they were willing to create tumult and confusion, and to subject this country to the worst and most degrading of tyrannies—the tyranny of an ungovernable mob.

Mr. Hume thought the discussion now introduced had been most unnecessarily commenced, and he entered his protest against the mode adopted by the right hon. gentleman to prejudice the minds of the government and of that House against the adoption of measures of reform and retrenchment.

Sir Robert Peel said, he had not the slightest intention to create any prejudice against reform or retrenchment, both of which he should be happy to see effected, provided they did not injure existing institutions.

Subsequently, and again in reply to Mr. Hume, Sir Robert Peel observed, that he had not condemned the French—he had said that they had no alternative but resistance, and had only observed, that lawful as was the resistance, it was still unfortunately true that the revolution thus occasioned, though successful, had been productive of much misery.

On the 20th of December, in an adjourned debate on the Court of Chancery, the House was counted out, and adjourned for the holidays.

UNION WITH IRELAND.—PROCLAMATIONS OF THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

FEBRUARY 8, 1831.

Mr. O'Gorman Mahon, the hon. member for Clare, concluded a speech, in the course of which he had repeatedly been called to order, by moving, "That there be laid before the House copies of the Proclamations issued by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland since the passing of the Act against Unlawful Assemblies; also, a copy of the letter of the present Chief Secretary, to the Magistrates."

In the debate which followed, SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Lord Althorp and Mr. Leader, said he regretted very much that a discussion had been brought on, which would have been much better reserved; but as the necessity had been imposed on him, to take part in that which he could have gladly avoided, in the absence of the hon. member for Waterford, whose character was involved, and whose situation was concerned in the question then agitated; but since the time was come for the discussion, it became every man who took a lead in the discussions of that House, to declare that he had irrevocably made up his mind to stand by the executive government, and maintain the legislative union between the two countries, and prevent the dismemberment of them at all hazards. This was that domestic concern which was now of paramount importance. He should be ashamed of himself if he did not cast into utter oblivion all party political feelings which might have existed between himself and the right hon. gentleman opposite; he should be ashamed of himself if he did not cast them aside, and without hesitation express a steady determination, by all the means in his power, to support the king's ministers in all extremities of maintaining inviolate the union with Ireland. He would support them in their proceedings, and should they make any little slips, and he did not say that they had made any, he would put the best construction on their conduct; and give them credit for their good intention, should they be driven to any harsh measures to meet the evasions and artifices of the declarations of the hon. member for Waterford.

The House could well conceive the difficulty under which the declarations of that hon. member placed the ministers; but it was the duty of government, even at the risk of the dreadful extremity to which the noble lord had alluded, even at the hazard of civil war, to prevent the dismemberment of the empire. If the union with Ireland were severed, if the feelings of independence were encouraged in Ireland, why not in Scotland, why not in Wales, and why not break up the empire altogether? It was to him perfectly clear, that should the Union be dissolved, the empire could not be preserved: the union was necessary, therefore, to preserve the empire, and if it could not be preserved but by force, the government was authorized to use force. If there were a difficulty in maintaining this union—if the government were, as it ought to be, resolved to maintain it, the government would be to blame if it did not first employ every legal means, however severe—every authority it had received from parliament, however much the late ministers might have been blamed for procuring that authority; the government, he said, would be highly blameable if it did not first employ every legal and authorized means in order to avoid the necessity of having recourse to that dreadful alternative, suppressing the agitation by force of arms. If the laws were unable to stay the progress of those who desired the repeal of the union, still the government would be highly to blame, should it afterwards dye the scaffold, or the plains of Ireland, with blood, if it did not first try all the existing authority of the laws. The hon. gentleman who spoke last deprecated the proclamation which had prevented the meeting of the trades; but that meeting must not be taken by itself. The hon. member must conjoin it with the declarations made by the hon. member for Waterford, who had signified his fixed intention to try the question of enforcing the proclamation, and who had distinctly declared, that when the opportunity came, physical force should be employed to sever the Union. The government, then, he contended, had no alternative, and it was mercy as well as good policy to resolve by law to interdict the first meeting of the people. The noble lord had referred to the constitution of Ireland between 1782 and 1800; but he called on the House not to deceive themselves by supposing that, by the repeal of the Union now, they could place the two countries in the same situation as they were in before 1800. It was not after the Union that the two countries could be placed in the same situation as if no Union had taken place. After a divorce the feelings were not the same as before marriage. "Oh, Sir!" exclaimed the right hon. baronet, "let us not deceive ourselves—very different will be the feelings—bitter animosity and hatred will succeed; there will arise different feelings as to religion: the country will be separated into hostile and intolerant factions, and the country will be a theatre of outrage and violence." ["No, no," from O'Gorman Mahon.] Both he and the hon. member for Clare were then speaking of futurity, and it became them to speak with becoming diffidence of the fallibility of human judgment: but he certainly never held more confidence in any opinion than he did in the opinion, that, if the Union were dissolved, such scenes as he mentioned would be realized. If the Union were dissolved, they would have many of those secret societies, of which he had heard for the first time that night. He did not certainly suppose that the great body of the Catholics had been united to obtain the repeal of the Union, but to obtain their civil rights and religious freedom; but he did know that the great body of the Catholics, who had obtained their wishes, had resolved to preserve their faith, and preserve that tranquillity, and that freedom they had obtained. It was not religious differences that now disturbed Ireland—it was not the want of any political rights—but the bad example of Paris and Brussels, acting on the excitability of a generous people, which had produced the present unfortunate state of Ireland. He did not look to any other means for restoring tranquillity than the gradual return of the reason of the people. He did not wish to revive religious animosities, or to embody again the Orangemen. That would be a bitter sacrifice; but he relied on the returning good sense of the great body of the Catholics. He was certain that after the lapse of a short time, when reason should have returned, that they would see the folly of their madness—and it was madness if ever a nation could be mad—it was madness to attempt to sever the Union. Let them only look at the depreciation it would occasion in the value of all property. Let them remember, too, that England could never, and would never, but at the last extremity, consent to the repeal of the Union. Let them remember, that if they should succeed after a twenty years' contest, what they would make of their country—a great moral wilderness, in which every bad passion and every crime would flourish and ripen. With these feelings, he declared, that it was the interest of both countries to remain united. He should listen with favour to any proposals of a conciliatory nature coming from the noble lord; but they must be proposals for doing justice to all parties. The noble lord must not attempt to patch up tranquillity and peace by giving a triumph to any party. He considered Ireland at present to be in greater danger from the abuses of liberty than from the abuses of power, and therefore, he, placing full confidence in the government, should entertain with favour any proposition for enforcing the law, and giving strength to the government. If circumstances should arise to make it necessary, he should be ready to arm it, and the government had good ground for asking it, with new and greater power. He should be ready, he could assure the noble lord, to support any proposition of that kind he might make.

At the close of the debate, the motion was agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

FEBRUARY 11, 1831.

In a committee of supply, Lord Althorp, after going through the details of the Budget, moved that a sum not exceeding £2,000,000 be granted to his Majesty for the transfer of aids in the present year.

In the debate which ensued, Sir Robert Peel and several other members rose at the same moment. The call for the right hon. baronet being general, he proceeded to observe, that he perfectly concurred with most of those gentlemen who had addressed the House on this subject, in thinking that it was infinitely better to refrain from entering into any details at present as to the taxes that were proposed to be taken off or reduced. Until a full and ample opportunity should be given for mature deliberation on those important propositions, relative to the reduction of taxation, he thought it was impossible for the House to come to any satisfactory opinion. With respect to the commutation of taxes, it should be carefully borne in mind, that there was a great danger that the legislature did not confer the benefit on those that it was intended to benefit. He knew from experience, and it was easily proved with respect to several articles, the duties of which had been reduced, that the benefit of the reduction was enjoyed by the dealers, and that the price of the commodities did not decrease in proportion to the remission of duty. When the duty was removed, it was found that the benefit, somehow or other, went into the pocket, not of the consumer, but of the retail dealer, who laid on the amount remitted in duty in some shape or other, on the price of the commodity. Now, if the public were subject to a new charge in lieu of that which was removed, and did not gain a corresponding advantage by the reduction of taxes, pro tanto, the benefit derived by the remission of taxes would be diminished. He was afraid, after the experience they had had of the results following from the repeal of the duty on leather and various other articles, that the repeal of some of the proposed taxes would not be attended with that advantage to the consumer which ought reasonably to be expected, and which was intended. At all events, the doubts which must be felt on that point, after what had already occurred, imposed upon the government the necessity of maturely considering the articles on which they intended to propose that the duty should be removed. With respect to the particular taxes which the noble lord proposed to reduce, there were some which, if the revenue were in a state to admit of any reduction of taxation, the Committee should justly and properly be most anxious to take off. If it were clearly established that there was a surplus revenue, and that a remission of taxation could properly be made, he knew of no duty which he should be more forward to repeal than the tax on sea-borne coals. He knew of no one circumstance which would produce greater benefit, physical and moral, to the poorer classes, than whatever facilitated their obtaining a sufficient supply of coals at a moderate price. He was of opinion, that the relative difference, in regard to the amount of physical comforts, enjoyed by the poorer and wealthier classes in this country, was more felt in the increased ability of the latter to purchase a sufficiency of fuel than in any other circumstance—much more than in the circumstances of lodging, board, or clothes. As to lodging, as regarded comfort only, the poorer and the richer classes were placed very much upon an equality. As to food, there was no material difference; and with respect to comfortable clothing, the price of the article used for that purpose was so very small, that there was no material difference in that respect between the upper and lower classes. When he stated this, of course he did not mean to refer to those who were sunk in abject poverty, but to the great mass of the labouring population. With regard to those, as compared with the higher classes, he thought the great difference was, the facility which the one class had over the other in obtaining fuel. From the nature of the duty, these facilities were much greater in some parts of the country than in others. To subject the poorer classes to such difficulties in obtaining so necessary an article as fuel, did seem contrary to all principles of justice and good policy. He contended, also, that the difficulty of procuring sufficient fuel affected the moral condition of the poorer classes. At all seasons it was necessary, more or less; and in winter, fuel the poor must have, in order to enable them to go on with the labour by which many of them gained their subsistence. If they had not the means of purchasing it, they naturally betook themselves to pilfering from the woods and demesnes of their richer neighbours; and this, besides confounding right and wrong in their minds, necessarily created a degree of ill-will between those whose property was stolen, and those who were of necessity, as it were, compelled to turn pilferers. A state of animosity, therefore, was engendered by the difficulty which the poor found in obtaining a supply of fuel. Assuming, therefore, that the finances of the country would permit a reduction of taxation to the amount of £800,000, he thought no tax could be selected with more propriety and more advantage than the reduction of the duty on sea-borne coals. Not to enter into the details of matters of comparative minor importance, he would just beg to observe, that he was afraid, the proposed tax on passengers by steam-boats would have the practical effect of preventing the intercourse between this country and Ireland. He believed it would have the effect, in a great degree, of producing a suspension of the intercourse between the two countries. The noble lord had not stated his views on that part of the subject, but it was well he should consider the poverty of many of the persons passed in every ship that came from Ireland to England. The proposed tax (as he understood it) was 2s. 6d. for any distance exceeding twenty miles. [Lord Althorpsaid, thirty.] And for a less distance than that, the tax was to be 1s. 6d. and 1s. The sum, therefore, which a person coming from Ireland would have to pay would be nearly double the amount of the passage-money, and would amount to a prohibition of the passage of the Irish labourers. Perhaps it was the intention of the noble lord to modify the proposition so as to except the intercourse with Ireland from the operation of the tax; but unless he did, the practical effect would be nothing less than what he had stated. If the noble lord had not considered this circumstance, it was well he should be made aware of it. The noble lord had omitted to mention the amount of the estimates for the present year. He stated, in round numbers, that the sum required for the service of the year, including the interest and expenses of the debt, would be £46,000,000; and he further added, that the estimates were drawn up; but he had given no information to the committee as to the total amount of the estimates, independent of the debt, and still less as to the amount of the respective estimates for the expenses of the different public departments. He had supposed that it was the noble lord's intention to have stated the amount that would be required for each particular branch of the public service, and could only suppose that the omission had taken place from inadvertence. He now came to another part of the noble lord's speech, and he said it not in party spirit, that all those matters to which he had alluded, and all the matters that had been discussed since the commencement of the session, were trifling and of minor importance, when compared with the proposition which the noble lord had made for the imposition of a tax on the transfer of funded property. He trusted, that the noble lord would consider the objections urged by every one who had spoken on the subject, with the single exception of his honourable friend, the member for Staffordshire (Sir John Wrottesley), to that part of his proposition, and would not, therefore, persevere in his plan. The objections had come from all sides of the House, and were made without political predilection or party feeling. He trusted that his Majesty's government would not persevere in a measure which, in his view, would tarnish the fair fame of this country, which had remained hitherto unimpeached. He asked the noble lord, whether he had read the words of the contracts that had been made with the public creditor? He would refer to one, for instance, to show the condition on which the public creditor had advanced his money to the government, perhaps at a time of great public emergency. All the acts for raising public loans were nearly in the same words; and he would ask the committee, could any words be more distinct and binding, or admit of less doubt? He would refer, in corroboration of this opinion, to an act entitled, "An act for raising the sum of £27,000,000 by way of annuity," which would show the House the obligations imposed on it. This loan had been raised in 1813, and he referred to it as stating the terms of the contract in the language of all acts of this description. This act contained a guarantee to the public creditor against the very tax now about to be imposed upon him. The language of the act was, that "no stamp-duty whatever shall be charged upon any transfer of this property." This was the condition upon which money had been borrowed. Now, how was it possible to "rail this seal from off the bond?" It was upon this express condition that the public creditor had advanced his money; and, if this condition were forgotten, they would violate good faith, and depart from that proud position which this country had always occupied, in contradistinction to every other country, in its dealings with its creditors. No ingenuity could get rid of the force of such an objection. His hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire, said, that as Parliament had imposed a property-tax—as it had violated the contract with the public before, there was no reason why it should not be violated again. That was the very thing which he (Sir Robert Peel) feared. He dreaded that an inference would be drawn from the proposed violation of law and good faith, that a further violation was not improper. If, in these times "of productive industry and of steady and progressive improvement," for so they were described by the noble lord, and he took the admission—if, in such times, in a period of general peace, and when there was no pressure on the energies and industry of the country—if, under such circumstances, the government contemplated the violation of an Act of Parliament, and an express contract entered into with the public creditor, by the imposition of a duty of one-half per cent., what security could the public creditor have, if the times of 1797 or 1798 returned. In those times, unappalled by danger, the Parliament of this country clung to the maintenance of public faith as its best security; but if similar circumstances were again to arise—if the difficulties which then environed the country should again exist—if a small duty were to be imposed at a time like the present, contrary to the principle and the express condition of the contract, what could the public creditor expect, but that, under the pressure of foreign war or of adverse circumstances, his property would be seized on? It would be little consolation to him to quote the proposed invasion of his rights as a reason for their violation again. In his (Sir R. Peel's) opinion, this was not so much a question of policy or of prudence; it was a question of morals. If the State were not prepared to meet its engagements, still there was justice due to the public; and let not individuals be called upon to sanction a course, as though it were just, which their feelings must tell them was contrary to every principle of justice and fair dealing. He had heard of a public writer who claimed a right to violate his engagements, and contended that he ought to be allowed to hold himself discharged of a debt he had contracted, upon the ground that some change had taken place in the policy of the country, which rendered him not so well able to meet the demands upon him. This was the doctrine of a public writer, and he (Sir R. Peel) had never heard that doctrine mentioned, in public or private, without its being received with a burst of indignation; but if the State were without difficulties (and he could conceive no difficulty which could justify such a departure from honour and good faith in a nation)—but if the State, in a period of steady and progressive improvement, were guilty of such violation of good faith, let them not upbraid an individual if he followed the example, and claimed for himself, under similar circumstances, that licence which the House was now called upon to take, with respect to the contract between the State and the public creditor. If the question were not to be tried by the sense of justice which every man had in his own mind, and which must lead him to the conclusion that public faith ought to be maintained inviolate—if they were to try the question, not upon such principles, but merely as a question of policy and prudence, he was content that it should rest upon such considerations. By adhering to public faith, he would ask, what had been the remission of public burdens which had taken place within the last six years? By adhering to public faith they had been enabled to reduce the interest on the five per cents., and subsequently on the four per cents.; and by these operations, a sum amounting to about £2,600,000 per annum was saved to the public. That was the legitimate, the honourable, the honest way of dealing with the public creditor. The public creditor had no right to expect the public to remain his debtor longer than it was necessary. The public were enabled to repay his loan, and this was done in effect. By maintaining the principle of keeping faith with the creditor, therefore, the public had been enabled to discharge its engagements, and to get rid of burdens to the amount of £2,600,000 per annum. This was effective, because they had adhered steadily to their engagements as to the sheet-anchor. If, seven years ago, they had set the example they were now called upon to set, he put it to the committee, what would now have been the state of public credit, and whether such reductions could ever have been made? But then, said the noble lord, "this tax cannot be considered as particularly severe on the fundholder, for I impose, at the same time, the same amount of taxation on the transfer of landed property." And then, said the hon. baronet, the member for Staffordshire; "there is no distinction between the proposed tax and the property-tax, because the property-tax was on landed property as well as funded. You would be justified, therefore, in contending there was a distinction, if this tax were to apply to funded and not to landed property; but as it is to extend to landed property, there is no distinction, and, therefore, no objection." He for one was sorry for the extension of the proposed tax to landed property. He believed, of the two, he should have preferred a distinct confiscation. As to the argument, however, that there was no distinction between the proposed imposition and the property-tax, it was to be observed, in the first place, that the property-tax was a tax on the whole income of the country—offices and professions were equally subject to the tax, as well as funded and landed property. But how totally different was a tax on the income of land from a tax on the transfer of land! By the policy of our law, many estates could not be alienated. He could show estates without end in which transfers had never taken place. On all occasions, transfers of land were comparatively few; they did not amount to a hundredth part of the number of transfers of funded property. Landed and funded property were two things most distinct in their nature: and though he was sorry that land should have been included in the noble lord's plan, yet it was quite clear the proposed imposition could not affect the landholder as it would the fundholder. The tax on land, however, would pass over the prosperous holders of lands. Lands were generally sold in this country, either upon the demise of the head of a family, and for the purpose of raising fortunes for young children, or, he feared, more frequently to meet the increased pressure of the times. Now, the tax would not press upon prosperous land, but on land under adverse circumstances; and for this reason, if there were no other, the tax would be objectionable. He would call upon the House to recollect what was the state of the country in 1813. Parliament had then decided to make one tremendous exertion, with a view to bringing the long and exhausting war in which it was engaged to a close. The annual revenue was incapable of bearing the expense; so that there remained no alternative but to call upon the monied interest to contribute towards the great national effort about to be made. He would say nothing of the danger to be apprehended from a protracted contest, but he would ask, upon the general ground of policy, whether it were not wise to adopt a course calculated to bring to an issue that most tremendous of all evils, a general war, by some great, overpowering, irresistible effort, and to make terms with the enemy according to the advantages derived from such an effort, without any injury to the public creditor, or shock to the public faith? He would enter no further at present into this important subject. He had heard some vague rumours that morning that it was the intention of his Majesty's ministers to make such an attempt; but when he heard the noble lord, in the early part of the evening, say—and say truly—that the poor could derive but little advantage from the repeal of direct taxation; that it was chiefly by the employment of capital, and the removal of all impediments to that employment, that they could hope to be benefited; when he heard this, he felt confident that the report could not have been well founded, and he did not expect to hear the noble lord, at the conclusion of his speech, come forward with a proposal which was a direct attack on the national credit, which was calculated to shake all faith in the professions of the government, and give a blow to industry, by weakening and destroying the confidence of the capitalist. He objected to the measure, from a regard for the public credit, the public industry, the public morals, and the public property; and as a breach of those solemn engagements to which that House was itself a party.

Sir J. Wrottesley repeated, that the proposed tax did not infringe upon the faith of Parliament any more than the income-tax.

Sir R. Peel said, that the act of 1813 recognised the imposition of the property-tax, but provided that no other tax should be imposed on the fundholder.

At the close of the debate, the three following resolutions were then put seriatim—

That £2,000,000 be granted to his Majesty, as transfer of aids; £25,577,600 to pay off Exchequer-bills charged on aids of 1830 and 1831; and £3,800 to pay off Exchequer-bills issued for public works and building churches, and carried nem. dis.; and the House resumed.

THE GAME LAWS.

FEBRUARY 15, 1831.

In the debate upon Lord Althorp's motion, for leave to bring in a bill for certain alterations in the game laws—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said he feared that in discussing the subject of the game-laws we were apt to be too sanguine in our anticipations of the advantages to be derived from a particular change. He was afraid we overlooked the love of enterprise and amusement, which rendered the pursuit of game attractive to the common people as well as to their superiors. It was exceedingly difficult to find an adequate remedy for the evils that existed under the present system. At the same time he thought the game-laws so defective in principle, that a proposition for a change ought to be listened to with attention; but he again cautioned the House against entertaining extravagant expectations. The noble lord said he would do away with the law relating to qualifications, and it was so absurd that it was impossible to say a single word in its favour. It was not exactly fair, however, to say that the noble lord's plan would confer the same privilege upon the small as upon the large proprietor. The man who possessed only a single acre must pay £5 for a certificate, while he who had 5,000 acres paid no more. Now, to the former, the permission to kill game was no privilege at such a cost; the privilege not being worth the price paid for its enjoyment. He thought the remedy of the hon. member for Staffordshire—namely, to have two licenses, impracticable—difficult, if not impossible to be acted on, and vexatious in practice. He did not know, too, why a man might not shoot over his neighbour's land, if that neighbour pleased, without paying additionally. He feared that after the noble lord's plan should have been adopted, much the same temptation would exist with respect to the class of poachers as at present. Nay, it was possible that this measure, however well intended, might add to the vexation of the present system—that it would multiply the number of game preservers, embody a new class of supporters of the game-laws, and occasion greater jealousy than now existed. As a friendly opponent of the noble lord, he recommended him not to repeal the act prohibiting night poaching, and the assemblage of great bodies of armed men by night—a monstrous and dangerous evil. It was possible that legalizing the sale of game might afford some encouragement to poaching. He approved of doing away the qualification, and of legalizing the sale of game; but he hoped the noble lord would not be too precipitate.

Leave was given to bring in the bill, which was accordingly read a first time.

BOROUGH OF EVESHAM—REFORM.

FEBRUARY 17, 1831.

Lord John Russell having presented a petition from certain inhabitants of the borough of Evesham, praying for a reform in parliament, &c., gave notice of his intention to move, on the 1st of March, for leave to bring in a bill on the latter subject.

The Marquis of Chandos moved a resolution, "That the corrupt state of the borough of Evesham required the serious attention of that House."

Mr. E. B. Clive wished that the noble marquis would postpone his motion. He thought it improbable that the noble marquis would succeed in what he wished for, and if he would consent to a postponement it would save time. He was happy that the cause of reform had so zealous an advocate in the noble marquis. Should the motion of which the noble lord below him (Lord John Russell) had given notice for the 1st of March, not extend to the circumstances of the Evesham case, he (Mr. Clive) should be very much dissatisfied with it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said the hon. gentleman had given no reason why the House should not exercise its judicial functions in this case. The House of Commons knew nothing of the motion which was to be proposed on the 1st of March. There certainly was a notice on the paper relating to the state of the representation, but as yet the House had no further knowledge on the subject. It appeared from the report of a committee, that extensive corruption prevailed, at least amongst the non-resident electors of this borough—and the petition presented by the noble lord opposite confirmed the fact. In that petition 255 of the inhabitants spoke of the corruption which had broken out in the borough, and they spoke of it in no milder terms than as a leprosy. If this borough were proved to be a delinquent borough, it would be necessary to punish it, whether the noble lord (Lord John Russell) should succeed in his motion or not, because, even supposing that he did succeed to the fullest extent, still that House ought to signify to all future constituents, that future delinquencies, if such were committed, would be visited with punishment, and that, if they should be justly chargeable with corruption, they would subject themselves to punishment. An hon. gentleman opposite had paid a compliment to his noble friend on the ground of his zeal for reform, which compliment, however, had rather the air of a sarcasm. [Mr. Clive said "It was not so intended."] His noble friend said he had evidence to prove the corruption of the borough, and the noble lord opposite (Lord Althorp) had acted with his usual candour in the course which he had taken in reference to the question. He (Sir R. Peel) should certainly feel it his duty to support his noble friend's motion.

After some farther discussion, the noble Marquis's motion was agreed to.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

FEBRUARY 18, 1831.

In a debate which arose on the presentation, by Mr. D. Browne, of certain petitions representing that many thousand persons on the western coast of Ireland were in a state of starvation,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said he agreed, that nothing could be more painful than such temperate appeals to the commiseration of the House, as that which had been made on the authority of a petition by the right hon. member, and the pain was not lessened by the conviction that no adequate means of relief could be provided. On one point he had long made up his mind—that a Committee could not be proposed—a public grant could not even be asked without aggravating the prevailing distress. The mere expectation that government was about to attempt a task it was impossible for it to perform, would tend to dry up even such scanty, miserable, contemptible sources of relief as had been referred to by the right hon. gentleman. Even the despicable contribution of £100 out of a rental of £10,000 a year would be withheld, if it were supposed that ministers would come forward with relief; and the mere chance that government would appear in the markets would instantly raise the price of all the necessaries of life. He (Sir R. Peel) thought, therefore, that the right hon. gentleman had acted with becoming prudence and reserve in not saying any thing more specific as to the intention of government, although he could conceive the existence of such a pressing and overwhelming necessity as might compel the abandonment of the ordinary rules of policy in this respect. True it was, that the right hon. gentleman could not withhold the fact, that the government had had an agent in the distressed district; but it showed, that those in authority had taken the proper means to obtain correct information. Government ought not to undertake that which it could not succeed with, and which nothing but general sympathy and individual charity could accomplish; and he was perfectly content, from his own experience, to leave the matter in the hands of the government, without at all requiring it to explain its views. If urged by an overruling necessity, the right hon. gentleman should hereafter come down with a definite proposition for the relief of distress, he was sure that it would receive a ready assent from the sympathy of Parliament. The House could not see a whole population starve, without resorting to any and every plan of relief in its power, not merely from motives of humanity, but on the solid grounds of an enlightened policy. He could not certainly go so far as the hon. member, who had recommended that the landlords should be deprived of their rents, and the clergy of their tithes, as he was opposed to any such tyrannical measures as implied a confiscation of property.

Mr. D. Browne explained. He did not mean to recommend that landlords should be despoiled of their rents, or the Church of its tithes, but merely that if government advanced money to aid particular districts, it should have a claim for repayment prior to those of the landlord and the Church.

Sir R. Peel could not go along with the hon. member even to that extent.

The petitions were laid on the table.

ARMY ESTIMATES—BELGIUM.

FEBRUARY 18, 1831.

On the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates, Mr. Hume rose and spoke at considerable length, and concluded with moving, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to direct that there should be laid before that House copies of all the protocols of the Congress of the five Powers held in London, respecting the affairs of Belgium, as far as England was concerned, since October 1830."

Mr. Hunt having seconded the motion, Lord Palmerston spoke in reply, and was followed by Mr. O'Connell and Lord Althorp.

SIR ROBERT PEELE then said he was bound to give his decided opposition to the motion of the hon. member for Middlesex; for he was not prepared to compel the government to produce copies of all the protocols when the noble lord, on his responsibility, stated, that it would be prejudicial to the public service that those documents, pending the negotiations, should be produced; he was content with the assurance, that the time would come when full information would be afforded; and he therefore could not consent to postpone the vote for the army estimates till those papers had been laid on the table of the House. In the present state of this country and its foreign relations, he could not offer any opposition to the amount of the force proposed; for he could not view the present condition of England, and the threatening aspect of her foreign affairs, without admitting that the government was justified in increasing the military force of the country to the full extent of the peace establishment. So convinced was he that it was impolitic to provoke any annoying discussion in that House, with reference to the other countries of Europe, that he, though only an humble member of it, should abstain from stating the reasons that induced him to support the military establishment that was proposed; nor would he imitate the example which had been set in the popular assembly of a powerful and liberal neighbouring state, and obstruct the great object of maintaining peace by an undignified and useless discussion. He wished, however, that it might not be inferred from his silence out of office, by the House, that he was indifferent to the permanent interest and honour of the country. He had such confidence in the progress of knowledge—such confidence in the force of justice throughout the world, that he was persuaded, that whatever country provoked an unjust war, against the wishes of Europe, bringing on it that most terrible of all inflictions the human race could suffer—a war without a just cause; he had such confidence in the force of public opinion, and the sense of justice, that, let the financial resources of that country be what they might—let her military means be ever so great—the might and valour of her soldiers ever so noble—he was sure that she must ultimately fall a victim to the force of public opinion, which would heal all internal dissensions, and, rallying the whole of Europe around one object, vindicate the great cause of peace and justice. He said this with perfect confidence—if France, when she vindicated her own rights, when she revolted against the unjust proceedings of her late monarch—if France had then been assailed by the powers of Europe in a confederacy to prevent France from choosing her own government, he was confident, that the powers of Europe would have been unable to control her actions, he was confident that their unjust cause must ultimately have failed, and that she would successfully have vindicated her right to choose her government against the combined powers of Europe. Their efforts would have failed against France, and would have recoiled against themselves in the madness of such a struggle. France had a right to choose her own government in the circumstances in which she was placed. The unjust and oppressive ordinances issued by the late government, deserved and excited a spirit of hostility which made them recoil on the heads of those who, issued them. But he was equally confident, that if unjust ambition should tempt France by force to enlarge the limits of her empire—if she should be urged on by the recollections of the victories of Napoleon—if a military faction should prevail over the good sense of the country, he was equally confident, then, that Europe, united in a just cause, would resist France successively, and that a different result would teach France that it was not for her interest to provoke war. He would say no more on that subject; out he earnestly hoped that the confidence of his noble friend (Lord Palmerston) in the assurances of France might be justified, and that she was not preparing her present great armaments for any purpose of aggression. At the same time he must own, that he could not read the speeches of her ministers, and he could not know of her immense military preparations, without feeling alarm. His noble friend knew of all these preparations, and he hoped his noble friend might be justified in the confidence he placed in the assurances he received from France. He relied on the intentions of ministers, and was prepared to give them his support—his ardent and efficient support—in their proposition for the army estimates. He was sorry that his noble friend had entered, in the debate, into so much detail on the subject of Belgium. It would have been better to have postponed that discussion, and he did not think the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Hume) called on him to enter so far into the subject. As his noble friend had entered into it, he must say, that he could then hardly believe that he was turned out of office for his principles of non-interference. He believed, and he had reason to believe, that there was no variance between his opinion and the opinions of his noble friend. He thought it highly probable that his Majesty's government—taking no notice of that subordinate subject, the civil list, on which there did not seem to be much difference of opinion, and not referring to that question of reform, on which there was a great difference of opinion between him and it—on the whole, he thought his Majesty's present ministers would not act very differently from the last ministers. It was not, however, on the ground of reform that the late ministers were turned out of office, but on the ground of the civil list, and on the ground of an unwillingness to make retrenchment. That, he repeated, was at least the public view; but after hearing his noble friend's statement, to say that these two grounds were the causes why the late ministers lost office, was one of the most extraordinary assertions that was ever made. In that part of his noble friend's speech in which he spoke of the army establishment—of the necessity of keeping up a large force—so much did it resemble his noble friend's former speeches, that it reminded him of those happy times when his noble friend was secretary of war, and he was sitting beside him, applauding every sentiment he uttered, and he could not believe now that he was politically opposed to his noble friend, however he might be personally. He had heard that his Majesty's present government was opposed principally to the late government on the ground of retrenchment and non-intervention. He did them the justice, when he heard that declaration, to doubt their intention of carrying it into effect; he had confidence that their conduct and their declarations would not agree; that in what regarded the interest of the country he knew them to be honourable men, and he knew that they were prepared to throw overboard their declarations, whenever the time came that the honour of the country was to be vindicated or its dignity sustained. He knew that they would not allow their declarations to stand between them and the honour of their country. He knew that they would imitate their predecessors; for men, if in office, seemed really to be like the Indians—they inherited all the qualities of those enemies they killed. The present ministers had killed their opponents, and had immediately entered into possession of all their doctrines. They found it necessary to support all the monarchical institutions of the country; they found it necessary to preserve the honour and interest of the country; and he knew them to be too honourable men to suppose that they would sacrifice to their prejudices what the interest of the country required, and that they would in office pay much regard to their own flash speeches out of office. That was, in truth, their conduct; and, whatever might have been their expressions, he was confident, however much they might desire to make retrenchment, that when they came to look into the details, they would make no retrenchment but what the interest of England demanded. That was also the principle of the late government. He did not object to the army estimates, and he had always been confident, that when the ministers came to apply themselves to the details; they would be of the same opinion as the late ministers. He did not blame them for their professions and speeches out of office; and though he did not believe that they intended to produce such an effect—that they did not intend to promote dissatisfaction—though he was convinced such had not been their intention—yet he was bound to say, such had been, he was afraid, the effect of their speeches; and out of office, they had produced that dissatisfaction for which, when in office, they found that there was no reasonable grounds. He had always, he said, been confident, whatever might have been the speeches of the right hon. gentlemen opposite, that they would not carry them into effect. He hoped the country would see from the conduct of the noble lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in whose personal honour and integrity he was disposed to place the greatest confidence—he hoped, when the people saw that the noble lord, who was an admirer of popular rights, and in the exercise of his controlling power, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, did not propose any reduction in the Estimates submitted to the House last year, and that he even found it necessary to make an addition—he hoped, when the country saw this, that it would not view the general conduct of that House with dissatisfaction. The hon. member for Middlesex, indeed, said, that the Estimates had been reduced last year £189,000, and that they ought to be reduced this year the same sum; but was there ever any thing so absurd? Was there no notice to be taken of the circumstances of the country? Was the House to be bound down by an iron formula of one gradual and continued reduction, to which the Estimates must always conform? His Majesty's government must judge of these circumstances, and, if necessary, make no reduction. As to the reduction of 200 offices, of which the noble lord had boasted, he admitted that every office ought to be reduced which was not necessary. He admitted that every officer employed in collecting the revenues, whose services were not wanted, ought to be reduced, but not one ought to be reduced whose services were necessary. With respect to the declaration of the government, that it would govern without patronage, that was all very well; but was not an addition to the army an increase of patronage? It happened, certainly, that by adding to the number of men, the number of officers was also increased, and the ministers could not increase the army without adding to their patronage. As for retrenchment, he was ready to admit that it was necessary to be adopted to the greatest possible extent, and he trusted to posterity—a very early posterity however,—to do justice on that point between the late and the present administration. He would allow the hon. baronet to chant the hymn of victory again over the reduction of the lieutenant-general of the ordinance, which the former administration had not effected, but the country expected from the promises of a retrenchment a much greater reduction of the national burthens. After attending to the matter, he doubted if it were practicable for retrenchment to be carried much further than it was carried by the late government. As to the doctrines of non-interference, he must say, that since he had been in public life, he had never heard the doctrine of the right of interference defended on such grounds, or carried so far, as it had been carried by the noble lord to night. Lord Castlereagh had never placed it on such high grounds. The king's speech had been attacked for what it contained about interference; but his noble friend (Lord Palmerston) had vindicated that speech in the able speech he had delivered. His noble friend said, that what gave our government a right to interfere with respect to Belgium was this:—That Belgium had never in modern times been an independent state; that first she had been dependent on Austria, and afterwards on France; and that she had been rescued from France in 1815 by the Allies; and that Austria, having waived her claims, the Allies had a right to interfere and settle her destiny. If that were the ground of the proceedings of the government, he was not disposed to adopt them: and grounding the right to interference on the dependence of Belgium, what would his noble friend say of the South American Provinces? He would not say surely, that as they had not been independent, we had a right to interfere with them. His noble friend said, the Belgians were legislators of yesterday; but he had never before heard that the age of nations made any difference in the right of non-interference. The true ground of one nation interfering with another was stated by his noble friend, when he said, that it was possible for the situation of one state to be pregnant with danger to other powers, and they had then a right to interfere to protect themselves. That was the true principle; but that, because a nation or people first became independent yesterday, another had a right to interfere with it, he must positively deny. He admitted the propriety of mediating to share the debt equally between Belgium and Holland; but suppose that Belgium should refuse to take the share allotted to her, would his noble friend say, that we ought to go to war to make Belgium take her share? It was quite proper to mediate and try to settle the differences between Belgium and Holland, though to interfere in the internal concerns of states by mediation, did not imply war, but only the compulsion of argument. His noble friend said, that we had a right to compel Belgium to relinquish Luxemburg under the treaties of 1815; but that was what the late ministers said, and what was said by his Majesty in his speech. His noble friend admitted, that, by the treaty of 1815, Luxemburg belonged to the Germanic Confederation. But if we had a right to separate Luxemburg from Belgium, what became of the right espoused by his noble friend of a people to choose their own government? He must say, that was not a correct assumption. His noble friend was right in refusing the assent of England to place the Duke of Nemours on the throne of Belgium. Common sense said, it was not right to suffer France to encircle our shores with her power, under the influence of civil expressions, for, in a time of war, those countries might be to us a great means of annoyance. His noble friend said, and he agreed with him, that the probability of such a danger gave one state a right to interfere in the internal concerns of another. If his noble friend's declaration were right, that was a full justification for the speech delivered from the Throne at the opening of the session; and, in making that declaration, as well as in his conduct, he was persuaded that his noble friend was only guided by a sense of duty, and only looked to the permanent interest of the country. He would repeat his declaration, that he should feel ashamed of himself if he permitted any personal feelings—any jealousy—or any political hostility, to interfere with the cordial support which he felt it necessary, on all proper occasions, to give to his Majesty's government. It was the more agreeable to him to be enabled to do so, because from the course the present ministers were pursuing, though they had dispossessed him of place on the ground of not following out retrenchment; on that point, and as respected our foreign policy, there was no difference between him and them, and he had nothing to complain of in their conduct. He hoped, on that more serious subject, Parliamentary Reform, when they came to take that up—he hoped that they would have the like regard to the interest and honour of the country, and act on the same faith and honourable principles that they had acted on in regard to these two subjects, and he hoped that they would not submit—he meant to use the word submit—he hoped they would not submit, induced by the taunts of the hon. member (Mr. Hume) and those acting with him, in looking at the details of that important question—he hoped, he said, that they would not be induced by the taunts of the hon. gentleman, to propose any measure for the consideration of the House pregnant with immediate or contingent prejudice to the institutions of this great country, or dangerous to the public welfare—over which it was their bounden duty to watch.

At an advanced stage of the debate, Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Mr. R. Grant, said, that from the strange misrepresentations which the hon. and learned gentleman had just made of his speech, he was almost tempted to suppose that the hon. and learned gentleman was not in the House when he delivered it. What he had said was this,—that he could not state all the reasons which he had for supporting an increased military force for the present year, for he was not desirous of entering upon topics which might excite irritation in popular assemblies. He spoke cautiously and guardedly on the point, for reasons which he was sure the House would understand without his explaining them further. The hon. and learned gentleman represented him (Sir R. Peel) to have said, that he was proud to give his active support to the government. He trusted that he should be ready to support his Majesty's government on all proper occasions. What he said was this,—that if an appeal should be made by the government to that House for increased resources, to ensure the preservation of the permanent interests and honour of the country, he should forget all causes of alienation, and should assist the executive government, with all his power, in vindicating the honour and safety of the country.

Mr. Hume ultimately withdrew his motion.

WEST INDIES—REDUCTION OF SUGAR DUTIES.

FEBRUARY 21.

The Marquis of Chandos moved, as an amendment to a motion by Lord Althorp respecting the Cotton Trade, the following Resolution:—"That the distressed condition of the West India planters demands the serious and immediate consideration of this House, with a view to their relief."

In the debate which ensued, SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that, on the present question, he could not take into consideration the probable effect which the decision of the House might have upon the relative situation of political parties. In the present state of the country, he had much higher objects to regard; and he was bound to be governed by them in giving his vote. He concurred with those who lamented the distress of the West Indies, and he considered the interests of the mother country to be involved in those of the colonies. He deeply regretted that any irritating topic had been introduced, and that they could not discuss questions merely fiscal without being threatened with the voice of the people of England. He was astonished that a right hon. gentleman connected with a financial department, should attempt to influence the House in the consideration of a financial question, by referring to the condition of the slaves. He would assert, that the moral and physical condition of the slaves would most effectually be improved by promoting the welfare of the planters. The true way to raise the condition of the slave, was to restore prosperity to the West Indian colonies. But on the present occasion he must be governed in his course by feelings higher than party or political prejudices. He agreed, that the West Indians required relief; and he trusted that the noble lord would be able to give encouragement to the hopes of the planters—that the duties on sugar would be reduced in the next year. But, in the present state of the country, the noble lord having pledged himself to the reduction of the duties on coals and candles, and no satisfactory explanation of the taxes that were to be imposed, that he had heard, had yet been given, he could not, with due regard to the paramount duty of supporting the public faith, concur in the taking off any other taxes. He should be sorry also to give any vote which would interfere with the progress of granting the supplies. He could not vote for the resolution, because it might encourage hopes which could not at present be realized. He regretted that the right hon. gentleman opposite, who was so aware of the necessity of supporting public credit, had not kept as attentive an eye to that necessity when he supported the tax upon transfers, and when equitable adjustment was talked of on a former occasion. For the sake of that credit, he should vote against the resolution, without regard to any influence it might have upon the state of parties. At the same time, he would advise his noble friend not to accept the offer of a committee. The responsibility of attending to the colonial interests was last year left to the administration; and the neglect of them since had not been occasioned by ignorance or denial of the distress, but by the inability of the government to devise means of relieving it, consistently with other interests. He did not, however, think that the reduction of the tax upon sugar would afford all the desired relief. The right hon. baronet had said, that the question before the House was really a party question, and that its decision would determine the continuance of the present ministry. If he (Sir R. Peel) viewed it in that light, he should think it a sufficient reason for the House to reject the motion; as it ought not to entertain on light grounds a question involving such results. But, in the present state of the country especially, they ought not to call on ministers to pledge themselves to reductions of taxation which would endanger the sufficiency of the public revenue to the support of the public faith. He concluded by recommending his noble friend to withdraw his motion.

The Marquis of Chandos, in yielding to this recommendation, begged it to be understood, that he was resolved, at some future time, to follow up his present amendment, when he might hope for more unanimity in the House than there then was. Amendment withdrawn.

PRINTED CALICOES.

In a Committee on the Excise acts relating to Printed Calicoes, Lord Althorp and two or three other members having spoken,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should have much preferred a duty on the printed calicoes to the noble lord's tax on the raw material, even though the tax were to be but a temporary one, because the encouragement just now bestowed in France and America on the manufacture of cotton, should make us very wary as to the imposition of any new impediments in the way of our own domestic manufactures of that article. This was not, however, the point to which he then wished to particularly direct the attention of the House, with reference to the noble lord's proposed reduction and substitution of duty. The noble lord had not informed them how he meant to make good the deficiency which would accrue to the revenue from his change from an ad valorem duty of six per cent on the manufactured article, to a duty of five-eighths of a penny on the raw cotton. That loss would be, as he should presently show, not less than £250,000; and when this sum was added to the defalcation which would ensue from the repeal of the duties on coals and candles, there would remain a total loss to the revenue of £1,200,000, which he knew not how the noble lord could compensate. Then, let them consider how his proposed drawback duty would also affect the revenue. That drawback was to be in force three months,—that is to say, that though the five-eighths of a penny duty on raw cotton was nominally to commence from the present day, the revenue would be at a certain loss for three months, without any counterbalancing advantage. Now, that the amount of this loss would be very considerable, was evident from the sum paid as drawback allowance last year. The ad valorem duty last year amounted to £1,942,000; the drawback allowance on exports to £1,390,000; leaving a clear nett revenue of £552,000. Supposing, then, that exports of printed calicoes for the ensuing three months, during which the drawback allowance was to be in force, would be only one-fourth of the amount of last year, it was plain they would be much more, inasmuch as the drawback for a limited period must operate as a stimulus to the exports during that period. There would be an actual loss to the revenue this year of £347,500. Again he must say, he knew not how the noble lord proposed to make good the deficiency from the revenue which his measure would occasion.

Lord Althorp's resolutions were agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

MARCH 1, 1831.

At the close of a speech of great length, Lord John Russell, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to bring in a bill for amending the state of the representation in England and Wales.

After a protracted discussion, the debate was adjourned to the following day.

MARCH 3, 1831.

In the third night of the debate, SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Lord Palmerston, thus addressed the Chair:—

Sir, I must begin by assuring my noble friend, that the part of his speech in which he adverted to the delicacy and difficulty of his personal situation in this debate appeared to me wholly unnecessary; for if my noble friend had not thought it right to explain the grounds which have induced him to adopt a different course from that which he pursued on a former occasion, still I, for one, should not have drawn any unfavourable conclusion from his silence, or joined in the taunts of which he has complained. I have been placed in the same situation with my noble friend. I, too, have found it necessary, from a regard to the interests of the country, to adopt a different course from that which I had long conscientiously followed; and I ought, therefore, to be the last man in this House who would refuse to put an indulgent construction on the language, or to join in harsh conclusions with respect to the motives, of public men. I never can allow it to be supposed that public men have not higher and nobler motives for their public conduct than the paltry desire to retain place; and the character of my noble friend, therefore, even if he had been silent, would have proved to me a sufficient guarantee for the rectitude of his intentions. Having thus imitated that generous courtesy which prevails in more deadly combats than that in which I am about to engage; having, as it were, shaken hands with my noble friend, and disclaimed all personal hostility, I trust I shall now be excused if I descend into the arena, and with perfect freedom apply myself to the speech of my noble friend. At the moment when we were anxiously waiting for a vindication of the measure before the House—at the moment when we wanted to know, not what popular opinion demanded from us, but what we were practically to gain from the adoption of the measure of the noble lord—at that moment the noble lord had thought fit to enter into an invidious comparison of the merits of the late and the present administrations, and the greater part of his speech was composed—not of the arguments which the House so greatly desiderated, but of sarcastic allusions to the conduct and opinions of the late administration, connected with an attempt—not a very successful one I admit—to magnify the deeds of the present government at the expense of that government which was lately honoured with his Majesty's confidence. My noble friend says, that if there had not been a change in the government, the same results, in respect to the restoration of the public peace, and especially in Ireland, would not have taken place. In that opinion I am much disposed to concur. No party hostility shall ever prevent me from doing justice whenever justice should be done, or bestowing praise wherever praise ought to be bestowed. I approve the course pursued by the present Home department; I admire the conduct of the noble marquis now at the head of the Irish government; ever since he has reassumed that office, I have seen nothing in his conduct but what entitles him to praise. I believe that there is some truth in what has been said by my noble friend, that had the late administration been in office, they would not have been able to effect what has been effected by the present administration. But should we have had the same assistance? Should we, if at a period of great excitement, if amid a loud and general demand for retrenchment, we had produced estimates of increased extent,—should we have found all party considerations yield to a feeling for the public service; or had we resorted to measures of extreme coercion, should we have found a united and generous disposition in all parts of the House to support the executive government, and supply it with the means of defeating whatever efforts might be made to disturb the public tranquillity? Sir, I will not enter into any comparison of the merits of the two administrations. But let my noble friend recollect, that the instrument which the noble marquis at the head of the Irish government has wielded, with his characteristic vigour and success, was an instrument placed in his hands by his Majesty's late government; fabricated by their foresight, contrary to the opinion, and contrary to the wishes of many members of the present administration. If we found it difficult to preserve peace in some districts of England for want of a local and constitutional force, let it be remembered that it was not by the late government that the reduction of the yeomanry was effected. I cannot say that my noble friend, in his anxiety to blame his Majesty's late government for their measures, has shown himself a very acute or a very discreet advocate for the plan of reform proposed by the noble member for Tavistock. For my noble friend says, that if, in the year 1828, the late government had not refused to transfer the elective franchise from the borough of East Retford to the town of Birmingham, we should not be now discussing the question of Parliamentary reform; for that single measure would have quieted the people on this subject, and would have given general satisfaction. If, Sir, from so small an event, such mighty consequences should have flowed—if it really would have been possible, by so trifling a concession as the transfer of the elective franchise from East Retford to Birmingham, to have satisfied and conciliated all classes of the community, it is surely of great importance to enquire what is the paramount reason which should induce us at the present moment to make so extraordinary a change in the constitution as that which is now proposed. My noble friend says, "Why did you not consent to the disfranchisement of East Retford?" Why, Sir, if I am not greatly mistaken, my noble friend and myself entered the House together on that fatal night which led to the dissolution of the late government, and my noble friend and myself had intended to give our votes on the same side upon that occasion; but the effect of a taunt upon my late right hon. friend, Mr. Huskisson, compelled him, in obedience to his feelings, to deviate from the course which he had intended to adopt, and which, out of a delicate sense of honour, led him to tender his resignation. If, therefore, there was so much blame due for the rejection of that measure, my noble friend cannot entirely exclude himself from some participation in it. But to pass from that topic, my noble friend says, that if in 1828 we had consented to transfer the elective franchise from the borough of East Retford to the town of Birmingham, there would not have been the least necessity for agitating at the present moment the question of parliamentary reform, for that would have satisfied the whole country. What! would my noble friend himself have rested satisfied with the existing state of the representation, notwithstanding the five grand defects which he has just described as existing in it? Would my noble friend have rested satisfied to let so gross a system of corruption as that which he now finds it convenient to deplore, continue without any attempt on his part to rescue the country from its baleful influence? My noble friend says that Mr. Canning, if he had lived, would have pursued a different course from that which we, who oppose this bill, are pursuing. My noble friend undertakes to say that if Mr. Canning were living, he would raise his voice in favour of the plan which his Majesty's government have brought forward. Oh, would to God that he were here!—

Tuque tuis armis, nos te poteretur Achille!

Would to God that he were here to confound the sophistry and fallacies of reformers, and to win back the people, by the charms of truth and eloquence, to a right appreciation of the form of government under which they live! If Mr. Canning had lived, and had changed his opinions on this or any other subject, none but high and generous motives would have influenced his course, and he would have come forward boldly and manfully to avow and vindicate his change of opinion. But in no expression that ever fell from the lips of Mr. Canning—in no one step in his brilliant and noble career, can I trace the slightest indication of the probability of any such change. My noble friend, however, says he has discovered some expressions proceeding from Mr. Canning which justify his supposition. And where does my noble friend find those expressions? Why, in a speech made by Mr. Canning in the year 1826, upon the silk trade! But does my noble friend forget that one whole year afterwards, in 1827, Mr. Canning, being head of the government, and the question being, not silk, but reform, Mr. Canning rigidly adhered to all his former opinions? The question was, what should be done with the franchise of the borough of Penryn—whether it should be thrown open to the adjacent hundred, or transferred to the town of Manchester? Did Mr. Canning do violence to his own judgment, and make that concession to public opinion which my noble friend now demands, or did he not refuse the slightest concession, and submit to be in a small minority, rather than abate one jot of his resistance to reform? When my noble friend therefore imputes to the conduct of public men, in the years 1827 and 1828, the necessity for parliamentary reform, which he says exists at present, tenderness for the fame of Mr. Canning ought to prevent so indiscriminate an accusation. I now come to the tremendous question before the House; but before I approach the consideration of it, I must give vent to feelings of pain and humiliation, which I cannot adequately express. I am asked, I will not say to make a revolution in the country, but as was properly said by the hon. member for Callington, to substitute for the present a different constitution; and I am not invited to do this after a calm and dispassionate enquiry, but to take this hasty step by an appeal to motives, which, if I permitted them to influence me, would brand me with disgrace. I am desired—expressly and repeatedly desired—not to subject my fears to my judgment, but my judgment to my fears; to defer to authority which I cannot recognise; and to consult my own personal interest, by averting the threatened penalty of a dissolution. I would ask, why the King's name is introduced in this discussion? Why has it been stated day after day to the country, that this plan has received the particular sanction of the King? As to the reference that has been made to the discussion on the Catholic question, the cases have no similarity. On that occasion it had been publicly stated that the measure had not the sanction of the King, and the ministers had then no alternative but to declare that the measure was brought forward with the sanction of the King. But when a measure like this is introduced by the administration—when the King's consent must be presumed—when it is not called in question, is it necessary, day after day, in both Houses of Parliament, and in the public press, to state that this measure has received the approbation of his Majesty, and not only the approbation, but the written sanction of the King? I assume that such is the fact. But granting the fact, it is no imputation on my profound respect and loyalty towards his Majesty, if I disregard that circumstance; and if, admitting that the noble lord's plan has the sanction of the King, I nevertheless, as a member of parliament, exercise my judgment as unreservedly upon the question as if that sanction had not been so indefatigably proclaimed. But, Sir, I regret on other grounds that it has been thought necessary, by the friends of the measure, to introduce the name of the King in connection with it. I will not now discuss the right or the expediency of the sweeping disfranchisement that is proposed. But I am sure it will be granted to me, that the measure is at least one of great harshness towards a number of corporate bodies of proved loyalty to the crown, which are suddenly called upon to sacrifice privileges of which they have been long and justly proud. Why hold out to those bodies his Majesty as the approver, almost as the especial author, of the plan by which these privileges are to be invaded? I had thought the King was the fountain of grace and favour; but it now seems as if his ministers shrunk from their proper share of their own acts, and transferred to their sovereign the odium of this plan of disfranchisement. I do not think that it is right or decent to aggravate the injury which the corporate bodies of this country are to sustain, by telling them that it is inflicted at the instigation and by the hand of their King. I have further to complain of the menace of dissolution which has been thrown out by some members of his Majesty's government. I will not stop to enquire whether or not it is probable that that menace will have any effect. For myself, I care not for it; for I should be unworthy of a seat in this House if I were to permit myself to be influenced by it. Dissolve Parliament if you will; I care not much whether I am returned again, or retire altogether into the obscurity of private life; but if I did feel any extreme anxiety on this head, I would go to my constituents with your bill in my hand, and I would put forward, as my especial claim for a renewal of their confidence, my determined opposition to its enactments. I will go to a community which consisted, in 1811, of between 7,000 and 8,000 persons; I will go to a borough which, whatever may have been the case in 1821—in 1831 contains above 4,000 souls; and I will tell my constituents, 400 or 500 in number, many of them not paying a rent of £10, but entitled to vote as resident householders paying church and poor-rates; I will tell them that to this bill, brought in without proof, or even argument, of its necessity, so far as it concerns them, I opposed myself to the utmost extent of my power. I will tell them that I did my utmost to preserve to them the privilege they at present enjoy, and which the humblest of them never abused—by the solicitation or acceptance of a bribe. Those constituents received me with kindness at the time when I was subjected to the indignity of expulsion elsewhere, for doing what I conceived to be an act of duty—an act beneficial to the country, but especially beneficial to that Church of whose interests I was bound to be the guardian. Shortly after I lost that proud distinction to which I have just adverted, my present constituents received me; and I will not, till some better reasons are brought forward, repay their kindness by being a party to their disfranchisement. Sir, another, and a still more alarming menace has been thrown out by the advocates of the bill. I am told by them that the alternative before me is the adoption of that bill, or civil commotion. I am to be deterred from forming a deliberate judgment on a most important public question by the prophetic visions of massacre and confiscation. Such were the words used last night by the hon. member for Calne. Let me ask the friends of the bill why I am to allow myself to be scared by this intimation? Why may I not form the same deliberate judgment on this bill, which you, who have introduced it, formed on the bill which was introduced last year by a noble lord (Lord Blandford)? By your opposition to that bill you did not imply that you were opposed to all reform; you merely implied that you objected to that bill. It is the same with me in this case. Again, on the same principle on which you, who support the bill, reject the application of the people for vote by ballot, why am not I at liberty to reject your bill? Why am I to yield to popular clamour and violence, when the noble lord opposite has not yielded to them when they demanded the repeal of the Union? We were told last night, that if we rejected this proposition, we, the individual members who so rejected it, would be held responsible for the consequences. “We will shift from our own shoulders,” say his Majesty’s ministers, even at this early period of the agitation they foresee, “the responsibility of having provoked it. We have proved our incapacity to govern, but we will show you our capacity to destroy, and hold you responsible if you obstruct us.” Oh no, Sir! On their heads shall be the responsibility of this mad proceeding. I, for one, utterly disclaim it. For what am I responsible? Was it I who raised the stormy waves of the multitude? Was it I who manifested my patriotism by exerting all my powers to excite the people to discontent with the existing constitution? Did I taunt the people with their indifference to reform, with having closed their ears to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely? With having lived in the lazy enjoyment of practical good, and disregarded the promises of visionary improvement? Was it I who called for the pension list of the privy council, for the express purpose of holding up the members of that council to public indignation? Did I draw invidious comparisons between a great naval commander and the civilians who presided over the department of the Admiralty? Did I ever doom to public obloquy that hapless first lord who should be so grasping of emolument as to include in his own estimates £5,000 per annum for his own salary? Did I, at a moment when the events of Paris and Brussels had caused great public excitement, when various causes were conspiring to agitate the public mind, did I express my misplaced admiration of the conduct of assembled thousands who were supposed to have flaunted in the face of their King the emblem of a foreign revolution? Sir, if there be men who, having thus excited the passions of the people, and spurred their lazy indifference, bring forward the question of reform at a time when all prudential considerations, whether with reference to foreign or to domestic topics, ought to have forbidden such a step,—if, I say, disappointment should follow their rash undertaking, I will never, while I have a voice in this House, allow them to hold me or any other individual member of the House responsible for the consequences of their infatuation. I am told that an appeal will be made to the people. I beg not to be included among those who are charged with making any one observation disparaging to the middle classes of society in this country. I repudiate such sentiment—sprung as I am, from those classes, and proud of my connexion with them. So far am I from underrating their intelligence or influence, that I tell you this,—you who talk of appealing to the people,—that unless these middle classes shall show more prudence, more judgment, and more moderation than their rulers, I shall despair of the destinies of my country. There are happy indications, however, which induce me to think that the confidence which I repose in the prudence, the moderation, and the judgment of the middle classes of society, has not been misplaced. You have all heard what the noble lord opposite, the Chancellor of Exchequer, said, with respect to the supposed exhibition of a tri-coloured flag at the Palace of St. James's; but have you also heard the indignant refutation of that charge which was laid on your table by a portion of the middle classes of society? So far from thinking that it was becoming in them to wave under the windows of their sovereign the memento of a fallen dynasty,—so far from thinking that it was decent, that it was consistent with the patriotic feelings of Englishmen to prefer any foreign standard to the flag which —has braved a thousand years

The battle and the breeze;

these people, these middle classes of society, presented an address to this House, in which, so far from accepting the vindication which had been offered for their conduct in the supposed use of the tri-coloured flag, they stated, “that they felt themselves much aggrieved by certain observations and misrepresentations made on the 9th instant, which conveyed a charge of a most foul and disgraceful nature, and an approach even to the foul crime of treason.” Sir, so far were they from intending to express any approbation “of the beautiful days of Paris,” that they assured the House, that the flag they so unfortunately displayed “was nothing more than four specimens of silk, of different colours, of exquisite workmanship, curiously sewed together, and manufactured expressly for the occasion by Messrs. Lee and Bousfield, of Cheapside.” It is, Sir, from this expression of just indignation, and this natural explanation of the quadri-colour flag, that I feel redoubled confidence, that the middle classes of this country, notwithstanding the bribe of power by which it is attempted to cajole them, have too much of self-denial and too much of good sense to wish to invade that admirable constitution under which they, of all classes, have especially flourished. If I must appeal, not to the reason and calm judgment of this House, but to some extrinsic and higher authority,—the feelings and wishes of the people,—why, then, I have nothing to hope for but that, before the people of England approve of this bill, they will listen to a calm and temperate appeal in behalf of what the noble lord calls, with somewhat of cruel mockery, the old English constitution. I hope they will consider that the constitution of a government is a matter of extreme delicacy and importance; that it is a most complex machine, not to be judged of by the examination of any isolated part which may be put forward for the purpose of exciting abhorrence; but demanding a comprehensive view, not only of the structure as a whole, but of its practical effects. It was well said by Mr. Canning, whose language, however, I will not attempt to quote, that, in judging of any form of government, we should bring to the consideration of it the same caution, the same distrust in our own knowledge, with which we should pronounce upon some mighty and complex piece of mechanism. There may be detached movements that we do not comprehend—movements which, to the superficial and ignorant, may seem not only useless but pernicious; but, surely, we must not condemn them if there be harmony in the working of the whole machine, and if its object be completely effected. “Look” (said Mr. Canning) “at the frame of man—it is fearfully and wonderfully made! yet this frame of a created being—‘so noble in reason—so infinite in faculties—in apprehension so like a God,’—has parts, and performs functions which, if they are to be separately regarded, provoke feelings of abhorrence and disgust.” Sir, let the people recollect that the writers of ancient times, who existed upwards of a thousand years ago, and could have no partiality for the British constitution—that mere speculative writers, discussing, à priori, the various forms of government, either despaired altogether of the formation of such a constitution as ours, or described it as the most perfect of all. Can there, by possibility, be a better description of the British constitution than that contained in the words of Cicero, “Statuo cam esse optime constitutam rempublicam"—I do not know whether I quote the words correctly—"quæ ex tribus generibus illis regali, optimo, et populari, modice confusa." Another eminent writer of antiquity (Tacitus), speaking of forms of government says, that all forms of government must consist either of king, nobles, or the people, or a combination of all these elements, the practicability of which he doubts, "Cunctas nationes et urbes populus aut priores, aut singuli regunt." "Delecta ex his et constituta reipublicæ forma, laudari facilius quam evenire; vel, si evenit, haud diuturna esse potest." Such, Sir, are the dicta of great writers on the abstract question of the modes of government. The British constitution has been made a subject of praise by every writer who has touched upon the question. I have heard quotations from Mr. Canning, from Mr. Burke, and from other great men now no more, in assertion of the excellence of the British constitution, but to these I will not refer, for I have a higher and a living authority on the same subject. I will venture to say, that if the House will permit me to substitute it for my own imperfect praise, I will read to it one of the most beautiful panegyrics on the English constitution, and more especially on the constitution of this House, that wisdom and truth have ever produced. The author of this panegyric is the noble member for Tavistock, alas! too, the author of a proposal fatal to the object of his praise. Sir, in quoting this speech, I beg that the noble lord who now proposes to lay violent hands on what was once the theme of his warmest admiration, will not imagine that I am about to upbraid him with inconsistency on account of his having altered his opinion. If he has changed his opinion, I am sure it is from a sense of duty; but, change that opinion as he may, he cannot gainsay the eternal truths which he himself has put upon record in language worthy to convey them. Sir, it was in the year 1819, on a motion which was brought forward for reform in parliament, that the noble lord made the speech which I am about to quote. The question put to him was this—"Why not disfranchise also the unconvicted boroughs?"—What was the answer of the noble lord?—"To this," says he, "I answer, that I do not, by any means, maintain that the resolutions I now propose comprise all the amendments that can be made in the frame of this House. Whenever a specific proposition is made, I shall be ready to give it all my attention, and, if I can approve of it, to adopt it. But I do not at present, I confess, see any rule by which any unconvicted borough can be disfranchised without disfranchising the whole." He goes on to say, "we then arrive at what is called a reform upon principle, or the reconstruction of the entire House of Commons." Therefore, Sir, I have the authority of the noble lord himself for this explanation of the character and effect of his present proposal, that it is neither more nor less than an entire reconstruction of the House of Commons.—Says the noble lord—"We then arrive at what is called a reform upon principle, or the reconstruction of the entire House of Commons. Now, Sir, I will not dwell upon the arguments which are generally used to repel such a proposition; arguments resting chiefly upon the advantage of admitting men of talent into this House, by means of the close boroughs; and on the danger that an assembly of popular delegates would overthrow the two other branches of the legislature. But I cannot forget that these arguments have been urged, not as some out of doors endeavour to persuade the people, by borough-mongers anxious to defend their own vile interests, but by some of the greatest, the brightest, and the most virtuous men whom this country ever produced. I cannot say, however, that I give entire credit to these arguments, because I think that, in political speculation, the hazard of error is immense, and the result of the best formed scheme often different from that which has been anticipated. But for this very reason I cannot agree to the wholesome plans of reform that are laid before us. We have no experience to guide us in the alterations which are proposed, at least none that is encouraging. There is, indeed, the example of Spain. Spain was formerly in the enjoyment of a free constitution; but in the course of the fifteenth century many of the towns fell into the hands of the nobility, who, instead of influencing the election of members to Cortes (the practice so much reprobated in this House), prevented their sending members at all. The consequence was, that when a struggle took place between the king and Cortes, the aristocracy, feeling no common interest with the representative body, joined the crown, and destroyed for ever the liberties of their country. The constitution of this country is not written down like that of some of our neighbours. I know not where to look for it except in the division into King, Lords, and Commons, and in the composition of this House, which has long been the supreme body in the state. The composition of this House by representatives of counties, cities, and boroughs, I take to be an intimate part of our constitution. The House was so formed when they passed the Habeas Corpus Act—a law which, together with other wise laws, Mr. Cobbett himself desires to preserve, although with strange inconsistency, whilst he cherishes the fruit he would cut down the tree. This House was constituted on the same principle of counties, cities, and boroughs, when Montesquieu pronounced it to be the most perfect in the world. Old Sarum existed when Somers and the great men of the revolution established our government. Rutland sent as many members as Yorkshire when Hampden lost his life in defence of the constitution. Are we then to conclude that Montesquieu praised a corrupt oligarchy?—That Somers and the great men of that day expelled a king in order to set up a many-headed tyranny?—that Hampden sacrificed his life for the interests of a boroughmongering faction? No! the principles of the construction of this House are pure and worthy. If we should endeavour to change them altogether, we should commit the folly of the servant in the story of Aladdin, who was deceived by the cry of ‘New lamps for old.’ Our lamp is covered with dirt and rubbish, but it has a magical power. It has raised up a smiling land, not bestrode with overgrown palaces, but covered with thick-set dwellings, every one of which holds a free man, enjoying equal privileges and equal protection with the proudest subject in the land. It has called into life all the busy creations of commercial prosperity. Nor, when men were wanting to illustrate and defend their country, have such men been deficient. When the fate of the nation depended upon the line of policy she should adopt, there were orators of the highest degree placing in the strongest light the argument for peace and war. When we were engaged in war, we had warriors ready to gain us laurels in the field, or to wield our thunders on the sea. When, again, we returned to peace, the questions of internal policy, of education of the poor, and of criminal law, found men ready to devote the most splendid abilities to the welfare of the most indigent class of the community!” And then exclaims the noble lord with just and eloquent indignation at the thought:—“And, Sir, shall we change an instrument which has produced effects so wonderful, for a burnished and tinsel article of modern manufacture? No! small as the remaining treasure of the constitution is, I cannot consent to throw it into the wheel for the chance of obtaining a prize in the lottery of constitutions.” Now, Sir, I think I have fulfilled my promise, that I would present the House with as just and beautiful a panegyric on the British constitution, as emphatic a warning against the danger of tampering with it, as practical wisdom ever uttered. Let it not be forgotten, that this speech was delivered in the year 1819,—a period when the internal state of the country was such, that almost every page of your debates teems with the proofs of internal disorder. There was a Seizure of Arms Bill, a Blasphemous Libel Bill, a Seditious Meetings Prevention Bill, a Newspaper Stamp Duty Bill, and a Bill to prevent Training and Exercise, each following the other in sad succession. Why, Sir, there might be in 1819, when these Six Acts of coercion were necessarily introduced,—there might be in the circumstances of the time some justification for the measure of reform. The member for Calne might then have said with some plausibility, “You have exhausted every measure of restraint,—try now the measure of reform:” but it is strange to hear that argument used in 1831, when, every one of the coercive measures of 1819 has been blotted from the Statute-book.—Now, Sir, allow me to ask the noble lord, in his own emphatic language, “What cause should now induce me to exchange the old lamp for a burnished and tinselled article of modern manufacture?” And if some deputy from the trading company of which we heard last night—if some agent of Althorp and Co.—some dealer in the new lights—should offer me his tinsel lamp in lieu of the old one, am I not at liberty to spurn his offer, and would it not be just to inflict on him the penalty of reading in a sonorous voice, his own speech in condemnation of his own article? It has been insinuated that among those who oppose this measure are some who wish to convert it into the instrument of recovering power for themselves. Disclaimers of the wish for power are apt to find no favour, and I say little on that head; but to a certain extent I must explain myself. When last in office, I could not have proposed reform as a minister of the Crown. I deprecated the agitation of such a question at the instance of the Crown. But having left office, and being reduced to the station of a private individual, I was then at liberty to take other views of this subject. I had to balance the danger of moderate reform against the monstrous evil of perpetual change in the executive government of this country; and I do not hesitate to avow, that there might have been proposed certain alterations in our representative system, founded on safe principles, abjuring all confiscation, and limited in their degree, to which I would have assented. I see a smile on the faces of some hon. gentlemen opposite. I am speaking with the utmost unreserve and sincerity. I never conferred upon this point, upon my honour, with any individual whatever. I am not stating this as an indication of any other plan which I have to propose. I am stating the course which I should have taken as a private individual, having a deeper interest in the prosperity of this country than any that I could possibly have in a return to office. But in this plan, which proceeds upon so extensive a principle, amounting, in fact, to a reconstruction—to use the words of the noble lord himself—of this House, I cannot concur; and I so wholly despair of modifying its provisions in any way, that when the time shall come, I shall have no alternative but to give my positive dissent to the proposed measure. I do this because I am wholly dissatisfied with it. Having listened attentively to the plan, I am wholly unconvinced by the arguments of the noble lord. Really, Sir, I fear I am wearying the House; but the subject is of such immense importance that it constitutes an apology even for unseasonable length. Let me then address myself to the arguments of the noble lord. They are arguments which, if good for any thing, will preclude this from being the final change. We shall be bound to proceed further. The noble lord said, with some inconsiderate frankness, that he found the constitution of this country in the 25th of Edward I., and the statute, "De tallagio non concedendo." The constitution of England in the reign of Edward I.—And what did he find there?—that no taxes could be imposed without the consent of the whole commonalty of the realm; and therefore, says the noble lord, "if this be a question of right, as I contend it is, the right is on the side of the reformer." These are the noble lord's own words. But if it be a question of right, and if the right be on the side of the reformer, why, I would ask, does the noble lord limit the franchise to particular districts and particular classes? Why confine the privilege of voting to those who rent a House rated at £10 a-year? The law knows no distinction in this respect between the contributors to the support of the state. Yet the noble lord not only refuses the right of voting to persons rated at less than £10, but he also disfranchises many who contribute to the public taxes, and who now possess the privilege of suffrage. I conceive the noble lord's plan to be founded altogether upon an erroneous principle. Its great defect, in my opinion, is that to which an objection has been urged with great force and ability by the hon. member for Callington. The objection is this—that it severs all connexion between the lower classes of the community and the direct representation in this House; I think it a fatal objection, that every link between the representative and the constituent body should be separated, so far as regards the lower classes. It is an immense advantage that there is at present no class of people, however humble, which is not entitled to a voice in the election of representatives. I think this system would be defective if it were extended further; but at the same time I consider it an inestimable advantage, that no class of the community should be able to say they are not entitled, in some way or other, to a share in the privilege of choosing the representatives of the people in this House. Undoubtedly, if I had to choose between two modes of representation, and two, only, and if it were put to me whether I would prefer that system which would send the hon. member for Windsor, or that which would return the hon. member for Preston, I should, undoubtedly, prefer that by which the hon. member for Windsor would be returned; but I am not in this dilemma, and am at perfect liberty to protest against a principle which excludes altogether the member for Preston. I think it an immense advantage that the class which includes the weavers of Coventry and the potwallopers of Preston has a share in the privileges of the present system. The individual right is limited, and properly limited, within narrow bounds; but the class is represented. It has its champion within your walls, the organ of its feeling, and the guardian of its interests. But what will be the effect of cutting off altogether the communication between this House and all that class of society which is above pauperism, and below the arbitrary and impassable line of £10 rental which you have selected? If you were establishing a perfectly new system of representation, and were unfettered by the recollections of the past, and by existing modes of society, would it be wise to exclude altogether the sympathies of this class? How much more unwise, when you find it possessed from time immemorial of the privilege!—to take the privilege away, and to subject a great, powerful, jealous, and intelligent, mass of your population to the injury—ay, and to the stigma, of entire uncompensated exclusion! Well, but, says my noble friend (Viscount Palmerston), “Our plan at least does this—it cures that anomaly, that absurdity of the present system, which gives to voters the right of voting for places where they do not reside.” My noble friend is shocked, that men who have, or who may acquire the right of voting for places in which they do reside, should enjoy the right of voting for other places from which they are habitually absent. Well, Sir, this at least must be admitted, that my noble friend is liberal in thus consenting to the disfranchisement of a great majority of his own constituents, the non-resident Masters of Arts of Cambridge.

Lord Palmerston.—They will still continue to vote; the rule of non-residence will not apply to Universities.

Sir Robert Peel.—Not apply to the Universities! Every non-resident voter in England to be disfranchised, except non-resident Masters of Arts! And do you think that the disfranchised class will acquiesce in the reason and justice of this exception? Why may not the non-resident voter of Norwich, who cannot find employment in the place of his nativity—who is earning an honest subsistence in London—why may not he plead just as good a reason for his absence from the town, where he is now entitled to vote, as the non-resident clergyman of Cambridge or Oxford? And mark the difference; the latter will almost certainly acquire, under this very bill, the right of voting for a district in which he does reside—the former may, probably, never be able to acquire it. To the one you give a new right of voting, and also continue to him the possession of the old one; while, to the latter, you give no new right, and yet you deprive him, for a reason which equally applies to both—namely, non-residence—of the privilege of which he is now possessed. And this is your notion of justice and conciliation! A word more as to the disfranchisement of non-resident voters. One of the loudest complaints we now hear is directed against the influence exercised over voters by their landlords. We have petition after petition pointing to what has occurred at Newark and Stamford, as one of the strongest proofs of the defective state of our representative system. What is the effect of your bill? It is to confine the right of voting to a class, the great majority of which must be tenants subject to the influence of their landlords; and to deprive of the right of voting that class whose right accrues from their being freemen of a corporation on account of birth or servitude—who are all liable, as others are, to the temptation of bribery—but who possess an inalienable right of voting, not acquired by, and in no way dependent on, the will of the aristocracy. These considerations, Sir, however important, are but subordinate, when compared with the changes which must take place in the practical working of the constitution. In defence of it, we have frequently referred with exultation to the names of those men who were indebted for their first return to Parliament to some borough of comparative insignificance, and who, had that avenue not been open, might probably have never had the opportunity of distinguishing themselves in the public service. This argument has been met, in the course of this debate, by two observations. The first fell from the member for Westminster, the second from the member for Calne. Says the member for Westminster—and the remark comes with a bad grace from a man of his ability—“I admit that the small boroughs return frequently very able men, but I think we have had too much ability; we have suffered much from the talents of able men; and I want a system of representation which will give us honest rather than able men.” I reply, first, that it is absurd to suppose that the man of ability will be less honest than the man of no ability; and, secondly, that any system which tended to exclude from this House men of the first ability of their day, would be a great practical evil. If the average of the talent and general acquirements of this House should ever be below the general average of society, this House would sink in public estimation, and the distrust in our opinions and judgments would very rapidly spread downwards, from the class of persons more enlightened than ourselves, to the great mass of society. The second observation to which I have referred fell from the member for Calne. He, too, admits that men of first-rate ability have occasionally owed their entrance into Parliament to small boroughs. "But then," says he,—and says very justly,—“we must judge of every human contrivance, not by its accidents, but by its tendencies.” “No plan of selection (says he) could be hit upon which would not give you occasionally able men;—take the hundred tallest men that you meet in the streets, you will, probably, have some able men among the number.” The cheers with which this remark was followed were so encouraging, that the hon. gentleman proceeded to illustrate his arguments by various other instances. “Take (says he) the first hundred names in the Court Guide,—adopt any other principle of selection that you will,—occasionally and accidentally able men will be ensured by it.” Now, Sir, I am content to try the merits of our present representative system by the hon. member’s own test. I repeat with him, that it is by tendencies, and not by accidents, that we are to judge of its merits. For the purpose of submitting those merits to that test, I wrote down this morning the names of those distinguished men who have appeared in this House, during the last forty or fifty years, as brilliant lights above the horizon, and whose memory, to quote the expression of Lord Plunkett, has had buoyancy enough to float down to posterity on the stream of time. I made this selection of these men, in the first instance, without a thought of the places they severally represented. I looked to their ability and their fame alone. If I have omitted any, their names may be added; but I believe the list I shall read will contain all the names that are of the highest eminence. It includes the names of Dunning, Lord North, Charles Townsend, Burke, Fox, Pitt, Lord Grenville, Sheridan, Windham, Perceval, Lord Wellesley, Lord Plunkett, Canning, Huskisson, Brougham, Horner, Romilly, Tierney, Sir William Grant, Lord Liverpool, Lord Castlereagh, Lord Grey. I will now read the names of the places for which they were respectively returned, on their first entrance into public life:—Dunning was returned for Calne—Lord North for Banbury—Burke for Wendover—Charles Townsend for Saltash—Pitt for Appleby—Fox for Midhurst—Lord Grenville for Buckingham—Sheridan for Stafford—Windham for Norwich—Lord Wellesley for Beeralston—Perceval for Northampton—Plunkett for Midhurst—Canning for Newton—Huskisson for Morpeth—Brougham for Camelford—Romilly for Queenborough—Horner for Wendover—Lord Castlereagh for the county of Down—Tierney for Southwark—Sir William Grant for Shaftesbury—Lord Grey for Northumberland—Lord Liverpool for Rye. These are the names of, I believe, the most distinguished men of the times in which they lived. They are twenty-two in number. Sixteen, on first entering public life, were returned for boroughs every one of which, without an exception, the noble lord proposes to extinguish. Some few of these distinguished men owed, it is true, their first return to a more numerous body of constituents. Mr. Sheridan was first returned for Stafford—Mr. Windham for Norwich—Lord Castlereagh for the county of Down—Mr. Tierney for Southwark—Lord Grey for Northumberland; but it is equally true that, for some cause or other, either the caprice of popular bodies, or the inconvenience of ministers of the Crown sitting for populous places, in every one of these cases the honour of the populous place is relinquished for the repose of the small borough. Mr. Sheridan quits Stafford for Ilchester—Mr. Windham takes refuge in Higham Ferrars—Mr. Tierney prefers Knaresborough to Southwark—Lord Castlereagh rejects Down for Orford—and Lord Grey consoles himself for the loss of Northumberland by appealing, with success, to the electors of Tavistock. Now, then, I have applied your own test, I have looked not to accidents but to tendencies, and I ask you, whether the tendency of the present system of representation is not to secure to distinguished ability a seat in the public councils? But, after all, this question must be determined by a reference to still higher considerations. The noble lord has pointed out the theoretical defects in our present system of representation; he has appealed to the people; he has desired them to accompany him to the green mounds of Old Sarum, and the ruined niches of Midhurst. I, too, make my appeal to that same people. I ask them, when they have finished poring over the imputed blots in their form of government, when they have completed their inspection of the impurities of Old Sarum, and Gattou, and Midhurst, I ask them to elevate their vision, O s homini sublime dedit, to include within their view a wider range than that to which the noble lord would limit them. I ask them to look back upon a period of 150 years—to bear in mind that their constitution, in its present form, has so long endured,—and I ask them where, among the communities of Europe, do you find institutions which have afforded the same means of happiness, and the same security for liberty? I conjure them to bear in mind the result of every attempt that has hitherto been made to imitate our own institutions. In France, in Spain, in Portugal, in Belgium, the utmost efforts have been exhausted to establish a form of government like ours—to adjust the nice balance between the conflicting elements of royal, aristocratical, and popular power—to secure the inestimable blessings of limited monarchy and temperate freedom. Up to this hour these efforts have signally failed—I say not from what causes, or through whose fault—but the fact of their failure cannot be denied. Look beyond the limits of Europe, and judge of the difficulties of framing new institutions for the government of man. If power can be so safely entrusted to the people—if they are so competent to govern themselves—such enlightened judges of their own interests—why has it happened that, up to this hour, every experiment to establish and regulate popular control over executive government has, with one single exception, failed? Where are the happy republics of South America? What has obstructed their formation? What has prevented the people from exercising the new power conferred upon them to the advancement of their own interest, and the confirmation of their own liberties? Let us beware how we are deluded by the example of a single successful experiment—how we conclude, that because the form of government in the United States is more popular than our own—that it would be safe, therefore, to make ours more popular than it is. The present form of the American government has not endured more than forty years. It dates its institution, not from the establishment of American independence, but from the year 1789. Even within that period, the spirit of that government has undergone a change, it is not the same as it was at its original formation; its constant tendency has been towards the establishment of a more pure and unmixed democracy. If I were to grant, that it is a form of government constantly tending towards improvement, that it is calculated permanently to guarantee vigour in war and internal repose, and to meet all the growing wants of a great nation, still the circumstances of the two countries are so totally different, that no inference could be drawn from the success of such a form of government in the United States, in favour of the application of its principles to this country. The boundless extent of unoccupied land in the United States—the absence of all remote historical recollections—of an ancient monarchy—a powerful aristocracy—an established church—the different distribution of property in the two countries, are all circumstances essentially varying the character of the institutions suitable to each country. We should do well to consider, before we consent to the condemnation of our own institutions, what are the dangers which menace states with ruin or decay. Compare our fate with that of other countries of Europe during the period of the last century and a half. Not one has been exempt from the miseries of foreign invasion,—scarcely one has preserved its independence inviolate. In how many have there been changes of the dynasty, or the severest conflicts between the several orders of the state? In this country we have had to encounter severe trials, and have encountered them with uniform success. Amid foreign wars, the shock of disputed successions, rebellion at home, extreme distress, the bitter contention of parties, the institutions of this country have stood uninjured. The ambition of military conquerors—of men endeared, by success, to disciplined armies, never have endangered, and never could endanger the supremacy of the law, or master the control of public opinion. These were the powerful instruments that shattered with impunity the staff of Marlborough, and crumbled into dust the power of Wellington. Other states have fallen from the too great influence of a military spirit, and the absorption of power by standing armies. What is the character of the armies which our commanders led to victory? The most formidable engines that skill and valour could direct against a foreign enemy; but in peace, the pliant, submissive instruments of civil power. “Give us,” says the member for Waterford, “give us for the repression of outrage and insurrection the regular army, for the people respect it for its courage, and love it for its courteous forbearance, and patience, and ready subjection to the law.” And what, Sir, are the practical advantages which we are now promised, as the consequence of the change we are invited to make,—as the compensation for the risk we must incur? Positively not one. Up to this hour, no one has pretended that we shall gain any thing by the change, excepting, indeed, that we shall conciliate the public favour. Why, no doubt, you cannot propose to share your power with half a million of men without gaining some popularity—without purchasing by such a bribe some portion of good-will. But these are vulgar arts of government; others will outbid you, not now, but at no remote period—they will offer votes and power to a million of men, will quote your precedent for the concession, and will carry your principles to their legitimate and natural consequences. On all former occasions, some inducements were held out to us to embark on this perilous voyage. We used to be told that we should acquire new securities against ruinous wars; as if every war, according to the express admission of Mr. Fox, up to the time at which he was speaking, and every subsequent war, had not been the war of the people. We used to be told that great retrenchment, great reduction of taxes, must inevitably follow reform; but we are told this no longer, since a reforming government has found it necessary to increase the public expenditure in the very year in which they propose reform. But reform is necessary for the purpose of curtailing the influence of the Crown in this House! Some say, that through the influence of the Crown, others that through the influence of the aristocracy, bad ministers are kept in office against the wishes and interests of the people; and that this is effected through the means of enormous patronage, and for the purpose of sharing in its spoils. The influence of the Crown, indeed! The power of the Peerage to maintain unpopular ministers against the public opinion! And this is gravely said at the time when you have had five different administrations in four years; five prime ministers in rapid succession, from Lord Liverpool to Lord Grey. I lament—deeply lament, the time which has been chosen for the introduction of this measure. It is brought forward at a period of great excitement; when men are scarcely sober judges of the course which it is fitting to pursue. This has been always the case with reform; it has been uniformly brought forward, either at the times of domestic calamity, or when the agitations of other states had infected us with extravagant and temporary enthusiasm for what was considered the cause of liberty. Look at the great periods of commercial or agricultural distress. You will almost invariably find reform in parliament proposed as the panacea for distress, and finding favour just so long as the distress has endured. If you find a debate on parliamentary reform, be assured that “some dire disaster follows close behind.” Look again at the political struggles in other states. They never have occurred without suggesting to us the necessity of parliamentary reform. In 1782, shortly after the great contest in North America, and the establishment of an independent and popular government in the United States, Mr. Pitt brought forward the question of parliamentary reform. It remained dormant altogether from 1785 to 1790. The revolution in France had then commenced, and Mr. Flood, who brought forward the question in 1790, appealed to the example of France as a powerful reason for adopting reform at home. He dwelt on the shame of England in being behind any other country in the race for liberty, and prophesied that France was about to establish a popular, and therefore a pacific government—abjuring all wars and all aggressions, because they were contrary to the interests of the people. We fortunately waited a short period, and found that his prophecies were not very accurately fulfilled. In 1820, revolutions took place in Italy, in Spain, and in other parts of the continent. In 1821, we had a motion for reform; and the author of that motion, the present Lord Durham, then Mr. Lambton, hailed the events that had occurred on the continent as the auspicious dawn of liberty abroad, and improvement here. He said, speaking of the force of public opinion—“Where its power and justice are acknowledged, as in Spain, the prospect is most cheering. We see disaffection instantaneously quelled, venerable and rotten abuses reformed—superstition eradicated—and the monarch and the people united under a constitution which alike secures the privileges of the one, and the liberties of the other. May I not, then, consistently hail the rising of the star, in what was once the most gloomy portion of the European horizon, as a light to show us the way through all our dangers and difficulties, as a splendid memorial of the all-conquering power of public opinion?” Again we waited, and now, I ask, was the star that appeared in Spain that steady light by which it was fitting that our steps should be guided? or was it the return of an eccentric comet, shedding "disastrous twilight," and "with fear of change perplexing monarchs?" We are arrived at 1831, and reform is again proposed, whilst the events of the last year in Paris and Brussels are bewildering the judgment of many, and provoking a restless, unquiet disposition, unfit for the calm consideration of such a question. I, too, refer to the condition of France, and I hold up the late revolution in France, not as an example, but as a warning to this country. Granted that the resistance to authority was just; but look at the effects,—on the national prosperity, on industry, on individual happiness,—even of just resistance. Let us never be tempted to resign the well-tempered freedom which we enjoy, in the ridiculous pursuit of the wild liberty which France has established. What avails that liberty which has neither justice nor wisdom for its companions—which neither brings peace nor prosperity in its train? It was the duty of the King's government to abstain from agitating this question at such a period as the present—to abstain from the excitement throughout this land of that conflict—(God grant it may be only a moral conflict!)—which must arise between the possessors of existing privileges, and those to whom they are to be transferred. It was the duty of the government to calm, not to stimulate, the fever of popular excitement. They have adopted a different course—they have sent through the land the firebrand of agitation, and no one can now recall it. Let us hope that there are limits to their powers of mischief. They have, like the giant enemy of the Philistines, lighted three hundred brands, and scattered through the country discord and dismay; but God forbid that they should, like him, have the power to concentrate in death all the energies that belong to life, and to signalize their own destruction by bowing to the earth the pillars of that sacred edifice, which contains within its walls, according even to their own admission, "the noblest society of freemen in the world."

When the right hon. baronet resumed his seat, Mr. Gisborne moved the adjournment of the debate, which was agreed to, and the adjournment ordered till the following day.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

MARCH 8, 1831.

On the sixth night of the debate on the Ministerial Plan of Parliamentary Reform, Sir James Graham having closed his speech,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose to explain. He was sure the House would not be surprised at his wishing to make an explanation, and he should, therefore, claim their indulgence. The right hon. baronet opposite had charged him with introducing personal asperity into this debate, and he hoped he might fairly say, that he never was accustomed to give occasion to such a charge. The question, however, was, who had been the aggressor; and that which the right hon. baronet alluded to had been spoken in reply to his noble friend (Lord Palmerston) who had introduced the crimination of the last ministry. The right hon. gentleman had also said, that he (Sir R. Peel) was now acting as the advocate of potwallopers. What he had said was, that if there were no alternative between the £10 franchise and the potwallopers, he would prefer the £10; but that, if they found the people were entitled to this right of voting, he doubted the policy of disfranchising them, and thus cutting off the link between the lowest order and other ranks of society. He could not see any reason why he had been thus referred to, nor was it possible that he could be a party to any attempt to obstruct the government. His introduction of the subject of Ireland was in allusion to the danger of massacre, which had been talked of. He asked why he should not be left to form his own opinion as to the amount of danger, as well as right hon. members, upon the subject of reform, as was done with respect to the proposal of the noble member for Woodstock last year, and as the members of the government themselves had acted upon this principle with respect to the repeal of the Union, upon which as great a clamour had been raised as was now raised for parliamentary reform; in this sense only had he referred to Ireland.

TIMBER DUTIES.

Lord Althorp, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved the following Resolution, in a Committee on the Timber Duties:—"That it is the opinion of this Committee, that in lieu of the duties of Customs heretofore payable, as mentioned in the table annexed, there shall be taken and received the duties following:—On all timber being eight inches square, imported from any port in the Baltic, on or after the 1st of January, 1832, there shall be payable, per load, a duty of £2 9s.; after the 1st of January, 1833, a duty of £2 3s.; and, after the 1st of January, 1834, a duty of £2."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he had never been involved in greater difficulty than in coming to a decision on the question. He expected that he should be called upon to discuss a portion of the noble lord's budget, but he found to his surprise, that, instead of having a portion of the former budget, the noble lord thought he had succeeded so well with his budget of 1831, that he had ventured to make one for 1832. He (Sir Robert Peel) was anxious to hear the matter fully discussed. He could not dismiss financial considerations, nor the interests of the consumers, nor those varied and important considerations which arose out of the question. He felt that the legislature had attempted too many experiments, and that it was not desirable to add to them by an experiment on the shipping and colonial interests. The noble lord gave no reason for the proceeding. He had himself completely changed his own view of the question, and could give no reason for the change; yet he expected that, without any consideration, all others should also adopt his altered views. The noble lord would not accede to the proposition of his right hon. friend (Mr. Herries), and have a committee similar to that of the year 1821, to enquire into the subject. Such a committee could enquire far more satisfactorily than it was possible for the whole House to discharge such a duty. They stood upon the report of the House of Commons in 1821, which went fully into the whole subject, and recommended the existing scale. The noble lord was bound to show that that report was unfounded; but not even one cogent argument had been urged to prove that to be the case, and yet they were to be excluded from that further enquiry which they desired—and this, too, when the resolutions referred only to a future year, and could not require immediate or instant decision. He did not mean to impute to the noble lord any desire to take the House by surprise, but he must say, that if such had been the noble lord's intention, he could not more completely have effected it. An hon. gentleman had said, on a preceding night, with reference to the question of reform, that the surprise of the measure then brought forward had taken away his breath; and it really appeared as if the noble lord had been anxious on this occasion, in a similar measure, to take away the breath of those on the side of the House opposite to himself. As he should not be precluded from further enquiry by supporting the amendment, and as it left the subject open to have a better and fuller enquiry before a committee, he should certainly support the motion of the hon. member for Boroughbridge.

Lord Palmerston claimed the vote of his right hon. friend (Sir R. Peel), on the ground that, as he wished for further enquiry, he ought to support the motion for reporting progress and asking leave to sit again, instead of that for the chairman to leave the chair.

Sir R. Peel was quite astonished at the observations of his noble friend. He was reluctantly, indeed, compelled, by the course which the noble lord had pursued, to prefer that proposition which would undoubtedly preclude the noble lord from proceeding further with the question at present. But why did the noble lord postpone the question to the Friday? Why postpone the discussion to the day preceding the question of Reform, which must necessarily occupy several nights? Why, too, not begin till nine at night, when, on other occasions, the important business of the evening always began at five o'clock. He could not help thinking that this singular delay was intentional; and he could not consent to allow all those important interests involved in this question to remain in a state of suspense till it accorded with the pleasure of the noble lord to fix some subsequent day for continuing the adjourned debate. Would the noble lord either allow this question to have precedence of Reform on Monday, or would he agree to the appointment of a Select Committee? If the noble lord would do neither of these things, he must vote with the hon. member for Boroughbridge.

Mr. Attwood's motion, that the Chairman do leave the Chair, was carried, on a division, by 236 against 190; majority against ministers, 46.

REFORM BILL FOR IRELAND.

MARCH 24, 1831.

In the debate upon Mr. Stanley's Bill to amend the representation of Ireland.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after the Lord Advocate, spoke as follows:—Whatever merit the speech of the learned lord may have, and its merit I do not contest,—it is not, I fear, much entitled to the praise of being well calculated to recall the attention of the House to the immediate subject of this night's debate,—namely, the Bill for Irish Reform. Says the learned lord, and apparently with great truth—"About Ireland and its representation, I know positively nothing." As to the fitness or unfitness of any one clause of the Irish Bill, the learned lord seemed to think himself wholly incapacitated to form a judgment, but I will take, thinks he, this unsuitable occasion of delivering an ingenious and powerful argument on that which is by far the most important matter in discussion—the ultimate and permanent tendencies of the general measure of reform. Sir, I quarrel not with the noble lord for having done this,—I am not so zealous a partisan that I cannot listen with satisfaction to the exercise of powerful talent, and the display of astute reasoning, even when they are arrayed against the cause which I espouse; and I listen to them, on this occasion, with the greater satisfaction, when I recollect the avenue through which the learned lord effected his entrance into parliament, and when I can appeal to them as an argument against the intended close of every such avenue for the future. Though wholly unprepared to expect the speech of the learned lord,—having concluded that nine days' debate had completed the discussion, for the present, on the general question of reform—I still feel that it would not be right to permit the learned lord's speech to pass without a reply. The learned lord has disregarded the vulgar appeals to the feelings and passions of the House; has wisely disclaimed the resort to those means by which the cheers of the unreasoning and unreflecting can at any time be easily purchased; and has attempted to establish, by a chain of temperate consecutive reasoning, that our alarms as to the tendencies of the measure of reform are visionary,—that, so far from being a revolutionary, it is a constitutional and conservative measure, and, above all—and, I must say, to my infinite surprise—to show that it has that which, in the eyes of the learned lord, is its pre-eminent merit—a tendency to diminish the democratic, and confirm and increase the aristocratic influence in this House. I will attempt to imitate the example of the learned lord, and follow him step by step in his argument. The learned lord began his speech by a vehement protest against the application of the word "revolutionary" to the measure of reform. I, for one, never have used the word revolutionary in the sense and in the mode against which the learned lord protests—that is, I have not attempted, by giving a nickname to the Bill of Reform, to excite an irrational prejudice against it; but if by revolutionary was meant, by those who did use the term, a tendency to make an immense change in the form and practical working of the constitution—a tendency to derange the well adjusted balance of opposite and conflicting powers—to introduce elements into the government of this country, untried in practice, of power almost unlimited, and in their probable effects replete with danger,—if that be the sense in which, as I believe it was, the term revolutionary was used by those who applied it, then I am prepared to vindicate its application, and to repeat the phrase as one perfectly correct and apposite. The noble lord equally objects, also, to the course of argument which has been pursued by the opponents of this measure. He says, that we confound two things which ought to be kept perfectly distinct; that the measure, if it be revolutionary, must be so, either on account of the disfranchisement of the boroughs, or on account of the change that will hereafter take place in the constitution of this House; and that we are bound in argument to assign to each of these separate causes of danger its own proper effects, and that, if we cannot prove the effects separately to be considered revolutionary, we have no right to combine those effects, and argue, from the cumulative danger, against the measure as a whole. Certainly, Sir, nothing could be more convenient to the learned lord than to confine within such limits the reasoning of his opponents, but what pretext can there be for prescribing such limits? What could be more rational or more just than, supposing that any given measure should recognise principles that shake the foundations of property, and the security of chartered rights, and should, at the same time, introduce perilous changes in the working of the constitution—what could be more rational than to argue, “Your measure is unjust in its principle, and is dangerous in its tendency; and it is from the combined considerations of injustice and danger of unconstitutional precedent, and imminent positive evil, that I am compelled to reject it, and reject it by the peculiarly fitting name of a revolutionary measure?” If then, Sir, I am entitled, in estimating the merits of this measure, to consider its general scope and character, let us see what is the amount of the practical change which is made by one stroke in the representative system of the United Kingdom? It is proposed to destroy the proportions which are at present established between the several parts of the United Kingdom. There is to be an addition to the representative body of Ireland; an addition to that of Scotland; a small addition to that of Wales: all these additions made on no defined principle, and at the same time that they are made, no less than sixty-two members are to be withdrawn from the representation of England. The constituent body in every place, county, city, and borough, is to be materially changed—the limits of almost every city and borough in England must inevitably be changed—the limits of all, without exception, are liable to be changed—to be changed, not by law, but by the arbitrary discretion of the Privy Council. By this bill there are not more than fifty cities or towns in England which can, by possibility, retain their former limits, so far as their borough or electoral jurisdiction is concerned; and those fifty are liable to have their limits changed, if it shall so please a committee of the Privy Council. But above all, by this bill the right of the returning members for towns and cities in every part of the United Kingdom is hereafter to be intrusted to one predominant class of the people—that class, subject to the same influences, whether for good or evil, swayed by the same sympathies, agitated by the same passions, combined by the same interests. Is that an unfair description of the scheme of reform? Now if you had done that which you have totally omitted to do—proved that, a priori at least, it was a beautiful scheme—if you had given, which you have not given, convincing reasons for altering the relative proportions of the representation of the United Kingdom—if you had established any sufficient ground for the extensive disfranchisement you propose, and had demonstrated the policy of the new qualifications you are about to establish—if you had done all these things—not one of which you have attempted—still I should distrust your predictions as to the future practical working of your beautiful speculative scheme—I should distrust them, from the experience of repeated failures in cases wherein, a priori, there had been just as good reason to expect success. Does the learned lord think there is no hazard in extensive change, apart from any consideration of the nature and character of that change? Does the learned lord think, that it is wise in any country, above all in a country like this—of institutions so ancient—of interests so complicated—of relations of society so artificial—to abandon the magic influence of prescription—to resign the unpurchasable benefit of those associations which connect the present with the ages that are past, of those feelings and affections of the heart, that in every clime, and under every form of government, are the unseen prompters of loyalty—the true motives of cheerful obedience? You may frown upon them as irrational prejudices. They are no such thing—they are the impulse of a wise and provident nature—the checks upon the restless appetite for change—the unerring instincts that were purposely planted in the heart “to correct and fortify the feeble contrivances of reason.” Such are the aids of good government which the learned lord’s scheme has rejected. And yet he tells us, after abandoning the main, the only guarantee against perpetual innovation, that the chief merit of the scheme is—that it is a final settlement. A final settlement!—it cannot be final. If the principles upon which it rests be good,

—if the arguments which are its sole vindication be conclusive—they are conclusive against its being a settlement of the question of reform. What avails it that reformers are agreed upon the acceptance of it? What consolation is it to me that the member for Middlesex (Mr. Hume) has sent forth his circulars, enjoining unanimity for the present? “Waive,” says he (I quote one of his letters), “all discussion about the ballot—be silent about annual parliaments—above all, praise the ministers, and take the present good they offer you.” Why, Sir, he might just as well have added—what he has thought it politic to conceal, but which he meant to imply. “Seize the instrument which this Bill puts into your hand—occupy the commanding position which will enable you to extort all that you can wish.” What avails it that the Ballot is now kept in the background? If the advocate for the Ballot could say with truth, that this Bill was a compensation for the loss of the Ballot—that it was an equivalent, which he could accept in the lieu of the Ballot—there might be some pretence for his supposed compromise; but if this bill only fortifies his arguments in favour of the Ballot—if it establishes a new class of voters, peculiarly liable to that aristocratic influence, which the learned lord says will be so copiously and so successfully exerted—what pretext has the advocate for the Ballot to postpone, beyond the passing of this bill, the assertion of his own views? When the learned lord says this settlement will be a final one, he is so far right that probably, for a short time, there may be a general wish, at least on the part of the reformers, to acquiesce in its provisions. The expectation of great benefits—gratitude for new privileges—the pleasure of novelty, may secure a short trial for the new constitution. But these impressions will gradually grow weaker. The classes that are left unrepresented will begin to stir—they will read the preamble of the bill—and with some justice, enquire why they should be excluded from its benefits? Every one naturally seeks for an illustration of his argument, from some place of which he has a local knowledge; and I shall be obliged to the learned lord if he will now favour me with the answer to the claim which I am about to prefer on behalf of the place of my nativity. I have no interest in preferring it—no property in the place—no peculiar motive for wishing its prosperity, except one, which the learned lord, I suppose, will reject as a mere prejudice—that it was the place of my birth, and remains endeared to me by the first and most durable impressions that are made on the mind. Now I ask the learned lord, what will be his answer to the parish of Bury, in the county of Lancaster, supposing that two years hence it puts forward its claim to the representation? It will—at least it may—allege, that it had, in 1821, a population of 34,500 inhabitants—that it included large manufacturing establishments. It may remind you that you confiscated the franchise of thirty boroughs—curtailed that of forty-seven—that you contended you had a perfect right to do this, in order to transfer the privilege to more important and more populous places. Then will Bury put this perplexing question—“Why exclude me from the privilege of sending a single member to parliament, and continue to the town of Malton the privilege of sending two?” What is your answer? Surely, not prescription—surely, not chartered rights. Oh, no! You have no better answer than this:—“That the same population return which assigned to Bury 34,500 inhabitants, assigned to Malton 4,005; and the privilege of Malton rested on this sure and stable foundation, that, ten years since, it had actually five inhabitants more than the number of 4,000.” How satisfactory to Bury! In 1821, three prolific ladies of Malton protected their native place from spoliation, by clubbing among them the number of five children. Charter is nothing—prescription is nothing—but two pair of twins, born ten years ago, are the guardians of the privileges of Malton; and the bar to the claims of Bury. I suppose, however, that Bury should cheerfully acquiesce in the superior claims of Malton. What will it say to Gateshead? Gateshead is an upstart like itself, with nothing but population to plead; and when the parish of Bury shall have proved to you, that whilst its population was 34,500, the population of Gateshead was less than 12,000, what is the answer which you will make to the claim of Bury to be admitted to a privilege which has been conferred on Gateshead? So much for the prospects of the final settlement of the learned lord. I approach another branch of the argument of the learned lord. He says, that the balance of the constitution has been destroyed—that the popular rights have been invaded—that the ancient theory of the constitution is in favour of a popular assembly controlling the prerogative of the Crown, and balancing the power of the House of Peers. When the learned lord reverts to ancient theories of the constitution, will he revert to them all? And if he does not, is he not deranging, instead of adjusting, a balance between opposing powers? If the learned lord could find, in his history of the constitution, any precedent or preamble on which it could be right to give to the people a controlling power, such as he would give to them; and if the learned lord thinks it advisable now to reinstate the people in the possession of that power; surely it would be right, at the same time, to restore to the Crown those countervailing prerogatives, which it would be necessary, by the learned lord's theory of the constitution—that the Crown should not only nominally possess—but be enabled practically to exercise. Can the learned lord do this? Can he remount to the ages of comparative barbarism, and restore to the Crown, for any practical purpose, its slumbering prerogatives? Can he draw from the ancient armouries of the constitution the rusty weapon of the veto, with which the Crown once could check popular encroachments? Why, sir, if he cannot do this for the Crown, let him beware how he resorts to ancient theories of the constitution, which can only be partial in their application. The learned lord, however, asks these questions;—"What can be the danger of intrusting power to that industrious, intelligent, enlightened class of society, to whom the present bills give the right of voting? Are they incompetent judges of their own interests? Are they disloyal? On the contrary, are not the people of this country distinguished for loyalty, and for almost an undue deference to rank and station?" I answer the noble lord thus:—"When you have once established the overpowering influence of the people over this House—when you have made this House the express organ of the public voice;—what other authority in the state can,—nay, more, what other authority of the state ought—to control its will, or reject its decisions? The people are the judges of their own interests—the people are enlightened and well affected to the throne, the House of Commons is the organ of the people—who will presume to check its patriotic course? Let not this question be decided by mere abstract reasoning—by calculations of opposite probabilities:—look at the history of your own country—at the history of all other countries, and enquire, whether it is not the tendency of every popular assembly to assume power to itself, and to encroach on the authority of other co-existing institutions? The assumption of such power is no necessary evidence of evil intentions; it may commence with patriotic views—it may be compatible with good government;—but the question for us is this,—is it compatible with the good government of this country, and with the maintenance of a limited monarchy? Look at the early history of the National Assembly of France. I say the early history—for I purposely avoid the reference to the latter stages of the French Revolution, because I want not to scare you with the visions of rapine and of blood.—Of whom was the National Assembly composed? Of men of great acquirements—of high moral character—of men who professed the most devoted loyalty to the Crown, and who assured Louis XVI. that the only danger he incurred was from the exuberant affection of the people of France. Mark the gradual, but rapid progress by which all power was absorbed;—and mark the difficulty—the real difficulty, of maintaining in argument—that the National Assembly, deriving its powers immediately from the people, was not competent to exercise, and ought not to exercise, the sovereign power of the state. A question arose, not long after the formation of the assembly, "In what authority ought the prerogative of declaring war and making peace reside?" Mirabeau, at that time among the warm advocates for popular privilege, contended, notwithstanding, that that special prerogative should continue in the Crown. He was overwhelmed by the reply of Barnave, who asked, naturally and justly, why, if the people understood their interests—why, if the National Assembly was faithful to their constituents, and was the mirror of the popular will—why should they devolve on a single individual (possibly on a child, possibly on a man of weak understanding) the exercise of a prerogative which involved the interests, and might hazard the existence of France? So difficult was it for Mirabeau to resist the popular torrent, that, in his reply to Barnave, he bitterly complained that he had been denounced in the streets of Paris as a traitor to the cause of the people, for maintaining what he thought an essential prerogative of the Crown. I cannot but think that even the discussions in which we are at this moment engaged, afford an example of the probable power which any authority will hereafter possess to control the voice of a House of Commons, much more popular in its origin than the present. Who asks now what course the House of Lords will take with respect to this bill, should it pass the House of Commons? It seems taken for granted, that it must pass the House of Lords—that it would be vain to oppose a measure that extends popular privileges, and is said to be in conformity with the wishes of the majority of the people. The same impression will exist in a still stronger degree, hereafter, with respect to all popular measures which a reformed House of Commons may offer for the acceptance of the House of Lords. The tendency on the part of this House will be to gratify their constituents by popular measures, and to increase their own power; and the countervailing influence of any of the authorities in the state will become gradually weaker, and, ultimately, owe its bare existence to its practical disuse. It may be said, that no such consequences follow in the United States of America, and that the Senate of that country can resist, with effect, measures proposed by the popular assembly, of which it disapproves. But let it be remembered, that the Senate of that country is no hereditary aristocracy—that it derives its authority from the same source which confers all authority in that country—the choice of the people; and that the conflict, therefore, between the two branches of the legislature in the United States is the conflict of one portion of the people with another. “But,” says the learned lord, “the House of Commons will be less democratical in its new form than it now is.” “It is a mistake,” argues the learned lord, “to suppose, that because the close boroughs are destroyed, therefore the influence of the aristocracy has ceased. Friendly ties will still continue to exist between the landlord and the tenant, and can it be doubted that the latter will adopt the opinions, and act upon the wishes of the former?” But, Sir, if this be the case, whither has fled all the indignation that has been directed against such influence; and what becomes of the standing order, which we have had so often quoted, declaring any interference of peers in elections unconstitutional? I am afraid that this is one of those cases referred to by the member for Milborne Port, in which “the sarcasm destroys the syllogism, and the argument is lost in the vituperation.” It is said, that there is a strange inconsistency among the opponents of the measure,—that some admit that the aristocratical influence may be maintained, and that others assert that it will inevitably be destroyed. It may seem very absurd, but I see no inconsistency in the same person holding nearly a similar doctrine. I cannot deny that, in times of political quiet, the just influence of the landlord will tell upon the tenant—that the influence of gratitude, of interest, of deference to authority, will be felt; but what I fear is, that when the storm rises—when the passions of the people are excited—when the press is exercising its mighty power, all in one direction, and on that class which has just education enough to be peculiarly liable to its influence—then I fear the same consequences will follow, that have followed in Ireland; excitement and agitation will overbear the weight of gratitude and of interest, and all the ordinary motives of action—then, I fear, the remaining barriers you will have left against popular encroachment, will be swept away by some sudden and irresistible influx of the tide. The learned lord says that, on a former night, I argued unjustly in favour of the maintenance of the small boroughs, by making an unfair selection of the eminent men whom they had returned to parliament. He says, if I gave the names of the eminent men, I ought also to have given those of the useless and undistinguished members, and that the number of the latter would have greatly predominated. Of course it would; but this was not the principle of my selection. I took the names of all those persons (without the least reference, in the first instance, to the place by which they were returned) who had been the most eminent in the annals of parliament. One omission I made, and I rejoice in the opportunity of repairing it—I omitted the name of Mr. Ricardo—a name for which I have true respect. I took twenty men, the most celebrated of the times in which they lived, and I enquired by what means they came into parliament? Surely, if I found that sixteen or seventeen were returned for the small boroughs, and not more than three or four for the populous districts, it was fair to argue that the total extinction of the small boroughs would probably exclude great talents that would otherwise gain admission to the House. But, said the

hon. gentleman, the member for Milborne Port, many of the eminent men, returned for small boroughs, were advocates for Parliamentary Reform, and were among the most enlightened friends of popular rights. So much the better for my argument. If the members for the decayed boroughs had been infected by a narrow corporation spirit—if they had, indeed, been curvæ in terris animæ, ac celestium inanes—then you would have justly demanded the abolition of the system which sent them here; but if you have found among them men of expansive minds, who justly claim for themselves the privilege of representing, not the decayed borough that sent them here, but the universal people—then, I contend, they reflect a lustre on the humble origin from which they derived the opportunity of personal distinction and the means of public service. Sir, I have referred to the member for Milborne Port (Mr. Sheil); I heard his speech with great satisfaction. I was consoled by the reflection, that I had contributed, by that measure which cost me so much uneasiness, to wean great talents, great powers of eloquence, from popular agitation, and to find for them a fitter and worthier occasion for their display. I thought, too, I saw an argument in favour of that system which the hon. gentleman was condemning—when I recollected, that although the popular constituency of an Irish county had rejected the hon. gentleman—the avenue of a decayed borough had been opened to him—and that Milborne Port had bestowed the distinction which the county of Louth had refused. I asked myself, by what means—when we have made, by this bill, the mere local interests predominate in every town and district in England,—when we shall have established not one, but 200 Bassetlaws,—by what means will the hon. gentleman effect his future return to Parliament? Must he, hereafter, have to stoop to agitation, to conciliate the favour of an Irish constituency? or, disdaining to do it, must he retire discomfited, before either the purse of a richer, or the exciting violence of a less scrupulous rival? One word more to the hon. gentleman. When he stood on that floor, discussing the interests of the mightiest empire of the world, when he was heard with mute attention; or cheered by the animating voice of this assembly,—did he feel it no advantage—no distinction to Ireland,—that an imperial parliament was open to her distinguished sons? Never, never, if I were he, would I consent to relinquish that privilege for my country,—never would I consent to banish such talents and acquirements as his from the councils of a great empire; and send them back to the narrow arena of a local parliament in Dame-street—to the discussion of Dublin police and Dublin paving boards—and all the comparatively petty subjects of mere Irish legislation. Sir, I have been seduced far away from the subject under immediate consideration—the details of the bill for Irish Reform. I was greatly disappointed by the speech of the right hon. gentleman who introduced it. I expected a statesmanlike exposition of its principles,—an enlarged view of its probable bearings on all the great interests of property, of establishments, of religion, which it so deeply involves. I have heard nothing but a dry explanation of the clauses of the bill, which I could just as well have collected from the reading of the marginal notes. I consider it a great mistake, that you propose to disturb the relative proportions of the constituency of the United Kingdom. As if reform was not a subject difficult enough for the grasp of the government, they embarrass it with extrinsic difficulties, which every prudent man would be most cautious to avoid, and which it was totally unnecessary to incur. What have you gained by giving five additional members to Ireland—while you deprived England of sixty-two? Why, that an Irish member is the first to complain, and tell you, that if you are to disturb the proportions, you ought to disturb them on some principle. The singular grievance is, not that Ireland gains five additional members, but that she does not gain ten. The hon. member for Kilkenny has another ground of complaint: he says—and really I know not who is to answer him—“While you are about it, why not reform effectually, and on some intelligible principle? You disregarded charters, you laugh at established usage—then why, as you are unfettered by all such considerations, not give representation according to the wants of the country?” The hon. gentleman then observed,—that if you draw a line from Londonderry to Cape Clear, on the east side of that line there is representation in abundance, on the west side a lamentable want of it—twenty or twenty-five places on the east side; five only on the west. Says the hon. gentleman, “What is the consequence? Such are the blessings of representation, that the eastern parts of Ireland are flourishing in prosperity, while the western coast is languishing in decay." What then!—have the small boroughs in Ireland so effectually answered the object of their institution—are their members such watchful guardians of Irish interests, that the prosperity of Irish provinces varies directly with the amount of Irish representation? If this be so, it may be a good argument for adding to the number of boroughs in the west of Ireland, but it does not seem a very cogent argument for destroying the system with which the prosperity of the east has been interwoven. The solicitor-general for Ireland has greatly surprised me by attempting to shew, without the shadow of foundation, that the act of union with Ireland expressly contemplated a probable future variance in the proportions of the representation assigned by that act to the two portions of the United Kingdom. The fourth article of the act of union expressly declares, that 100 members shall sit and vote in the imperial parliament as the members for Ireland. I appeal, not to lawyers, but to men of common sense, whether the plain meaning and intention of this be not, that so long as 558 members sit for the rest of the United Kingdom, 100 members shall sit for Ireland. I do not question the competency of parliament to vary the proportions; if ten additional members would really benefit Ireland—would promote her peace and ensure her prosperity, for God's sake let her have them; but this I do deny, that the act of union has made any provision for the increase of the Irish representation, or contains a syllable from which the expectation of such increase, to the disturbance of the proportion fixed at the time of the union, could be inferred. The member for Boroughbridge was very facetious on the solicitor-general for Ireland; and, because he consents to the destruction of his own borough—the borough of Saltash—compares him to the incendiary of the temple of Ephesus, who was content, by any means, to secure notoriety for himself. Now, Sir, it appeared to me, that the solicitor-general was much more prudent than the incendiary. Three-fourths of his speech was a canvassing speech, addressed to the students of Trinity College, Dublin; and if the learned gentleman can effect his own return for the additional seat which the college is to acquire by this bill—what the member for Boroughbridge calls "the spirit of Ephesian destruction" will entail no great sacrifice; he can afford to set fire to the hovels at Saltash, if he can immediately afterwards take refuge in the more splendid edifice which this bill will construct for his reception. Sir, there is no part of the whole measure of reform which is pregnant with consequences so important as this remodelling of the constituency and representation of Ireland. I fear the result—and above all—I deprecate the time at which the experiment is made. Two years only have elapsed since that great change in the internal policy of Ireland was effected; and, before there is any sufficient experience of its practical operation, we are called upon to make another change, that puts to imminent hazard the securities we provided against the danger of the first. It is now beyond the control of parliament to remedy the evils which are, in my opinion, inseparable from the course which the king's government has pursued. In the completion of their measures, I see the utmost danger; and who is there that can look with satisfaction on the consequences of their rejection? Who does not see, that the moment the king's ministers have, with the king's sanction, denounced the constitution of this branch of the Legislature—have proclaimed the necessity of an effectual change—have invited great masses of the people to a share in the privileges and authority of government: who does not see, that, whatever be the abstract merits of the question of reform, the practical position of that question is materially altered? Still, Sir, I must compare the consequences of passing this measure of reform, with the consequences of rejecting it. It is with this measure as a whole, with which we have to deal—which we must accept or reject—but which we are not, it seems, at liberty, in any material respect to modify. If that be the alternative, I must reject it; for, with my opinion as to the ultimate effects, in this country and in Ireland, of the measures now under our consideration—I should, in the words of Mr. Fox, be "a traitor to my King, to my country, and to my own conscience, if I did not prefer the constitution to popular favour"—and if I did not protect the rights and interests of the people, when they are threatened by their own delusion and excitement.

Sir Robert Peel complained, that his noble friend had dealt unfairly with his argument as to the admission of copyholders to vote. When he enumerated the changes which the bill would work in the constituency, he referred to the admission of copyholders in counties as one element. As to the argument he had used being against all reform, he should not enter on that question, but he repeated, that, seeing the difference of opinion between that House and the late ministry on the subject of reform, for though they were turned out on the Civil List, he believed there would have been an expression of opinion on the subject of reform, which would have made it very difficult for them to have carried on the government, as the new ministry was formed on the principle of some reform, he (Sir Robert Peel) said, he was prepared, as an individual, to make a compromise on that subject, and to support a measure of moderate reform, if such had been introduced. After the course taken by the ministers on this subject, however, the position of every man was changed. [The right hon. baronet was here interrupted by cries of "Spoke, spoke."] He did not mean to trespass further on that courtesy which permitted a member to explain, than merely to guard against wrong inferences being drawn from what he had said, and to prevent sentiments being ascribed to him which he had never professed.

THE REFORM BILL.

On the motion that the Speaker leave the Chair,

SIR R. PEEL took the liberty of calling the attention of the noble lord opposite to matters of detail connected with the Reform Bill, which involved considerations of very great importance. For the purpose of his argument in this case he would assume, that the principle was perfectly correct, and he would assume that it was expedient, to disfranchise sixty boroughs, and take away the privilege of returning one member from forty-seven, that the right might hereafter be transferred to places of greater population. But, supposing that he admitted the principle to be a proper one in itself, he was sure the noble lord would agree with him that the principle ought to be applied in a manner conformable to justice, and he thought it was of extreme importance, before the House went into a committee, that they should guard against doing an injustice, which manifestly would be done, if the disfranchisement were made to fall on places of a larger population than others that were not disfranchised. He was sure that the position which he had laid down would be acquiesced in, both by the friends and opponents of the bill. One of the returns on the table contained an account of the population in the different cities and boroughs in England, and, amongst others, of those which it was intended wholly to disfranchise, and of those from which one member was to be withdrawn. The return professed to be a return of the population in each city and borough; but he apprehended that it was not. In some cases it was a return of the population of the parish in which the borough was situated; and in other cases it was a return of the population, not in the parish, but in the borough. It was quite clear that the House ought either to take the population in the parish or in the borough, and apply the rule indiscriminately to all places. He need not demonstrate the inconveniences of applying the principle in one case, and not applying it in the other. Take the case of the borough which he represented, with respect to which it was evidently a duty he owed to his constituents, to prevent the application of an unjust principle towards them. The parish in which Tamworth was situated contained 7,500 inhabitants. That part of the parish within the jurisdiction of the borough did not, in 1821, contain more than 3,500 inhabitants; therefore, according to the schedule of the bill, Tamworth would be deprived of one of its representatives.—Take the case of the borough of Bridgewater, or take the case of the borough of Calne. Calne appeared to contain a population of 5,600 inhabitants; and if the limits of the borough were identical with the limits of the parish, Calne ought not to be disfranchised; but if the limits of the borough were smaller than those of the parish, and it contained less than 4,000 inhabitants—it did not contain more than 3,500—there was no just principle upon which Calne should be protected and Tamworth disfranchised. Without himself moving for any returns, he would suggest to the noble lord opposite, that the application of the principle should be made consistently with perfect justice, and he would therefore advise the noble lord immediately to procure returns which would show what the population was in each parish and each borough. It appeared on the face of the return, that the parish of Bridgewater was co-extensive with the borough, but that only one-third part of the parish was entitled to vote for representatives. Thus, although Bridgewater had 5,000 inhabitants, as far as the parish was concerned, yet, as far as the borough was concerned, he strongly suspected there would not be found 4,000 inhabitants within its limits. If this principle were applied to every borough, it would be found that in many there was no cause for disfranchisement.

APRIL 13, 1831.

In a discussion which arose out of the presentation by Mr. Western, of a petition from Essex, in favour of the Reform Bill,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he thought, that as it was now Wednesday, and the Reform Bill stood for commitment on Monday next, it was important for all parties to know the course which government proposed to take. In particular he should like to know whether it would be proposed to make any addition, beyond the number, contemplated originally in the bill, of members to Ireland and Scotland. If that were the case, he hoped the representatives of England would not permit themselves to be betrayed by a false liberality to acquiesce, without the fullest consideration, in any proposition prejudicial to England. He wished, therefore, to know, whether the additional representatives were to be distributed among the three parts of the United Kingdom; and whether, while proposing to make an addition to the representation of Ireland and Scotland, that opportunity was to be taken to deprive England of fifty or sixty members, which it was now entitled to send to parliament? Both these questions involved considerations of the greatest importance, which ought to be reserved for separate discussion. He understood ministers had discovered, that in the original schedules, some errors were made with respect to particular boroughs, which did not fall within the principle of the bill, but which would be disfranchised if the returns on which those schedules were framed were strictly adhered to. Would the noble lord now state whether he intended to admit the population of parishes as a test by which this disfranchisement was to be regulated; and next, whether government proposed to take the sense of the House by a division on the question of the reduction of the number of the English representatives? What he understood the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) to have said the other night was this—that he did not mean to restore the proportion between the representation of the different kingdoms established at the time of the union; that he intended to increase the number of representatives returned by Scotland and Ireland; yet, finding that there was a strong feeling in the House adverse to the reduction of the number of the English representatives, he proposed not to restore the schedule A. or the schedule B, but to make up to England the present amount of representatives in some way or other. He, and he believed every man in London, had so understood the noble lord. Gentlemen now proposed to correct the errors in the schedules A and B, and the correction of those errors would of itself tend to restore to England some portion of the representatives; and by that arrangement there might probably remain to England forty members less than at present. Now, he wished to know, whether that was a question on which the House was to be called upon to declare its opinion by a division? He also wished to know whether it was proposed to enter into the consideration of all these important questions on Monday next; on which day the House was to be informed, for the first time, of the names of several places to which government proposed to extend the right of representation?

Lord Althorp having replied,—

Sir Robert Peel said, the bill was then a perfectly new one. It was a new bill, and on Monday next the House would be called upon, not to consider its principle, but to go into its details. By some towns it now appeared the privilege of returning members was to be retained; and, besides having to take this alteration into consideration, the House would also have, on Monday next, to determine whether a parish in which a given town stood, was a town parish, or country one. On Monday next, too, it would be proposed to give the privilege of returning members to a certain number of new places. Was it consistent with strict justice, that the House should not have four or five days to consider those matters before it was called upon to agree to them? If after four months' deliberation, the government had proved to be fallible, was it not possible for the House to fall into error, if it should be called to decide on these important subjects without full time for consideration.

NEGRO SLAVERY.

Mr. Fowell Buxton moved the following Resolution:—"That in the resolutions of the 15th of May 1823, the House distinctly recognised it to be their solemn duty to take measures for the abolition of slavery in the British Colonies; that in the eight years which have since elapsed, the colonial assemblies have not taken measures to carry the resolutions of the House into effect; that deeply impressed with a sense of the impropriety, inhumanity, and injustice of colonial slavery, this House will proceed to consider of, and adopt the best means of effecting its abolition throughout the British dominions."

In the debate which followed, SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Dr. Lushington, said, that if there were any prospect of carrying into effect the resolutions of the hon. member for Weymouth, he could understand the speech of the hon. and learned member who had just sat down. But when the ministers said that the colonial assemblies must carry the measures of emancipation into effect, he could not understand how the hon. and learned gentleman could make a speech so full of vituperation, nor how such a speech could promote the object he had in view. He did not mean to vindicate the conduct of the colonial assemblies; he was not satisfied with the course they had pursued; but if it were true, that the time was not come when we could interfere, it was not prudent to indulge in such language, and to censure so heavily those who must continue the masters and legislators of the slaves. He thought that the noble lord (Althorp), whose moderation on this question had always been conspicuous, must have been much disappointed by the speech of the hon. and learned member, and still more disappointed by the speech of the noble lord who was the representative of the colonial government in that House. He certainly felt as much indignation at the atrocities which had been adverted to as any man, but he hoped that no feeling of compassion for the slaves would be suffered to pervert the cool and deliberate judgment of the House, and hurry it into actions that might be equally injurious to the interests of the slaves, the interests of humanity, and the interests of the planters. He entreated the House not to be too hasty in coming to any resolutions. Already they had experienced the inconvenience of pledging themselves as to some course in relation to the Abolition of Slavery to be pursued hereafter. He trusted that the House would be careful not to imitate the former plan, and would not adopt another resolution to be hereafter carried into effect. He called, therefore, on the House to refuse to express any opinion that night on either of the resolutions which had been proposed; one of which—that moved by the noble lord—a great many of the members had not heard read. It was impossible, indeed, that the House should with propriety express an opinion on those resolutions. He again conjured the House not to pledge themselves. He remembered, that last year he had refused to pledge himself upon a motion which had been made by the present Lord Chancellor, calling on the House to pledge itself to take the situation of the slaves into its consideration at an early period of this session, with a view to their speedy emancipation. But now the government, of which that noble lord was a member, declined to deal with the question, and proposed that it should be left to the House of Representatives in the Colonies. Nothing was so unwise as for the House to pledge itself to any course to be adopted hereafter, and he conjured the House to pause before it assented either to the resolutions moved by the hon. member for Weymouth or by the noble lord. He would ask, was the proposition of the noble lord even consistent with justice? The learned gentleman who last addressed the House (Dr. Lushington) had intimated to them, that the free civilized population were ready to use their utmost efforts to compel the refractory whites to obey the orders of the government. He had told them that 70,000 persons—for such is said to be the number of the free-coloured population—were ready, with the aid of the army, to accomplish what was desired. Oh! he lamented to hear such arguments made use of in that House. He lamented to hear the appeal to mere brute force brought forward as one of the arguments to induce the House to give its assent to the proposition now before it. He asked again, was it consistent with justice to subject the sugar cultivated by the free-coloured population to additional duty, because the white legislature, over which they could have no control, refused to obey the resolutions of the government? Again, did the noble lord fully estimate the difficulties which stood in the way of his carrying the resolutions into effect? The noble lord might subject the estates of particular refractory proprietors to the duties of which he had spoken. That he (Sir Robert Peel) could understand. But was he sure that the legislatures which refused to obey the orders in council, were really so much under the control of the proprietors of estates who were disposed themselves to obedience? He had heard much of the iniquity of punishing the inhabitants of certain town-lands in Ireland, by compelling all to pay the fines which were incurred by the offences of a few; but certainly that iniquity would be fully equalled by the execution of the project of the noble lord with respect to the planters of the West Indies. The noble lord believed that he held a sufficient control over the planters, through the means of their avarice, when he threatened them with additional duties; but he might find there were more serious and more powerful passions to be conquered. He might find there was pride to be overcome. He might find there was a spirit of resistance to what they believed to be oppression, which would prove too powerful for their legislative enactments, and which would hamper the working of the most energetic resolutions. There was another absurdity connected with these resolutions, which the noble lord did not seem to have taken into consideration. Sugar was said to be the most profitable article of cultivation, as well as the most destructive to the life of the slave. What, then, would be the consequence of the duties which the noble lord proposed to place on that article? The noble lord laid a duty which amounted to prohibition on the refractory colonies, and therefore encouraged those which consented to comply with the orders of the government. What, he asked, would be the consequence of this? Why that the increase of the consumption would increase the labour for the purposes of supply, and the noble lord would give a premium which benefited the obedient planter, but inflicted additional labour, and, therefore, additional injury, on the innocent slave. Did the House know the ease with which the cultivation of particular crops was changed in the West Indies, and land which grew coffee could be converted into plantations for the produce of sugar? He would give them an instance of it. In the year 1817 the Isle of Mauritius produced only 96,000 cwt. of sugar; but in consequence of certain regulations, passed with respect to the admission of the produce of that colony, in three years afterwards that quantity was quadrupled, being, in the year 1820, near 400,000 cwt. Again, there was another objection to the resolutions. Every one knew there were certain commercial reasons, advantages and regulations, which made this country the dépôt for all the sugar supplied to the continent of Europe. Had the noble lord considered well the consequence of depriving this country of all that carrying trade, and making America the storehouse, and its shipping the means of transit, of all the sugar consumed throughout the world? These would be some of the effects of agreeing to the resolutions; and he therefore asked the House to ponder upon and consider them before they decided. Even if it should be considered just, to deal with the colonies in this manner, he thought that they should not pass the resolutions immediately, but give notice, on the contrary, to the colonists, that at some future time to be named they would impose such regulations on those which continued refractory. The noble lord, the Under Secretary for the Colonies, said, however, there were other plans behind this, and he had explained to it the terms of a document which was yet in the archives of the Colonial Office, but which was to be sent out to the colonies, and which their legislatures were to adopt, not in substance, but in every letter, not abating even one. His ears were still ringing with the declarations of the government on another great and important question? his ears were still ringing with the declaration that the House must take the bill—the whole bill, and nothing but the bill. And yet schedule A had been altered, and schedule B had been altered, and other parts of the bill would doubtless also be altered; and were they then to be told that there was something behind these resolutions;—that in agreeing to them they were also agreeing to a document which they had not seen, of the contents of which they knew nothing, except from the noble lord's statement, and which might be doomed to similar alterations? Were they, he would ask, on such a statement, to adopt such resolutions? The noble lord said in substance, "I feel entire confidence that the document, which the House has not seen, but which is to be sent to the West Indies, and which the Colonial Assemblies are to be told they must adopt, under the penalty of having the Sugar Duties increased—I feel entire confidence, said the noble lord, that this document will have every support in the House of Commons." He must, however, say, that if there was any spirit in the House of Commons, they would reject that resolution, which was but the taking the first step in a course of proceeding of which the issue was to be the sending such a document to an independent legislature. He would say no more, but he would repeat, that, if the House of Commons had any spirit, it would refuse to adopt a resolution which was to be carried to such an extremity.

Several other members having spoken, and Sir Robert Peel having explained, the debate was adjourned.

REFORM BILL COMMITTEE.

APRIL 19, 1831.

In an adjourned debate of the Reform Bill Committee,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he rose rather for the purpose of bringing this discussion to a conclusion, for it seemed to him that the attention of the House was exhausted, and that nothing further could be said upon the subject, than to enter into any lengthened remarks on the measure which had then been so long under discussion. Delay, too, had this disadvantage, that it propagated itself; and if it were resorted to on this occasion it would only be resorted to again. He had purposely avoided rising immediately after the speech of the hon. and learned member for Waterford, for he was afraid that he might catch the contagion of the spirit of that speech. If he had caught it, he should only have done so from the temporary excitement of the debate, for he had not been habituated, with respect to that hon. member's country, to entertain the feelings that had pervaded his speech with respect to this country. He had a deeper and a better reason for feeling a strong interest in the prosperity of Ireland than existed in the mere circumstance of the union of the two countries. Six years of his early life had been passed in Ireland, and he entertained feelings of kindness towards it, and an interest in its prosperity, which he trusted would never expire. But where, he would ask—where was the man who did not feel that the interests of this part of the empire were involved in those of Ireland, and that any thing which impeded the prosperity of Ireland must react upon England; and that he who was sordid and mean enough to hope to gain an undivided advantage for this country, would hope it in vain, for one of the two countries could never procure a benefit at the expense of the other? While he listened to that speech, and to the sort of contest that had been excited with respect to Irish and English interests, he could not but draw a melancholy foreboding of what were likely to be the consequences of the subject-matter of this night's discussion. Why was it necessary that this question of reform should be mixed up with that of the relative proportions of the number of members? Why had the government abandoned the prescriptive number, and proposed to establish a different proportion in the number of members from different parts of the British empire. Why was it to be taken for granted in the argument, that the attempt to purify England necessarily involved a spirit of hostility towards Ireland? Could nothing be said, however strong might be their feelings, in favour of retaining the old number of representatives for England? Could nothing be said by them as Englishmen, in vindication of that measure, and yet avoiding that other difficulty which was not incidental to the question of Reform, of inflicting injury on Ireland? Since the time of Charles II. there had not been any variation in the number of English representatives. Till this bill had been introduced, there had not been a complaint made on the subject of the relative number of members for England, Scotland, and Ireland. But this bill, or, if it were not carried, he feared even the bare proportion of it, would introduce these complaints; for the bill was a gratuitous assumption of a cause for their existence. Let this bill pass, and see the consequences of a departure from a prescription so long preserved. Discussions and comparisons of population would be constant. Not Ireland only, but every county in England, would be discussing the principle of the bill, and asking whether it were fairly applied or not. They would not be contented with the population returns of 1821. It was not merely in Ireland, but in every county and town in England, that this bill would be thus discussed; and the people would ask whether the principle on which it affected to go, had been properly applied? If, as the hon. member for Waterford supposed, the number of members was an indication of the prosperity of the country, and if as the noble lord said property was to be represented, why was not England entitled to ask for an increase in the number to be sent to parliament; why was not England entitled to ask it, not only for herself, with her increased manufacturing and commercial wealth, but with all her enormous colonies acquired since the last settlement of the number of representatives, and containing 100,000,000 of people? At least England was as well entitled to make the demand as either Scotland or Ireland. He regretted, that this subject had been introduced, that the government had proposed any departure from the proposition which the law had established and custom sanctified; and he feared that what he said would be the consequence of the introduction of such a topic. At the same time, if it were shown that the basis of the Union was founded on a calculation not fair, as between the two countries, though there was no other consideration for the change, he should be induced to consent to the increase for Ireland without a corresponding increase for England, though he would not consent to the same increase in England, without a similar increase for Ireland. He, for one, however, saw no reason for adding to the number of the members for Ireland. He did not, at the same time, agree in opinion with those who thought that the hon. and gallant General's proposition, if carried, necessarily precluded such an increase, for he saw no particular reason why the members of that House might not be increased, though he did not deny, that it would be inconvenient. It was therefore most unjust to accuse those who supported that proposition with hostility to Ireland. All which they contended for was, the maintenance of the present number of representatives for England, which was surely not unreasonable. The ministers had at one time said, that they did not consider the question of number to involve the existence of the bill itself, but that, if the sense of that House was in favour of the maintenance of the present number, they would agree to the opinion, and bring in a bill in accordance with it. ["No, no" from Lord John Russell.] Such at least had been his understanding of the noble lord's statement, and he had asked the noble lord if that understanding was right, and the noble Lord answered in the affirmative. Yet, after all this, the fate of the Bill was now made to depend on the present amendment. He confessed himself hostile to the bill, but he exercised a fair hostility to it. He was prepared to persevere in a fair and direct opposition to the bill. There had been a talk of conclaves. There not only had been a talk about it, but it had actually been a charge against them, and a charge of enormous delinquency, that the party who opposed the bill had met together to consider the means of defeating it. This was a strange charge, and if the present ministry could direct the course which their opponents should pursue, he would predict that they would be a much more fortunate ministry than any that had preceded them; but if they could do so, it would be fatal to the free discussions of the House of Commons. But it had been also charged against them, that those who composed the late ministry had formed a "strange union" with those who had voted against them on a particular question. What! was it a charge against them that they had united with the anti-Catholics; and was it meant that they should say to these gentlemen, there is an old grudge between us which must yet be kept alive? Surely it was not meant that they should act on such rules of conduct. If, however, it were meant that they should do so, he begged leave to assert his opposition to the principle, that men were not to unite together for the purpose of defeating a measure to which they were opposed. It had been asked why he had not brought forward some other plan of reform according with his notions upon the subject? He did not intend to do any such thing, and for this among other reasons, that if he did propose any such measure, he should be taunted with framing a bill as a means, and with the view of getting back to office. He assured them most sincerely, that the charge would be most unfounded; for so much did he deprecate these changes of administration, and so highly inconvenient did he deem these changes, that he had stated some time since, there would be nothing more gratifying to him than to be able to support the ministry in some moderate change of the existing system. The noble lord opposite had said that there were but two authorities on this subject—Earl Grey and the Duke of Wellington. Certainly, after that declaration, he ought to be convinced that there was not an end of respect for the aristocracy; but he ought to be the more especially convinced of that fact when he was further told, that between these two authorities he had nothing to choose. But if it were true, that there were but these two opinions, he might even take that of Lord Grey; and he would ask, what was that noble lord's opinion at the end of last year? He was happy to take that opportunity of declaring, that no one had a higher opinion of the noble lord than himself, for none more sincerely esteemed that noble lord's ability and integrity; but what had that noble lord said at the close of the last year? Why, that the measure of reform which he desired was moderate, much more moderate than the present measure could possibly pretend to be. The Lord Chancellor, too, had then held the same language. He did not quote these opinions of those noble persons merely for the purpose of showing their inconsistencies, as the noble lord opposite had seemed to imagine. His own speeches, indeed, had been quoted in that manner, so that he seldom saw an hon. gentleman rising on the opposite side of the House to speak on this question, but his mind vacillated between the vanity of having his speeches quoted, and the fear of being taunted with inconsistency in what he had spoken. In fact, in most instances when hon. gentlemen on the opposite side rose to speak, he saw two volumes of the Parliamentary Debates open, the passages were marked down, and the volumes were handed up to the hon. member before he began. He believed that the speech he had delivered on the Catholic question was the foundation of many remarks in speeches made in the course of the present debate. There was, however, a great difference between the Catholic question and the Reform Bill. In the former, the matter admitted of a final settlement: it was a restitution, not a change in the constitution; but the Reform Bill admitted of no such settlement, and was a complete change of the constitution. With respect, also, to the 40s. freeholders, of whom so much had been said, he must observe, that the most ample compensation had been granted. The 40s. Catholic freeholders were compensated by their establishment upon a footing of equality with the rest of their fellow-citizens, while the Protestants received by the change the assurance that they would not again be overwhelmed by the influx of Catholic voters. But he repeated once more, that if he had the same proof of necessity, the same proof that the change of the nature of English voting was as requisite as the change which had been in Ireland, he should not hesitate to make the sacrifice. But having strong doubts as to the policy of the present measure, he could not consent to such a plan of confiscation. He did not see, either, that this measure equally balanced the different interests it affected. The ministers proposed to give an undue proportion of influence to the metropolis. By the present bill they gave no less than sixteen members to London and its environs. These members, who would always be on the spot, who could always consult their constituents, and support themselves by their opinions, would exercise in that House a power which no other sixteen members in it could possess. This arrangement was at least unfortunate. They followed the example of France, and gave to London that species of influence which was so unjustly and perniciously exercised in Paris. He was opposed to the bill on general principles. One of these was the uniform right of voting which it attempted to establish. All aristocratic influence was to be destroyed, while all democratic influence was carefully retained. The former object was accomplished by the extinction of the small boroughs. The latter was the whole aim and scope of the bill. The noble lord opposite had last night declared, that he did not wish to destroy the influence of the Peerage—that, in fact, he wished it to continue; and yet it was a charge made against him (Sir R. Peel) that he exercised an influence in Tamworth. The only influence he exercised was that which the noble lord wished to see still enjoyed by the Dukes of Devonshire and Bedford. Would the noble lord deny the wish, or would the learned Lord Advocate, who now cheered so loudly, say to what he owed his present seat in that House, but to the influence exercised by a Peer in the borough of Malton? He was glad to find that such an influence would be maintained; but influence it was, and the influence of a Peer, of the venerable Earl Fitzwilliam, who could now exercise without obstacle his influence over that borough. Malton was now retained, but what was there to prevent, three years hence, the populous towns from interfering with the elective franchise of that borough, and declaring that it ought not to be placed in the same situation with themselves, for its claim was influenced by a respectable nobleman, whose character, as well as his property and wealth, had given him the power of purchasing their suffrages? With reference to the assertion, that there was no middle course between the opinion of Earl Grey and the Duke of Wellington, he must remind them, that the gentleman who now entertained that opinion, had not always held it, and that when the right hon. baronet opposite held a more elevated situation than he did at present [pointing to the post in the third row of seats on which Sir J. Graham used to sit], he had recommended the formation of a middle party of country gentlemen, who should check both the others in the extremes that either might possibly fall into. He now returned to the bill itself, to which he had the strongest objections; and first and chiefly, that it went to create a great change in the mode of voting, and thus decidedly altered the constituency of the country. The number of dwelling-houses in Manchester rated between £10 and £20 was 1,770, while those rated above £20 amounted only to 851; the amount of the assessed property in houses above £20 was £29,300, while the amount below £20 was £22,130; so that, according to the first proposition of the noble lord, the representation of Manchester would be placed entirely in the hands of the 1,770 £10 householders, owning only three-eighths of the property of the 851 householders above £20. He did not say that respectable voters would not be found, but he did say that superior intelligence and superior property would be overborne. To remedy some part of this obvious inconvenience, the noble lord now proposed that persons assessed to the rates of a place, though not resident, should be allowed to vote. How would this new plan operate as to Manchester? The assessed value of the dwelling-houses there was £51,000, while the assessed value of the factories, counting-houses, &c., was £240,000. According to the first proposition of the noble lord, the representatives for Manchester would be given to the £51,000, while the £240,000, because it belonged to out-voters, would be excluded from the right of giving any vote. The noble lord, however, had at length discovered his mistake, and, to use the expression of the Lord Chancellor, was now about to sluice the 2,621 voters with 4,500 non-residents. But after this alteration, of which the House heard yesterday for the first time, what became of the principle of the bill? He would not absolutely say that this was against the principle of the bill, but it showed the necessity of the ministry deeply considering the measure before they proposed it to the House. The noble lord concluded his speech by asking—and no doubt it was an important question—"Supposing, after examining this measure, you reject it, who will you find capable of governing this country?" He had heard the same question asked (though he believed in a different mode and tone from that adopted by the noble lord); but he had heard it said, "if we are incapable of administering the public affairs, at least we will render them impossible to be administered by others." But, surely, even in the mitigated sense in which the noble lord used it, it was a great objection to the bill, if it were to have this effect, viz., that those who consistently opposed it, and believed it, in its ultimate consequences, to be pregnant with ruin, had the alternative offered them by his Majesty's government, either to accept that which they believed to be radically wrong, or to be convinced that it had become impossible for others than the present ministry to conduct the affairs of the government. He should deeply lament if this indeed was the alternative. He knew not whether it was or not; but this he knew, that he saw no advantage in relinquishing the exercise of his deliberate judgment, or in yielding, against the dictates of that judgment, to the popular clamour on this bill, or in yielding to the infuriated menaces of that press which exerted in so degrading a manner the irresponsible power with which it was endowed, and which, to make it wholesome or even bearable, ought to be exercised with the most scrupulous care. Besides, if he were to give way to those motives, what security had he that he must not persevere in the resignation of his own judgment and conviction to the same influence? His conscience, in acting on his own judgment, was at rest. He could not expect to gain any thing by the defeat of the measure. The bill interfered with no interests of his. Quite the reverse: for if it produced the effect which its friends ascribed to it, it would add to his influence in every county where he possessed any property. He, therefore, could not be influenced by those motives which he had heard ascribed—and, as he believed, most unjustly ascribed—to honest men, who had endeavoured, from the sincere convictions of their minds, to resist this measure as pernicious and destructive. What might be the consequences of the bill he would not say; but if it should prove prejudicial to the interests of the country, he should hold responsible for it, that ministry which had prepared the bill without due consideration of its importance, and by so doing, had reduced them to such a state of embarrassment, that they must either acquiesce in what they believed to be injurious to the constitution, or witness the melancholy prospect of the affairs of this realm being submitted to misrule and anarchy.

LIVERPOOL ELECTION—THE REFORM BILL.

Mr. Bennett having moved a resolution, with reference to the system of bribery and corruption which prevailed in the election of burgesses for the town of Liverpool, a discussion arose, in the course of which,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that, with respect to this question, as with respect to many of the questions in the important measure which had lately undergone so much discussion in that House, the House were acting, not politically but judicially; and ought not to decide without previous investigation. At the same time he was bound to say, that it appeared that there must be some enquiry on the subject. But why was there a variance between the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Wiltshire and the Report of the Committee? The report of the committee stated, "That it appears that there was gross bribery at the late election of burgesses to serve in parliament for the borough of Liverpool:" the hon. gentleman's resolution was, "That the system of bribery and treating which has prevailed at Liverpool demands the serious consideration of this House." Acting as a judicial body, they ought to adhere to the terms in which the report of the committee was expressed.

Mr. C. Wood said, he should be satisfied with that course.

Sir R. Peel said, if he should be satisfied that the bribery existed to so great an extent as was said, he would not be content to bring in other voters—he would disfranchise the whole body.

Later in the debate, rising after Sir John Newport, who had replied to Mr. M. Fitzgerald,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he felt himself called on to vindicate the course taken by his right hon. friend. That at an early period that House might be dissolved, was in itself a justification for those now expressing their opinions on the subject who had not before had an opportunity. He inferred from the silence of the noble lord opposite, that it was the intention of the government to risk that experiment, which he thought at the present time was fraught with danger, and might end in general tumult. He quarrelled not with the noble lord for abandoning the Reform Bill; if he thought there was such a degree of objection to the bill, and to the details as to preclude the further progress of the bill, he was a competent judge of the matter, and must be supposed to be right in his opinion; but he must regret the withdrawal of the measure on a motion which had nothing to do with its substance. In his opinion reform ought to be conducted on one of two principles—either that of maintaining the relative proportions fixed at the time of the Union; or, if that proportion were departed from, a small addition should be made to the number of the members for Ireland and Scotland, but the number of those for England ought to be retained. These—if he concurred in any measure of reform—these would be the grounds on which his concurrence would be based; and these were the grounds on which the noble lord, now at the head of the government, proposed a reform in the year 1800. At that time Mr. Grey was of opinion that the number of the members ought to be reduced, and his plan of reduction was this:—He proposed to cut off several small boroughs, and in that way to reduce the number of members for England and Scotland, and to allot to Ireland eighty-five members instead of one hundred. Thus he proposed to retain the proportion between the members for the three countries on the same basis that had been fixed at the time of the Union—a basis determined by their relative wealth and population. Such a change might be desirable—to one more extensive, he (Sir R. Peel) certainly should object. He never meant to go into the Reform Bill for the purpose of improving its details, he was opposed to the bill distinctly, decidedly opposed to it—opposed to it because it was brought forward at a moment when expectation was most excited. If reform were desirable, it should be made a substantive measure, and be introduced under the existence of less excitement than at the present moment. He had, therefore, no wish to improve the details of the bill, and at the third reading he should most probably have been found expressing his dissent from the bill. That the ministers should give up the bill on a resolution that, in case of a reform, the number of the English representatives should not be diminished, was to him a thing the most unaccountable. If the government had determined to dissolve the parliament, he deeply lamented it, on account of the hazard to which he feared they would subject the country. He thought there was no justifiable ground for their coming to such a resolution. Because this question of parliamentary reform had been negatived, government felt it requisite for the proper administration of the affairs of the country to dissolve the parliament. In his opinion, the measure was not one of such imminent and immediate necessity as to justify them in coming to such a decision. He could, however, well understand the motives for pressing on the measure. It had been brought forward at a time of great excitement—an excitement shared by those who had in some measure created it. Let them look at the language of a publication conspicuous for the talent with which it was conducted, and supposed to represent pretty accurately the opinions of at least some of his Majesty's ministers. Let them read The Edinburgh Review, published in last autumn, and they would find there a reference to the "beautiful days" of Paris; and when they had seen this, let them say whether his impression were not correct, that some of the authors of this bill were sharers in that general excitement which had recently prevailed throughout Europe. He fully believed, if time had been given, that the reaction which had already begun in public opinion—he might say manifestly begun—would have extended itself over all classes, hardly excepting even those who thought they were interested in the success of the bill, as it would confer on them new privileges. But whether it were so or not, he thought that no administration ought to undervalue the opinions of those who had already solemnly declared that they could not give their assent to the bill. The wishes of the people had been talked of. When they talked of the people, they talked as if the people were to be numbered by heads, and they forgot the influence of wealth and education. It was impossible to deny—looking at the number who had spoken at the various public meetings throughout the country, and looking at the ability and the disinterestedness they had displayed—that there was great discordance in public opinion as to the merits of the Reform Bill; and he would assert that no man was entitled to say, that this Reform Bill met with that unanimous approbation which the government had said the introduction of that bill had occasioned. The bill was based upon no principle; but proceeded throughout its several enactments on a matter of assumption, several of its enactments being most arbitrary, yet they pretended that no other could be received in the country with any feeling but that of dissatisfaction. If the parliament was to be dissolved because this measure could not be carried, then many measures relating to the internal tranquillity of the country, and to its foreign relations which were requisite, would be postponed, or altogether passed over. There was, however, as it seemed to him, no immediate necessity for dissolving parliament. What was the pretext for it? Why, the ministers were afraid to keep alive and perhaps increase the excitement that now existed. They need not fear. It would die of itself. A greater degree of excitement than the present had died out before. He had indeed heard complaints from the opposite side of the House that the people had become indifferent to the subject of reform, after they had manifested a desire for it in a greater degree than at the present moment. Let the events of Paris fade from recollection, and let the people of this country calmly consider the effects of these revolutions in Paris and Brussels, and he would venture to say that the excitement would die away, and then, at any future period, this country would be in a fitter state to consider of a proposition for amendment in the representative system; but, if his Majesty's government were prepared to advise a dissolution of the parliament, in what state would they put themselves by giving that advice? From the course the government had pursued, he did feel a strong confidence that, with regard to Ireland, they would have asked from the parliament a coercive measure, limited, of course, but still vesting them with more powers than they now possessed. He had not pressed them to ask for the Insurrection Act, for, after the experience he had had, he was fully convinced that nothing but absolute necessity could justify it. He agreed with those who said, that though that measure might sometimes produce the effect of tranquillity, it was yet a most unconstitutional measure; and wherever sentiments of a particular kind existed among the body of the people, and those sentiments were thought to create danger to the state, the remedy for that danger had better be intrusted to the usual administration of the laws, than be provided for in such a manner as to constitute the upper classes the judges of it. Indeed, to vest the power of decision and of action, at such a time, in the hands of one portion of the people, to be exercised over the rest, so far from diminishing discontent, though it might seem to effect a cure, left a rankling sore behind, and had a tendency to perpetuate the evil. Under such circumstances, he should rather suggest to the government the possibility of making some provision by which another tribunal could be instituted for the trial of offenders; but if the parliament were now to be dissolved, no such thing could be done. He rejoiced that the necessity for these measures did not seem to exist at present. He knew nothing of the state of Ireland but what he saw in the public papers, but what he did see, convinced him that the state of society in the western parts of that country was such, as no man could look at without a feeling of the greatest sorrow. It was to be hoped, however, that the permanent laws of the country, and the powers conferred on the government by some existing statutes, would be found sufficient, without its being expedient to add to those powers in any way. If, however, it should be found necessary to have recourse to extraordinary powers, they certainly ought to be effective. It appeared to him but a misplaced humanity to let discontent grow to a head, until no authority, but a large military force, or the operation of the Insurrection Act, was sufficient to put it down. He, having confidence that such a measure would have been produced without going too far, should, in that case, have lent his humble aid to the ministers who, in such a state of things, advised a dissolution of parliament, incurred a heavy responsibility. Was that all? What would be the immediate effect of the dissolution? The powers they already possessed would be extinguished: by that act which enabled the government to suppress illegal associations, it was provided, that the power thereby created should expire at the end of the present session of parliament. That session would be determined by the dissolution, and by the dissolution of parliament not only might all the evils of Ireland break out afresh, but the powers now possessed by the government would be put an end to, and it would be prevented from making a fresh application to parliament for additional powers.

On these grounds he deprecated the expressed intention of the government. He conceived that the dissolution of a parliament so lately assembled—which had executed so little in the public service—which had scarcely passed one measure worth recording—was not justifiable. He found on the journals of that House reasons assigned against the dissolution of parliament, which were so well worded, and were so applicable to past circumstances, that he should take the liberty of reading them, and with the view of ensuring more attention than was usually paid to written documents, he would state, that these were the resolutions put on record on the journals of that House, in 1807, by the noble lord now at the head of the government. They were resolutions condemning the dissolution of parliament. He called on them to weigh well the sentences of the noble lord. The resolutions were moved at the re-assembling of parliament in 1807. They were in these words: "That by a long experience of his Majesty's virtues, we well know it to be his Majesty's invariable wish, that all his prerogatives should be exercised solely for the good of his people." He had told them how much the words of these resolutions demanded their approval. He would now go on:—"That our dutiful attachment to his Majesty's person and government obliges us, therefore, most humbly to lay before him the manifest misconduct of his ministers, in having advised the dissolution of the late parliament, in the midst of its first session, and within a few months after his Majesty had been pleased to assemble it for the despatch of the urgent business of the nation. That this measure, advised by his Majesty's ministers, at a time when there existed no difference between any of the branches of the legislature, nor any sufficient cause for an appeal to his Majesty's people, was justified by no public necessity or advantage. That by the interruption of all private business then depending in parliament, it has been productive of great and needless inconvenience and expense, thereby wantonly adding to the heavy burthens which the necessities of the times require. That it has retarded many useful laws for the internal improvement of the kingdom."—He doubted much whether this could be truly said, indeed, of the present parliament, as he feared that no measures for the internal improvement of the kingdom had ever been introduced by the ministers; but the amendment moved by the noble lord went on to say—"and for the encouragement and extension of its agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. And that it has either suspended, or wholly defeated many most important public measures, and protracted much of the most weighty business of parliament, to a season of the year when its prosecution must be attended with the greatest public and private inconvenience. And that we feel ourselves bound still further to submit to his Majesty, that all these mischiefs are greatly aggravated by the groundless and injurious pretences on which his Majesty's ministers have publicly rested their evil advices; pretences, affording no justification for the measure, but calculated only to excite the most dangerous animosities among his Majesty's faithful subjects at a period when their united efforts were more than ever necessary for the security of the empire, and when to promote the utmost harmony and co-operation amongst them would have been the first object of faithful and provident ministers." These resolutions contained the general arguments on the question of dissolution at such a moment. There were, he repeated, no such circumstances as now called for a dissolution. He admitted the necessity of reform; but he again denied that it was an immediate and imminent necessity. He could not refrain from availing himself of this opportunity, the last he might have, of protesting against the contemplated dissolution, and of making his declaration that ministers by resorting to it, incurred, perhaps, a more serious responsibility than had been risked by any previous government.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

The Speaker having taken the Chair in his full robes of office, and the House being crowded with members, Sir R. Vyvyan rose to address the House on the subject of the Reform Bill, and on the approaching dissolution of Parliament. After a time, calls to "Order," and much noisy confusion took place. After a long and turbulent interruption the hon. baronet recommenced, and proceeded for some time; but, just towards the conclusion of one of his sentences, the report of the first gun, says the reporter, which announced the arrival of his Majesty, resounded through the House. It drowned the conclusion of the hon. baronet's sentence; and the cheers, laughter, and cries of "order!" which followed the succeeding discharges completely prevented our hearing the purport of the hon. baronet's observation. When the discharges of artillery were almost concluded, the hon. baronet sat down, and

Sir R. Peel, Lord Althorp, and Sir Francis Burdett rose at the same instant. The scene which followed was most extraordinary. Sir R. Peel was received with loud shouts, groans, laughter, and cries of "bar!" from the ministerial benches, responded to by cries of "order!" and "chair!" from those of the opposition. All the endeavours of his friends, aided on his part by most vehement action and gesticulation, having failed to obtain a hearing or to induce Sir F. Burdett and Lord Althorp, who on their part were not wanting in equal supplicating gestures, to obtain a hearing,

The Speaker rose, and after a long interval of confusion, and repeated cries of "shame!" succeeded in obtaining a hearing. The right hon. gentleman, evidently labouring under great emotion, said this was the precise situation in which he believed they were placed:—Sir R. Peel caught his eye at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. baronet, the member for Cornwall. Sir Francis Burdett rose at the same time; and on there being a call raised for a preference being given to Sir Francis, the noble lord rose, and moved, as he had a right to do, that Sir Francis Burdett be now heard. The question he had now to put was, that Sir Francis Burdett be heard, and on that question the right hon. gentleman (Sir R. Peel) had as undoubted a right to speak, as any other which could come before the House [cheers].

Sir R. Peel rose, with this decision in his favour, to address the House; but he was received with groans, shouts, laughter, and cries of "bar!" from the ministerial side of the House.

The Speaker, amid loud cries of "shame," again succeeded in obtaining a hearing. He observed, that when hon. members appealed to him, and called on him to lay down the rules of order, he thought they should do him the favour to rest satisfied with his decision as to the question before the House, and the question to be spoken to.

Sir R. Peel after some slight interruption, was then suffered to proceed. He said that the rules under which that House had acted for centuries were not, it would appear, to be the rules of a reformed parliament. The House had that day seen an example of a defiance of all regular authority, even from the place which was occupied by the ministers of the Crown. He did not complain of the dissolution of that House: he complained merely of the manner in which it was done. He did not, however, share the desponding feelings of his hon. friend the member for Cornwall. He had better hopes for England. He did not advise his countrymen to sit with their hands before them, patiently expecting the confiscation of their funded property. He had a proper confidence in the good sense, and intelligence, and just appreciation of character of the people of England; and he was satisfied, that if they united religiously in a just cause, and unite he knew they would, that there were no fears of a successful issue to that struggle into which they were about to enter. [Loud cheers and groans, and cries of "bar!" and "order!"] He would ask, was it decent thus to attempt to produce confusion, under the pretence of calling to order? If this were a foretaste of what was to take place hereafter, he might indeed, call on them to beware of a reformed parliament. He would tell them what they were about to establish by a reformed parliament. If they carried that bill which the ministers had proposed to them, they would introduce the very worst and vilest species of despotism—the despotism of demagogues. They would introduce the despotism of journalism—that despotism which had brought neighbouring countries, once happy and flourishing, to the very brink of ruin and despair. But, when he looked to Ireland; when he saw the state of society in the western counties of that kingdom; when he was told that rebellion had almost hoisted its standard; and when it was known that landed proprietors, well affected to the state, were left without the slightest protection to their property, and were compelled to move their families into the towns, for the protection of their lives and properties from the marauders, who, in open day, threatened them with pillage and destruction—he confessed he could not call up words to express his astonishment and regret at the course adopted by the government. Instead of coming to parliament to ask for new powers and new laws, to vindicate the outraged authority of the government, the king's ministers, at such a crisis, and under such a state of society in Ireland, had come to a resolution to dissolve the Parliament, in order that they might protect themselves from that loss of power with which they were threatened. If the Crown were to be so easily influenced—if its independence were so far extinguished—it ceased to be an object of interest to enter into its service. He perceived, indeed, that the power of the Crown had already ceased. Ministers had, however, adopted this course to protect their places; and they held them with the established character, in the eyes of the country, of having, during the time they had been in office, exhibited more incapacity—more unfitness for the conduct of public business than was ever shown by any ministry which had attempted to hold power in England. They had been in office for some months, and not a single measure had emanated from them from the day they took office till that moment, for the benefit of the country. They had pursued the course adopted by all governments called liberal. They had tossed on the table of that House some bills—a Game Bill and an Emigration Bill—and after having established, with respect to them and other measures, what they called liberal principles, they abandoned them to their fate. What, then, was to be—

The usher of the Black Rod appeared at the bar of the House, and said, “I am commanded by his Majesty to command the immediate attendance of this hon. House in the House of Lords, to hear his Majesty's royal assent to several bills; and also his Majesty's speech for the prorogation of Parliament.”

The Speaker accompanied by several members, left the House in obedience to the summons, and after a short absence returned to the House, and intimated to the members, that having been summoned to attend his Majesty in the other House, his Majesty was pleased to pronounce from the Throne a gracious speech, declaring the present parliament prorogued, with a view to an immediate dissolution.

The Speaker called the members round the table at which he took his seat, and read the royal speech to them as follows:—

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,—I have come to meet you for the purpose of proroguing this Parliament, with a view to its immediate dissolution.

“I have been induced to resort to this measure for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people, in the way in which it can be most constitutionally and authentically expressed, on the expediency of making such changes in the representation as circumstances may appear to require, and which, founded upon the acknowledged principles of the constitution, may tend at once to uphold the just rights and prerogatives of the Crown, and to give security to the liberties of the people.

“Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—I thank you for the provision you have made for the maintenance of the honor and dignity of the Crown, and I offer you my special acknowledgments for the arrangements you have made for the state and comfort of my royal Consort. I have also to thank you for the supplies which you have furnished for the public service: I have observed with satisfaction your endeavours to introduce a strict economy into every branch of that service; and I trust that the early attention of a new parliament, which I shall forthwith direct to be called, will be applied to the prosecution of that important object.

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,—I am happy to inform you, that the friendly intercourse which subsists between myself and Foreign Powers, affords the best hopes of the continuance of peace, to the preservation of which my most anxious endeavours will be constantly directed.

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,—In resolving to recur to the sense of my people, in the present circumstances of the country, I have been influenced only by a paternal anxiety for the contentment and happiness of my subjects, to promote which, I rely with confidence on your continued and zealous assistance."

The Lord Chancellor immediately said :—My Lords, and Gentlemen ; it is his Majesty's royal will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued to Tuesday, the 10th of May next, to be then and there holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued till Tuesday, the 10th of May next. His Majesty then retired. The Commons returned to their own House, and the Peers separated.

After the return of the members to the House of Commons, all who could approach the Speaker, amid the confusion, shook hands with the right hon. gentleman, with the utmost kindness and cordiality.

FIRST SESSION

OF THE TENTH PARLIAMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND; OPENED ON THE 14th OF JUNE 1831, IN THE SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

CHOICE OF A SPEAKER.

JUNE 14, 1831.

Mr. C. W. Wynn having moved that the right hon. Charles Manners Sutton do take the chair of this House, the motion was seconded by Sir M. W. Ridley, and unanimously agreed to.

The Speaker having duly acknowledged the honour thus again conferred upon him, Sir James Graham moved the adjournment of the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL then said, in seconding the motion for adjournment, I trust, Sir, I may, without presumption, avail myself of the opportunity of joining in the expression of congratulation on your most honourable, because unanimous, re-election, for the sixth time, to the chair of this House. This is a dignity valuable to any man, constituting him, as it does, the first commoner in the country : but to you it is, I know, more valuable, as it enables you to continue that career of public usefulness, in which you have already so highly distinguished yourself. Sir, I congratulate you, not only on your re-election but on all the circumstances attending that event. I well remember, fourteen years ago, my right hon. friend by whom you were this day proposed, entering into an honourable competition with you for the chair ; and, although your competitor, prophesying, that if the House should select you for the high station, experience would justify their choice. Of this I am satisfied, that the same honourable spirit which induced him to utter that prediction renders him among the foremost to rejoice in its complete fulfilment. With characteristic diffidence, you have attributed the successful discharge of your duties to the co-operation of the House in your efforts. This declaration, however, although unintentionally, involves the highest compliment to yourself. For the co-operation of the House has arisen from their respect for your integrity, and from their admiration of the promptitude and justice of your decisions, the firmness with which you have enforced those decisions, and the courtesy which has deprived that firmness of all the harshness of character which might have diminished its effect. The able speeches which have been made by the right hon. and hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, render it totally unnecessary to dilate upon these points ; but I could not refuse myself the gratification of bearing my personal and public testimony to your merits, and of offering my congratulations, not alone to you, Sir, but to parliament, that, assembled as it is under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and importance, is enabled once more to avail itself of the inestimable advantage of your services.

The House then adjourned.

ADDRESS, IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S SPEECH.

JUNE 26, 1831.

The speaker having read to the House a copy of the King's speech, on the opening of the Session, Mr. Charles Pelham moved an address to his Majesty, in answer. Sir J. B. Johnstone seconded the motion.

The Speaker having read the address, and put the question,

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose, and commenced by observing, that he had waited for some moments, in hopes some other gentleman would have taken the opportunity of expressing his sentiments, on the important topics adverted to in his Majesty's speech, and in the address proposed in answer to it. Such not being the case, however, and no gentleman having manifested his desire to address the House, he could not permit the discussion to pass by without making a few observations. It was a source of great satisfaction to him that he was enabled to concur in the address which had been moved and seconded. It was at all times important that the first meeting of parliament should be characterised by moderation, and the absence of an acrimonious spirit, which might be inferred by an unanimous adoption of the address. But if this display of unanimity were desirable at all times, it was peculiarly so at present; when it was above all things desirable, that the House should express its sincere loyalty and respect, in language in which no material division of opinion should be elicited. He rejoiced, therefore, unaffectedly, that his Majesty's ministers had so framed the speech and the address, that he could with perfect satisfaction acquiesce in the latter. If it had been proposed or intended to introduce into the address topics intended to extract a pledge from the House or to provoke a difference of opinion, he had no doubt that a different course would have been pursued. He was perfectly satisfied that his Majesty's ministers would, in that case, have given the House an opportunity of considering the nature and extent of the pledge it was called upon to make, by recurring to a practice which prevailed some years since, of putting the House in possession of the speech the day before the House was called upon to answer it by the address. Knowing that the noble lord, and the members of his Majesty's government, had constantly contended for the adoption of the practice to which he had referred, he was sure his Majesty's ministers would never call upon the House to enter into any pledge without giving it an opportunity of knowing the extent and nature of that pledge. He concurred in the propriety of that course which his Majesty's government had adopted in keeping the speech and the address as secret as possible, till they were promulgated in parliament; and he hoped they would follow this up by plainly avowing, that it was not in their intention to induce any member of parliament, by voting for the address, to pledge himself to any particular course to be hereafter pursued. Of course the speech and address divided themselves into the two great topics of the foreign policy and internal economy of our administration. There were many reasons which would induce him to abstain from entering into any discussion on the foreign policy of the country. In the first place, he had not that information before him which would be necessary to render his observations complete; and to him it appeared that the general state of affairs on the continent was such, that every well-wisher of his country must be most anxious to do and say nothing which would affect the maintenance of peace, and, of course, to avoid every discussion till the House were in possession of full and accurate information. In office and out of office that principle of maintaining peace should be looked to by every British statesman; and he (Sir R. Peel) should never cease to lament if any word escaped from him calculated to contravene the wise intentions in this respect of his Majesty's government. Another reason which prevented him from indulging in any observations on the foreign policy of the country was, the absence, the necessary absence, of the noble lord (Lord Palmerston) who presided over the foreign department. He presumed it would be admitted, that it would be improper and inexpedient to enter into any discussion on foreign politics, during the absence of the noble lord, peculiarly responsible for the conduct of that department. If that were the case, it would be equally clear, that the House would continue subject to that inconvenience whilst the noble lord remained without a seat. If it were not desirable then to enter into any discussion on matters connected with a particular department, whilst the person mainly responsible for the conduct of it was absent, did it not strike every one how great an advantage it was to a government, to have the power of effecting the return of the responsible ministers of the Crown, and how inconvenient and injurious to the public service it must be, to have the discussion of the business of a particular department suspended until the head of that department were returned for some populous place; for in order to get into that House his noble friend (Lord Palmerston) now at the head of the foreign department, would hardly think it fitting or expedient to knock at some of the places named in Schedule A or Schedule B. No writ could, indeed, be moved for during a fortnight, and if his noble friend passed Friday next without knocking at Schedule A or Schedule B, he might be prevented from availing himself of the opening which they afforded, and find them closed against him. If his noble friend, however, should present himself at one of those inconsiderable boroughs to get returned, it would present some practical proof—looking to the workings of the system, and looking to the opportunity which those boroughs had hitherto afforded to the Crown to return the members of administration—that the existence of such a power of returning members was not altogether without its use. He could not help thinking that it would afford some proof, looking to the practical workings of the system, that the disfranchisement of those boroughs could not take place without warranting some apprehension that the government might find it difficult to carry on the business of the country. He knew it was said, that in future all ministers would be so popular that there would be no difficulty in getting returned for a populous place; but the deliberations of parliament often had reference to periods of great public excitement. In making these observations, he had no wish to anticipate the debate on the Reform Bill. What he had said arose naturally from the absence of the noble lord at the head of the foreign department, and, to give the best proof that his reference to this subject was not deliberate, he would at once relinquish it. He wished, however, then to observe, though he should not enter into the topics relating to foreign affairs, alluded to in the address, on the present occasion, that he should reserve to himself the right of doing so at some future period. He could not view the policy adopted with respect to Portugal and Holland—two countries which had been long the peculiar objects of British policy, without interest and anxiety. He rejoiced to see the great principle of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of foreign states steadily adhered to; but, at the same time, he rejoiced to see an exception to that great principle clearly stated in his Majesty's speech. Abstinence from all internal interference with foreign countries was perfectly right, unless when that interference was rendered necessary to preserve the interests of our own or of other countries. Many circumstances affecting the security and peace of other countries would justify a departure from the principle of non-intervention, and therefore he rejoiced to see the rule laid down with a proper exception. He rejoiced particularly at that part of the king's speech which related to Belgium, and said, "The most complete agreement continues to subsist between the powers whose plenipotentiaries have been engaged in the conferences of London. The principle on which those conferences have been conducted, has been that of not interfering with the right of the people of Belgium to regulate their internal affairs," because it abated the apprehension he must otherwise have felt at a recent interference on the part of France in the affairs of Portugal. He trusted a satisfactory explanation would be given on that subject—he expected as much from the present enlightened government of France, which having loudly protested against foreign interposition would not, he was sure, set an example of violating the rules it called on other governments to follow; but at present the interference to which he alluded seemed to come strictly within the rule of an interference in domestic affairs. From the conduct of the Portuguese government he could readily believe that the measures pursued might be satisfactorily accounted for; but it now only appeared that the release of a French subject was demanded, who had been regularly tried and sentenced to be punished by a competent tribunal; and not only the release of the prisoner, but the dismissal of his judges. If a case of necessity were not established, this would appear to be strictly a case of domestic interference; and it was not because the king or the government of Portugal was unpopular that such a precedent was the less dangerous. The dismissal of the judges was demanded; and to justify such a demand, and prevent such a demand from becoming a precedent, he hoped a case of great emergency would be made out. With reference to the domestic policy of this country, the only topic alluded to in the king's speech which was likely to excite a division of opinion, was the reference to the question of reform. The address in answer to the speech, however, was drawn up in such a manner that any man, whatever might be his opinions on reform, could agree to it. He was warranted in presuming from this that government did not mean, in the slightest degree, to pledge the house on that question. On a proper occasion he should be prepared fully to state his opinion on that most important subject. He joined with the mover and seconder in hoping that it would be discussed with a moderation suited to the subject. At the same time he should be compromising his own opinion, and suppressing the truth, if he agreed with all the hon. mover and seconder had said relative to the circumstances attending the late dissolution of parliament. He did not mean to question in the slightest degree the power of the Crown to dissolve the parliament. He did not go the length of some men deeply versed in the principles of the constitution as to this subject. In 1807, Lord Holland quoted an opinion of Lord Somers, which went to prove that it was that great man's opinion, that it was almost illegal to dissolve a parliament during a session. The noble lord who quoted this opinion had not gone so far—he only quoted it to prove that there was a material difference between dissolving the parliament in and out of session. For his own part he did not go so far as to say that such an exercise of the prerogative was illegal, or even questionable. In point of right, he admitted that the prerogative was properly exercised; nay, he went further, he could well believe, that his Majesty's ministry, finding the bill they had introduced carried by the smallest possible majority, and, judging from that and the subsequent divisions, that the result would prove unfavourable to their opinions, had properly determined to resort to a dissolution to ascertain the sense of the people. Believing all this, and not questioning the right of the Crown to dissolve, nor the right of his Majesty's government to advise the Crown to dissolve, yet he did question the policy both of the time and the manner of the dissolution. He did not consider this a matter of light concern. Foreseeing the times that were approaching, in the event of a change in the constitution of that House, he felt that the time and manner of the dissolution had been, to say the least, most ill-chosen. It was incumbent on him to state his opinion on this subject, though it might be unpopular. He regretted that his opinions on this subject were unpopular; but no man attached to his country could always acquiesce in the opinion of the majority. Every man was entitled to entertain his own opinion, even though he held that opinion in common with but a small minority. He felt, therefore, that he should not be the less considered the true friend of his country, when he fairly avowed his opinion on the subject of the late dissolution. Admitting that, with their views, ministers were justified in recommending a dissolution, yet he repeated, that he could never see the necessity for adopting that measure at the time, and under the circumstances which then existed. What were the consequences of this measure at that moment? One consequence was, the remission of various taxes, without the authority of parliament, and solely on the authority of the department connected with the taxes. Those were precedents not of light importance. Those who differed with him as to the question of reform, and even as to the question of dissolution, would yet agree with him that such precedents, though sanctioned by a majority, were not the less to be dreaded. That the course adopted in this case was in accordance with the wishes of many, was an additional reason for calling the attention of parliament to the subject. Without the authority of parliament, the duties on coals, slates, and, he believed, on barilla, had been remitted [a laugh]. It might excite a smile, but such he believed was the fact, and if it were a fact that acts of parliament imposed those duties, and that a department of government had set them aside, he contended that it was not a light precedent in these times of great changes. If the department had the power of appealing to parliament, and did not appeal, the precedent was still more important. He might be told that, in the case of coals, bonds were given to indemnify the government for the loss of duty, if parliament did not agree to the reduction. The retail dealer, however, sold on the presumption of a reduction of duty; and it would be impossible, upon any principle of equity, to call on the wholesale dealer to pay the duty. Now, as to the article of slates. It was well known that duties were often imposed on some articles with reference to other articles, and, therefore, it was injuring the interests of the dealers in some articles, to take off the duty on others without enquiry or discussion. Respecting all the duties remitted on the articles to which he had referred, he confessed he could not see the necessity of proceeding as the government had done—acting without any discussion in parliament, or any vote of approval by the House of Commons; and looking at such a course of proceeding, unauthorised by act of parliament, the least he could say of it was, that it was a dangerous precedent. His Majesty's ministers had no authority to remit these duties without the sanction of parliament, and, though he could not assert that the present instance was of itself pregnant with danger, it could not be denied that such a practice might lead to bad consequences, and it was the duty of his Majesty's ministers to take the first opportunity of doing away with the impression, that on future occasions such a course might be repeated. He hoped, therefore, that some step would be taken at the instance of his Majesty's government, to obtain the proper authority for the proceedings to which they had resorted, and to diminish, in some degree, the danger of the precedent which was furnished by their acts. That danger was not diminished by the reductions in question being popular. What security could the public creditor have for the payment of his dividends, if the ministers could dispense with the duties which the parliament had imposed? He (Sir R. Peel), thought that the remission of those duties ought not to be lightly passed over, if it had given rise to no other inconvenience than the bad precedent. There was another subject which he found himself equally called upon to blame, and that was, the dissolving of parliament without renewing the Act against Dangerous Associations. He would not say whether or not such an act were necessary, though the disturbances subsequent to the dissolution might justify such an assertion; but, if it were necessary to pass the act, it was equally necessary to renew it, when the disturbances which had given rise to it had not yet subsided. On that part of the subject, however, he would not dwell, because there was another part of more importance; and that was, that prosecutions which had been commenced on the authority of that act had not been carried into effect, and it was the duty of his Majesty's government, for this reason, if for no other, to apply for a continuation of the law, in order to carry these into effect. He had another complaint against the government of still greater importance, because the evil of which he complained was one which related, not only to the peace of Ireland, but to the peace of the whole empire. He thought it was peculiarly incumbent on the government, when such an important subject as the remodelling of the House of Commons, and the reconstruction of the representation of the people, was in agitation—it was particularly incumbent on them, as men to whom the best interests of the country were intrusted, and who were bound to look to its permanent welfare, to avoid any additional cause of excitement beyond those which, at this time, but too extensively prevailed on the subject of parliamentary reform. He must therefore say, that it was neither political nor just, nor consistent with truth, for ministers to tell the people of England, that they had advised his Majesty to dissolve parliament because the House of Commons had refused the supplies. One of his Majesty's ministers, at least, had declared this; and it had been repeated so often in other quarters, that there could be no doubt that the government had considered themselves justified in dissolving parliament on the ground that the supplies had been refused. A noble lord, and the right hon. baronet opposite (Sir James Graham), had told their constituents that the stoppage of the supplies was the cause of the dissolution. If this statement were consistent with fact—and he had no reason to doubt it—he would only say he would not complain of the statement, but he doubted the reasoning, because he believed his Majesty's government had determined to dissolve parliament before the vote was come to which was said to be the cause of the dissolution. He believed the fact was, that ministers had resolved on a dissolution immediately after General Gascoyne's motion was carried, and he did not believe that the vote of the House of Commons had materially influenced or hastened their decision. A motion for an adjournment at one o'clock in the morning never could be construed into a fixed and premeditated determination to frustrate the plans of government. He had only to appeal to the hon. member for Middlesex, who night after night had moved the adjournment of the question on a vote of supply, without any intention on his part of defeating or thwarting ministers. If such, therefore, were not the fact—and on this point, he had no doubt—was it consistent for enlightened statesmen to throw an additional cause of excitement among the people, already so much excited? Now, he would state it as his opinion, that it was not the vote of Friday night that caused the dissolution, for the noble lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a letter written to some of his constituents, stated that the determination had been taken on Thursday morning. If such were the fact, the noble lord must admit that the vote of Friday night could not cause the dissolution, and that the government was to blame in creating an additional cause of excitement, by asserting that the House had refused the supplies. The two hon. gentlemen who had moved and seconded the address, had stated that the dissolution was received with unanimous approbation, and that the result of the general election was decisive of the feelings of the people. The hon. member who had moved the address had made a statement which he would not criticise too severely in so young a member. He had stated that seventy-two members for counties, and forty for populous towns, had distinctly pledged themselves for the Reform Bill of last session. Now, if this were the fact—if 112 members should persist in contending for that bill, and that bill only—he believed ministers would find themselves placed in rather an inconvenient situation. He would now direct the attention of the House to the wording of his Majesty's speech, and particularly that part of it which related to the Reform Bill. In that he most perfectly acquiesced, because it was a censure on the last bill, and a just compliment to the future bill. The words to which he referred were "confident that in any measures which you may propose for its adjustment, you will carefully adhere to the acknowledged principles of the constitution, by which the prerogative of the Crown, the authority of both Houses of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people are equally secured." This he must regard as a severe rebuke to those who, in no unequivocal language, declared the bill would have the effect of diminishing the power of the Lords—who, in point of fact, said that the Lords had no right to interfere with the constitution of the House of Commons. This part of the speech he regarded as a compliment to the future bill, and a severe censure on those who held such language. He was the more confirmed in this when he compared the speech at the close of the session with that which had been just read. In the speech of last session there was certainly a good deal of similarity of expression on the topics of reform, though a material difference in one or two instances. He would read that part of the speech in order that the House might judge more correctly of the alteration which had been made. His Majesty then said:—"I have been induced to resort to this measure for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people, in the way in which it can be most constitutionally and authentically expressed, on the expediency of making such changes in the representation as circumstances may appear to require, and which, founded upon the acknowledged principles of the constitution, may tend at once to uphold the just rights and prerogatives of the Crown, and to give security to the liberties of the people." But the language of the speech of this session is of a more decisive character, and calls upon parliament to adhere carefully to the acknowledged principles of the constitution, by which the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of both Houses of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people, are equally secured. He did hope, therefore, that those important words had not been lightly or inconsiderately adopted; and that it was the intention of government to make some essential and important alterations in the bill of last session, which might render it more consistent with the constitution, the maintenance of which was not for the exclusive interest of parliament or the Crown, but also for the security and permanent welfare of the people. He was ready to admit, that the opinion which he had formed on the question of reform was different from that formed by the majority of the people; but that was no reason why he, and those who coincided in opinion with him, should submissively give up their opinions to the opinions of the people. It was the duty of the representatives of the people not to be swayed by popular clamour, but to look prospectively to the future interests of the country; and it was equally their duty respectfully to express their opinions. If the minority were thus to give way to the majority, he was afraid that this would put an end to all discussion, and that such a deference to public opinion would only prevent them from performing faithfully those duties which they were bound to perform as representatives of the people. He was not, however, surprised at such an expression of public opinion, because he was certain that, if the same means were used on any question, the result would be the same.—He feared that the same consequences would invariably follow, in all times and places, when the questions referred to popular interests, and to that necessary control over the people which was established solely for their welfare and security. He feared, if the same indiscreet use of the first name in the country were resorted to on any occasion, that the same consequences would follow, and the more decidedly if the popular excitement should be directed against the institutions of the country. No one was more ready than he to admit that the country had been subjected to severe distress, and that, on account of long wars, and too lavish expenditure of public money, the springs of industry had been crippled; but he would caution those who represented the people, and who had some power in influencing their opinions, against turning their attention from the real cause of the distress to others which had no connection with it. They were but too much disposed to look with suspicion on any government; and it would not improve their opinion of the present government if they found in the end that they had been deceived as to the true causes of their distress. He would admit again, that the public opinion was contrary to his opinion; but still he would not give up his opinion, because he thought he was by the course he pursued, consulting the true and permanent interests of the community; and he doubted not that the time would come when the people, by experience, would admit that those who now entertained such unpopular opinions were not the least faithful or the least judicious advisers.

A long discussion ensued, but no amendment was proposed, and the motion in favour of the address was agreed to, nemine contradicente.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM BILL FOR ENGLAND.

JUNE 24, 1831.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the following sentence from his Majesty's speech on the opening of the session was read by the clerk,—

"Having had recourse to that measure, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people on the expediency of a reform in the representation, I have now to recommend that important question to your earliest and most attentive consideration, confident, that in any measures which you may prepare for its adjustment, you will carefully adhere to the acknowledged principles of the constitution, by which the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of both Houses of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people, are equally secured."

Lord John Russell then propounded his scheme for Parliamentary Reform, and concluded by moving, in the name of the government, for leave to bring in a bill to amend the representation of England and Wales.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that his sole object in rising on the present occasion was to make a few observations tending, as he thought, to promote the convenience of the House in this discussion. He trusted that his so limiting himself at present, would not prevent him from entering more fully into the subject on another occasion, on the ground that the strict forms of the House would not allow him to speak to the question twice. He thought the noble lord wrong in supposing that this bill could be committed without a lengthened discussion, in which the sense of the House should be pronounced. The noble lord towards the conclusion of his speech, stated that he had answered the objections to which his bill is liable. But he trusted, that the noble lord would allow gentlemen upon that side of the House to state their objections themselves. At the same time he assured the noble lord and the House, that he had no wish but that the measure should be fully and fairly discussed, both as to its principles and as to the manner in which it would involve the interests of this country. He was willing to have this discussion, and to take the sense of the House on the second reading of the bill. He remembered that in the last session leave was given to bring in the bill without opposition; and although there was no apparent alteration made in the bill, and he for one was prepared already to record his vote, yet he recollected that many members of the present parliament had not heard the former discussion upon the bill. Nor could he but bear in mind also that the subject of reform had been especially recommended to the careful attention of the House in the speech from the throne, which called on parliament to give it an early and full deliberation. He was willing to waive all opposition to the first reading of the bill, if that were the opinion of those around him. From the experience of the last session he was of opinion, that a debate, on which it is understood that there shall be no division, was productive of great inconvenience, and, therefore, as there was not now to be a division, he thought it much better that there should not be a debate. If they were now to commence a discussion, it might be protracted for six or seven nights, as before, without an object. Wishing the bill, for these reasons, to be then read, and discussed on another night, he would forego even the temptation to reply which the noble lord's sarcasms held out to him. He should allow all the sarcastic allusions of the noble lord to pass without notice, as any reply to his speech would lead to a discussion. He wished only to request, that if he were silent respecting the bill on that occasion, it should not be supposed that he concurred in any of the noble lord's conclusions from his arguments, or adopted his inferences from history. He thought that one free and full discussion on the principle of the bill would be sufficient previously to going into the committee. He spoke as an individual; but he would say, that nothing should hinder him from taking the sense of the House upon the second reading. As he waived all opposition to the first reading, he hoped the noble lord would allow a fair and sufficient interval to elapse before the second reading, so as to give the hon. gentlemen who now first heard the principles of the bill stated, time for full deliberation. The noble lord had thought proper to make a speech of two hours' length; he (Sir R. Peel) did not complain of it; but he thought that it showed the subject to be one which called for grave deliberation. He, therefore, hoped the noble lord would give the House an opportunity of complying with the recommendation of the Crown, by carefully considering the reform upon which they should decide. He hoped also, that before the House was called on to come to a decision on the bill to be read a first time that evening, they should be put in possession of the principal provisions of the bill for reforming the representation of Ireland. To that bill the noble lord, in his speech that evening, made no allusion. Although the Irish bill was not brought in during the last session till after the English bill was read a second time, yet the House was made fully aware of the changes intended to be made in the representation of that part of the kingdom. He did not mean to insist that all the details of the bill should be minutely explained; but he at the same time, thought it essential that they should be informed of the chief points of the Irish and Scotch bills, before they decided upon the English bill, which was in fact but a part of one whole subject, to complete which the other bills were necessary. The speech of his Majesty had not particularly directed their attention to the representation of England, but generally to that of the whole people, including of course Ireland and Scotland. If, therefore, the House would keep the promise to which the address now pledged it, to take the representation of the whole people into its early and careful consideration, the English bill could not be discussed until the House was in possession of the provisions of the Irish and Scotch bills. He did not desire that those bills should proceed pari passu with the English bill; but that they should be known to the House before it came to any conclusion or decision upon the latter. He concluded by expressing his hope that he had confined himself within the limits which he had prescribed at the commencement of his remarks, and by requesting the noble lord to name a day for the second reading of the bill, sufficiently distant to allow of full deliberation, and not too late for strict compliance with the king's recommendation, that they should give the subject their early attention.

Lord John Russell was anxious to do what the House wished, and would therefore propose, that the bill to be brought in should be read a second time on Thursday next. As to the bills for Ireland and Scotland, he did not think that it would be convenient to bring them in at present, considering the state of parliamentary business. The bill for altering the representation of Ireland would be submitted to the House by his right hon. friend the secretary for Ireland, and that for Scotland by the Lord Advocate, giving due notice of their intentions; and whenever his Majesty's ministers should see that the state of public business gave an opportunity for their introduction they would be brought in.

Sir Robert Peel had not supposed, that he could give rise to so much difference of opinion, by proposing that which he considered an amicable arrangement. He thought that the first thing to be looked for respecting a measure making in the constitution the important changes contemplated by his Majesty's ministers, was a minute understanding of all its bearings. If, therefore, the majority of the House agreed with him, he should propose, firstly, that the bill be read a second time on Monday se'nnight. If they began on that day the discussion might be completed, uninterrupted by Saturday and Sunday. He would also repeat his hope that the government, who must be themselves aware of their own intentions respecting Ireland, should not make them a secret to the House; because it was impossible fully to judge of the English bill, without knowing in what manner the representation of Ireland and Scotland would be adjusted. He wished to assure the noble lord, that when he made those remarks, he was prepared to enter upon the discussion without any preliminary acerbity of feeling.

After some remarks by Lord Althorp and Mr. Stanley, leave was given to bring in the bill.

TAXES ON THE PRESS.

JUNE 28, 1831.

In a debate which arose out of the presentation of a petition, by Mr. Hunt, from certain members of the working classes, of the National Political Union, in Marylebone lane, complaining of the restriction which particular taxes now imposed upon the liberty of the Press,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he had heard, with great satisfaction, from the right hon. gentleman who filled the high situation of Attorney-general, so complete a denial of the doctrine of the hon. member for Middlesex, and the learned and hon. gentleman the representative of Kerry—that let what might be published, no law was necessary to check it—it might find its level by means of free discussion—all encouragements to blasphemy might pass unnoticed by the law, and that confidence might be reposed in the progress of public opinion. The right hon. and learned gentleman, his Majesty's Attorney-general, had said, that he never would consent that government should lose the power of checking such crimes by law, and of punishing the instigators; and he (Sir R. Peel) agreed with the learned gentleman in that opinion; as he also concurred in the opinion that the law on such occasions ought not to be called into operation too frequently, and without the exercise of great caution and circumspection. He protested against the extraordinary, absurd, and wicked doctrine held in these publications, and espoused by some hon. members, that in no case ought government to prosecute. The hon. member for Middlesex had said, that prosecutions in many cases made the fortunes of the individuals prosecuted, and that the fact of additional publicity being given to the original matter was to be considered; but the learned gentleman opposite, by availing himself of the Stamp Act, had effected his object without inflicting upon the public the mischief of giving publicity to the objectionable matter. It must be most painful to any officer of the Crown to appear to connive at such a person as Carlile and his infamous publications; but the Attorney-general had judged between the evil of perpetual prosecutions and of his apparent connivance, and he had been satisfied that more advantage was to be derived to the public from this apparent indifference or connivance, than from a series of improvident prosecutions. The publications alluded to were calculated to rouse the just indignation of society. When windows were broken by a riotous mob, it was insinuated that persons adverse to reform had joined the crowd, and had effected the mischief, in order to cast an obloquy on the other party; and now that these infamous publications were set forth and acknowledged by the authors, up rose the hon. baronet, the member for Westminster, and insinuated that other parties were at the bottom of these works. The hon. baronet must be aware that the persons whose names were put to the publications were the authors of them. The hon. member for Middlesex had called himself the great advocate for the diffusion of truth and knowledge. He (Sir R. Peel) would agree, that constitutional knowledge was a very good thing; but when he heard this great advocate for constitutional knowledge inform the public of England that there was no difference between the Ordinances of Charles X. for suppressing the press, and the English Six Acts, he must confess that he had great distrust in those doctrines, and he could not expect that great benefits would result from a diffusion by the press of what this great advocate of knowledge might utter. He had thought the hon. member for Middlesex so wise, that he would have proceeded to advise the people of England to do something or other. He had expected that the hon. member would have excited the people of England to follow the example of the people of France, and to perform some tremendous acts; and he had felt greatly relieved when the hon. member contented himself with recommending them to chase the statutes from the statute-book. Did the hon. member, who had been selected as the representative of the intelligence of the metropolitan county, see no distinction between Acts of Parliament constitutionally passed, and formally ratified by the three branches of the legislature, and the Ordinances of Charles X. passed in defiance of the legislature, and in destruction of the constitution? He would recommend the hon. member to refrain from drawing parallels between what he appeared not to be thoroughly acquainted with. He should refrain from saying more until the whole question came regularly before the House, which he supposed it would; and he hoped that, in the meanwhile, it would receive the serious consideration of members. He did hope also that his Majesty's government would revise the opinion they formerly maintained—an opinion which they maintained upon less information than they might now be supposed to possess, being in office. He hoped, then, with their present information and with the knowledge which they must possess of the efforts which were now making to undermine the morals, religious faith, and loyalty of the country, they would not be averse from reconsidering the opinions maintained by them in 1819; and if, from their experience in office, they saw any reason to alter those sentiments, there was no man who would be so unworthy as to taunt them with inconsistency.

Sir Robert Peel afterwards, in reply to some explanatory observations by Mr. Hume, said, that the hon. member did not comprehend the French Revolution. The people of France did not rise for the purpose of supporting the liberty of the press—they rose against an illegal assumption of authority, under which Charles X. sought to destroy the independence and authority of the two Chambers of Legislature; therefore, the parallel drawn by the hon. member for Middlesex was most unjust. As to what the hon. member for Preston had said about the Acts in question being void, he would ask that hon. member whether he, in going from that House, would seek for no redress against assault and robbery, merely because the statutes punishing those offences had been enacted by an unreformed parliament?

TRADE WITH CHINA.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he rose to present to the House a petition upon a subject of very great importance; it was a petition from the British Merchants and traders who were resident at Canton. At the present period, when the commercial intercourse of British subjects with the possessions of the British Crown in India, and with the countries adjacent to them, was to be brought before the House, and to be regulated, the petitioners expressed an earnest hope, that the great interests which they represented would not be neglected or abandoned. The petitioners complained that it was in vain to seek redress from the local authorities at Canton, unless they spoke in such a tone as only those armed with the sanction of the government at home could assume; and they added, that it would be needless to seek to influence the Chinese by an appeal to their judgments and notions of right and justice; or, indeed, to influence them through any motives not derived from their fears or their avarice. They stated, in corroboration of this assertion, that whenever the English had assumed a haughty and peremptory tone of menace, the Chinese had ceased to impose their exactions, and had afforded some redress; but that whenever we addressed them in a tone of mere remonstrance, the grievances of our merchants were sure to remain unrequited. In the several attempts which they had in vain made to obtain redress from Chinese oppression, the petitioners begged to state, that they had received the cordial support of the resident officers of the East-India Company, who, moreover, had facilitated as much as in them lay the forwarding of the present petition. The petitioners looked forward to the most beneficial results from the appointment of a resident British civil officer, in an ambassadorial capacity, or rather, perhaps, as a diplomatic agent at Canton, to whom the British residents might seek for redress at the court of China, for injuries to their persons or property, should parliament in its wisdom recommend such an appointment. In presenting this important petition, he would not himself venture to offer any opinion on the several topics to which it referred; the subject was of too complex and important a character to be lightly touched upon, and would be brought under the consideration of a committee to be expressly appointed (that evening, as he understood) to continue the examination commenced last session into the question of our East-Indian relations in all their bearings. Till the evidence of that committee were before the House, he thought all discussion on our East-Indian trade or policy would be premature, if not mischievous; and therefore he would studiously avoid provoking such a discussion on the present occasion. There were two points specified in the petition, which, however, he could not pass over in silence, as the petitioners laid great stress on them, as urging the expediency—indeed, necessity—of the diplomatic agent they wished to have appointed. By the law of China no difference existed, so far as punishment was concerned, between the crimes of murder and manslaughter; so that the murder of an Englishman was a matter of little moment in the eyes of a Chinese, apart from their general ill-treatment of all foreigners. Then the Chinese regarded every subject of the celestial empire who had departed from the bounds of the empire, as an alien and an outcast, who was ipso facto not entitled to any protection of the law—as one who had, in fact, forfeited every legal and political right. They regarded all foreigners as in the same way outcasts and aliens from their respective countries, and, as such, no longer within the protection of their laws. Under the influence of this erroneous impression, they oppressed these foreigners without remorse, shame, or fear; and, according to the petitioners, would continue to do so till we had disabused them by sending out a diplomatic agent as representative of the home government. The right hon. baronet concluded by saying, that he should refer the petition to the committee to be re-appointed that evening, trusting that from its great importance it would meet with its best attention.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

ABUSES OF THE PRESS.

JULY 1, 1831.

On the question, that the House resolve itself into a committee on the Customs Acts—

Sir H. Hardinge said, that seeing the hon. member for Middlesex in his place, he wished to advert to a subject which had been started a few days ago. It arose out of a statement, or opinion, given by the right hon. member for Tamworth (Sir R. Peel) that certain seditious and disgusting publications were the authorship of the parties from which they purported to have proceeded. The hon. member for Middlesex, on the other hand, had insisted that they were written by persons "in the enemy's camp"—that is to say, that the authors of them were men who there professed opinions very different from the sentiments they really entertained. After some skirmishing, the hon. member for Middlesex had admitted, that what he had at first broadly asserted was only matter of suspicion. As he (Sir H. Hardinge) had said on a former day, if this suspicion were true, no punishment could be too severe for such a treacherous libeller; and without attaching too much importance to the matter, he might, perhaps, be allowed to ask the hon. member for Middlesex, whether he were able to substantiate the assertion, that the publication came from the "enemy's camp," or whether he were prepared to admit, that he had made an improper statement?

Mr. Hume was certainly not at all prepared to admit, that he had made an improper statement; on the contrary, he was prepared to re-say what he had said on the former day. After some observations from Mr. Hume, which Sir H. Hardinge treated as a most impotent explanation,—

Sir R. Peel observed, that, sated with the eloquence of the hon. member for Middlesex, he had left town, and had derived his knowledge of what passed on the last occasion chiefly from the ordinary channels of such information. He had been informed, also, that during his absence the hon. member had made something like an attack upon him (Sir R. Peel), although, when he was present, the hon. member had complimented him on his good-humour, which he professed he would endeavour to imitate. From the charge of connection, whether it were or were not intended to be made, he could not condescend to vindicate himself; and he would rather a thousand times be the object of such a suspicion than the author of it. That any man of common honesty or common sense would resort to such an infamous proceeding, it was impossible to believe. The accusation was so extravagant as to contradict and refute itself. He admitted that there were strong facts against him, and one of them was, the conclusive piece of evidence, that Mr. Lorimer belonged to the "enemy's camp" because he lived at the west end of the town. Of course, he could not be a true and sincere friend of the Reform Bill if he lived west of Temple Bar. But notwithstanding this fact, he could not condescend to vindicate himself from the suspicion. It was too much to make any set of men answerable for the misconduct of others, even of persons who might happen to take part with them, much less of those to whom they were opposed. The riots in Paris were attributed to those who were desirous of bringing back Charles X. By the same sort of inference, the breaking of the windows during the recent illuminations was said to have been committed at the instigation of the Tories. As to citizen Hetherington, he had never heard of that citizen, until his name was mentioned in the House by the hon. member for Middlesex himself. If the hon. member supposed that he (Sir R. Peel) alluded to Hetherington in his reply to the hon. baronet opposite (Sir F. Burdett), he was entirely mistaken. On the contrary, he thought that the hon. baronet was alluding to Carlile, and other persons of that description, whose names were more generally known than Hetherington's. What he then said was, that when the hon. baronet recommended that those writers should not be punished by the arm of the law, he ought not at the same time to shield them from the only other punishment which could reach them, that is, public indignation, to which they could not be insensible, if they were not destitute of every particle of good feeling. He would mention another instance of that kind of imputation of which he had complained. He found that there had, somehow or other, crept into the new Reform Bill a clause which became the subject of much animadversion, because it disqualified from voting all householders paying their rent quarterly. Well, he found that that unfortunate clause was also said to be the production of the secret enemy. But he had not been prepared to find any one going so far as to impute to any friend of his, or of those gentlemen who generally acted with him, a connection with the authors of the infamous writings alluded to by the hon. baronet.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

JULY 6, 1831.

In the third day's debate on the motion for the second reading of the Reform Bill for England and Wales,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, who was loudly called for, spoke as follows :—There is one advantage resulting from the present system of representation, which has not been prominently referred to in debate—I mean the advantage of ensuring to the minority its fair influence on the public councils. As this House is at present constituted, no opinion, however unpopular, is excluded; nor can any degree of public excitement and enthusiasm, bar altogether the avenues through which those who are uninfected by the prevailing fear, and are prepared to struggle against the current of popular clamour, can ensure access to the deliberations of Parliament—of that advantage I now avail myself—and as a member of that minority, ridiculed as a despairing, and denounced as an unpopular, minority, I claim the privilege of being heard with attention—a privilege which ought to be conceded with an indulgence proportioned to the comparative smallness of our numbers, and hopelessness of our cause. I am swayed by no motives of self interest to take my present course,—I have no borough to protect—I have contracted no obligation to those who possess that influence which the present measure is intended to destroy, and I am about to resist the wishes of a great and overpowering majority—backed by the support of an united government—and acting in conformity with the supposed opinions and wishes of the king. My opinions therefore—erroneous though they may be—cannot be influenced by considerations of personal or political advantage. While I have been listening to this debate, and have heard the cheers echoed and re-echoed from each side of the House, on the introduction of some topic involving personal allusions, or party criminations, I have more than once lamented that we allowed ourselves to be diverted by matters of such trifling concern, from the mighty subject of our deliberations, and that we forgot, even for a moment, amidst the excitement of party conflict, that we are occupied in the establishment of a new system of representation, involving in its issue the highest and most permanent interests of the country. That is the great question which I wish to discuss, and to which I would willingly confine myself. I rejoice that I did not follow last night the learned member for Calne, that I was not betrayed by the just provocation to bitter and acrimonious reply which that speech afforded, a speech commencing with pious exhortations to forbearance, with solemn inculcations of the necessity of temper and moderation, of the oblivion of all party interests and party resentments, but ending with a bitter philippic against the late administration, and taunts and insinuations directed against individuals who formed a part of it. Let the hon. gentleman select some other occasion for preferring his charges, and he shall then have our defence, and we shall expect some better proof than his mere unsupported assertion, that we have been the enemies of public liberty. I never made frothy declamations about liberty, but I deny that any act of mine violated that liberty, or diminished the security of its continued enjoyment. Why did the hon. gentleman, after preaching on the necessity of suspending, at least for the present, all party animosities, and enlarging and exalting our minds to a level with the great question of domestic reform—why did he select this occasion to institute an invidious comparison between the failures of the late, and the success of the present administration? All was confusion and discord under the late government! Under the present, says the hon. gentleman, there is universal tranquillity and contentment. I hope it is so. Painful as the contrast might be, in some respects, to the late government, I shall cordially rejoice if the hon. gentleman can prove, that his compliments to the present are well merited. But, in the absence of that proof, I protest against the justice of the learned gentleman's condemnation. This, and this only, will I state in my own vindication; that during the short period of the last six weeks—since the boasted restoration of tranquillity, long after the day star of reform had glittered above the horizon, many more lives of the king's subjects have been sacrificed in conflicts with the military and police, than were lost during the whole period of six years which I presided over the Home department. I blame not the military nor the police, I blame not those who were compelled by necessity to resort to the last dreadful means of protecting the public peace; but it is too much to expect, with these undeniable and notorious facts, that I should acquiesce in the justice either of the hon. gentleman's satire or his praise. Ireland, too! The hon. gentleman takes credit for the restoration of peace in Ireland. Let him wait a few short days, and he will hear a proposal, founded on the disturbed state of Ireland, for increasing the powers of the government, and adding to the severity of the law. He may then discover, that when he shall be next appointed to chaunt the hymn of triumph over the predecessors of the present government—it will be well for him to omit the strophe which celebrates the tranquillity of Ireland. I turn from topics of this nature, into which I was compelled by the learned gentleman reluctantly to enter—and will confine myself exclusively to the great question before us. I propose to review the main arguments which have been, in the course of this debate, urged in its support, and to attempt the refutation of them when they rest either on unstable foundations of fact—or on conclusions illogically drawn from the premises. I will, in the first place, enumerate the arguments on which the chief stress has been laid—and consider each of those arguments consecutively in the order in which I place them. The main arguments in favour of the bill are these, first, that the time has arrived when we must correct those defects in our representative system, which have arisen from the lapse of time and change of circumstances—when we must abolish practices which are modern abuses, and must, in the terms of the speech from the throne, “resort to the acknowledged principles of the constitution,” for the purpose, not of capricious and arbitrary improvement, but of restoring that purer and better system which was originally contemplated, and at a former period actually existed. Secondly, that the House of Commons, as at present constituted, does not practically answer the ends for which alone a popular assembly is established—that it is in arrear of the intelligence of the age—and being less enlightened than the great body of the people, is not their fitting representative. Lastly, that whether theoretically well constituted or not, the House of Commons has lost the confidence of the people—that there is, whether it be rational or not, a demand for reform which cannot be resisted—that the question is one not of choice but of necessity—for that, without reform, the country will not submit to be governed. Before I consider these arguments, I wish to notice one preliminary objection which has been taken to any consideration of reform, in which I cannot entirely concur. It has been urged by some, that the elective franchise, whether corporate or freehold, partakes so much of the nature of property, that it is scarcely within our power to legislate regarding it. If well founded, this argument would dispose of the whole question; but to that extent I cannot concur in it. Whatever the hon. and learned member for Calne may think, I never contended that the elective franchise was of the nature of property. When the cases of Grampound and of Penryn were under consideration, I expressly claimed for parliament the right of taking away the franchise of the minority, if the majority were convicted of an offence which rendered the borough unfit to be trusted with electoral rights—I, who was a party to the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders of Ireland, could hardly think I was guilty of an act which amounted to a violation of private property. The disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders was a measure necessary, but still greatly to be deprecated; and although I see a clear and palpable distinction between the individual right of an Irish forty-shilling freeholder, and a corporate franchise which has existed for centuries, still, if you establish the same overruling necessity for the forfeiture of the latter trust, I do not deny the competency of parliament to legislate. I must not omit to state, also, that I have on a former occasion admitted the great objection which I felt to any proposition for compensating the holders of borough franchises. I stated, that it appeared to me, that there was the greatest difficulty in the way of pecuniary compensation for the loss of a privilege of this nature; and, in the temper of the present times, it would be exceedingly difficult, I apprehend, to recognise any such principle. While, however, I admit the distinction between private property and the elective franchise, I must also say, that, if you take away this ancient privilege on any other ground than that of overpowering necessity, clearly established, you do shake the public confidence in the security of property itself. On every ground we ought to be most cautious not to interfere, without an urgent necessity, and strictly to limit our interference to that necessity. First, we cannot interfere at all, without shocking those feelings of reverence and affection with which ancient institutions of government are naturally regarded, and which are more powerful than reason itself, in promoting habits of proper obedience and submission to law; and, secondly, by our interference we establish a precedent by which our franchises, which are equally distinguishable from property, may be exposed to hazard. What, let me ask, is the franchise of the peerage? That, too, is a public trust for public objects; and, if you deal lightly with corporate franchises which have endured for ages, for the sake of visionary schemes of speculative improvement you establish a precedent, by which, at no distant period, the franchise of the peerage, and even the prerogative of the Crown, being public trusts, and forfeitable upon similar reasons of supposed public improvement, may be attacked upon the same ground, and for the same reasons. Whilst I admit the distinction, therefore, between those public trusts and private property, I say that we should proceed with the utmost caution, and only upon undeniable proof of overruling necessity; and I rejoiced to hear the hon. and learned member for Calne state, that although he was among the foremost to contend for the taking away these public franchises, yet that none should surpass him in zeal in contending for the sanctity and inviolability of private property of all descriptions. But what is the danger to which that property is exposed? It is not the danger of absolute violence, of a tumultuous insurrection of the poor, in order to seize upon the possessions of the rich. The danger is, that certain descriptions of property, the existence of which is supposed to retard improvement, or to diminish the comforts of the many—may be, if not sacrificed, at least greatly impaired on some such suggestions as those on which we are now called upon to confiscate the elective franchise. We may console ourselves, however, with the reflection, that should such attempts be made, the learned gentleman will be the foremost to resist them; and if, therefore, any person shall be found, holding the situation of chancellor of exchequer who should, in breach of a solemn compact—in contempt of the clearest enactments of parliament, propose the violation of private property, by imposing an exclusive tax on the transfer of that property by the fundholder—I shall remind the learned gentleman of his promise, and rely upon his co-operation in strenuously resisting the robbery. I revert to the consideration of the arguments which I have before enumerated, as the main arguments relied upon in support of the bill. The first is, that there has been a gross encroachment upon popular rights—that nomination boroughs exist in defiance of the acknowledged principles of the constitution, and that we are adhering to those principles, by establishing a uniform system of popular election. This is the argument of the noble lord—I should rather say it was his argument—for nothing can be more marked than the contradiction of the speech of last March, and his speech in the present debate. In March the noble lord contended, that we might revert to some past period of our history, and there discover the universal recognition of the right of free popular election. He quoted the 34th Edward I., the statute de tallagio non concedendo. He attempted to prove, that taxation was illegal without the consent of the whole people, evidenced by popular elections. He said, there was a time when the House of Commons did represent the people of England, meaning, of course, in consequence of the exercise by the people of general suffrage; and his conclusion was, that if the Reform Bill be a question of right, right is in favour of reform. But what says the noble lord now? He assumes a position the very opposite of that which he before assumed, and absolutely cuts from under himself the ground on which he formerly stood. He now denies, that there was ever any uniform practice or right of popular election; he proves that nomination boroughs have always existed; and his argument is, not that there are any acknowledged principles of the constitution to which we can revert—but, on the contrary, that there are no such principles, and because there are none, we are at perfect liberty to make what changes we please, and to consult our own judgment as to the nature and extent of them. Now, let us keep these two questions distinct. It may be no reason for maintaining very limited rights of election, or nomination boroughs, that such things have always existed—but if they have always existed, you are not justified in exasperating the public mind by denouncing them as modern corruptions, and as the recent encroachments of a rapacious oligarchy upon popular liberties and privileges. The noble lord now proves that they have always existed, and I repeat, that by that proof he destroys the foundations of the argument on which he before relied, namely, that he was about to restore a previously existing constitution, and that the people had a right to reform. Nothing can equal the success of the noble lord, in the establishment of his second position, and the consequent destruction of his first. He shows triumphantly, that it is nonsense to talk about the acknowledged principles of the constitution—that our system of representation conforms to no settled rules, but that it is the work of time and accident, and the varying circumstances of society. Says the noble lord, in the speech which he made in this debate—"It will be seen, that during this period there was nothing more irregular or less settled than the right of boroughs to send members to parliament." Now the period to which the noble lord here alluded is a very remote one, for it comprehends, I think he stated, 250 years before the reign of Henry VI. We have got the noble lord's admission, therefore, that for 250 years before the year 1420, nothing could be more unsettled than the system of representation. His second period extends from the reign of Henry VI. to the end of the line of the Tudors, during which period, says the noble lord, it was thought right that there should be some change in the constitution of the House of Commons. Of course we expected to be told, that the changes so made included the return of members for large, populous, and commercial places. But "no, no," says the noble lord, "it is a striking fact, that the great proportion of the boroughs summoned within this period were not large and prosperous towns, but, on the contrary, a great many of the small boroughs, particularly in Cornwall, were enabled to send burgesses to parliament; and of the total number of places now proposed to be disfranchised, of the fifty-five boroughs referred to in Schedule A, no less than forty-five were, according to the noble lord, created or restored in the reigns of the Tudors." The modern doctrines of reform, therefore, were evidently no part of the system of the Tudors, for they selected places to send members, many at least of which were the reverse of flourishing and populous. The noble lord mentioned another circumstance as a remarkable fact. He said, "I mention it as a remarkable fact, that the power of sending members was given to these boroughs by the Tudors, apparently rather with the intention and object, that the members sent should depend upon the Crown, than with any view of enlarging and improving the representation of the country." Well, then, is it not quite clear, from this statement of the noble lord, that these small boroughs are not modern usurpations by the Peers on the rights of the people, but that they did exist at an early period of our history? In confirmation of this position of the noble lord, I may refer to a very learned writer upon the constitution of this country, and one free from the possibility of any imputation of partiality—I mean Mr. Hallam, who, like the great majority of the literary community, is decidedly opposed to the present bill. Mr. Hallam says, that sixty-two members were added, at different times, for petty boroughs—that those members were under the influence of the Crown; and he adds, that "ministers took much pains with the elections for those boroughs; of which many proofs remain." Does not all this show, that the mode of conducting public business in this country in former times was not by the operation of three independent checks upon each other—the King, the Lords, and the Commons; but that at an early period the administration of affairs was carried on by a House of Commons in which both the Crown, and members of the House of Peers, exercised considerable influence—I say not whether it be right or wrong, that that influence should have existed. I am not arguing, that because it existed, therefore it must continue; but for this I do contend—that the fact of the existence of the influence cannot be denied; and that for the last 400 years the small boroughs have formed a part of the representative system. But it may be said, true, these places existed in former times, but they have decayed, and were anciently much more populous than they are at present. Now, this is not the fact; many of those boroughs are as large now as they ever were. With all his research on this subject, does not the noble lord know what appears with respect to Gatton, on the indisputable authority of the Harleian and Lansdowne manuscripts? In the reign of Elizabeth, Mr. Copley used to nominate the members for Gatton, in default of electors, the proprietor being a minor, and in the custody of the court of Wards. We find too, that Lord Burleigh directed the sheriff to make no return from Gattton without instructions from himself; the instructions were, that the sheriff should cancel the return containing the name of Mr. Francis Bacon, and substitute that of Mr. Edward Brown, there being then no burgesses existing. Finding no precedents for this bill before the reign of Henry VI., and none in the reigns of either the Tudors or the Stuarts—the noble lord, with not very becoming exultation, relies on the authority of Cromwell. Cromwell effected a reform in the House of Commons, which received, says the noble lord, the sanction of Lord Clarendon. But does the noble lord recollect, that before Cromwell reformed the Commons, he had abolished the Lords? and does it follow, that the democratic assembly constituted by Cromwell after the extinction of monarchy, and after the abolition of the House of Lords, is a happy model for a House of Commons which is to co-exist with a limited monarchy, and with a House of Lords possessing co-ordinate authority? Perhaps, if Cromwell had so to constitute his reformed House of Commons that it should not usurp the functions of the other branches of the legislature, he might have been a more prudent and moderate reformer than the noble lord. There is, at least, among the panegyrics lavished on him by his admirers, one by Waller, which praises him for the caution with which he effected great improvements in the state, through the means of gradual and almost insensible change.

“Still as you rise, the State, exalted too,
Feels no disorder when ’tis changed by you:
Changed like the world’s great scene, when without noise,
The rising sun night’s vulgar lights destroys.”

But, said the noble lord, we have the authority of Lord Clarendon in favour of that reform, forgetting that Lord Clarendon was not then speaking his own opinion, but merely referring to a prevailing sentiment as to the changes made by Cromwell. I advise new members to distrust nothing more than quotations. When I hear Bacon or Burke, or any other great authority cited, I know that sometimes in the next page, and more frequently in the same, a passage might be found, which, if taken separately, might be relied upon as an authority for opposite doctrines. See, in this case, what is the real value of Lord Clarendon’s sanction of Cromwell’s reform. When Lord Clarendon comes to speak his own sentiments, we shall find he was not quite so complimentary. There were two parliaments summoned by the protector, founded on his new basis: the first sat for a few months, and, as will be the case with many reformed parliaments hereafter, I fear, did nothing. Lord Clarendon remarks of it, that “it spent its time in long debates and wrangling discourses.” Cromwell dissolved it in seven months, and called another parliament on the same principle, which lasted only three months; and when Lord Clarendon, who, according to the noble lord, is the greatest panegyrist of that reform, comes to speak of it in his own person, he uses these expressions:—“The parliament did not re-assemble with the same temper and resignation with which it parted.” “It quickly appeared how insecure new institutions are; and when the contrivers of them have provided, as they think, against all mischievous contingencies, they find they have unwarily left a gap open to let their destruction in upon them.” Such is the opinion of the philosophic historian, when speaking his own sentiments upon Cromwell’s notable reform. I have then, at least, as much right to claim Lord Clarendon as an authority against reform, as this noble lord can have to rely upon him as an authority in its favour. I think I have said enough on the first branch of the argument, and have, with the aid of the noble lord, proved, that the projected reform is not a restoration of the constitution; and that the House of Commons, as it now exists, is not a novelty and an usurpation. I approach now the second argument, which is in substance this—that whether the House of Commons as it at present exists, be or be not a novelty or an usurpation, still, that time has effected such changes in the fabric of society, that there must be corresponding changes in the form and mode of government; that nomination boroughs are odious to the people, that their existence is absurd in theory and pernicious in practice, and that you must widen the basis on which representation is hereafter to be founded, to the full extent proposed by this bill. Now I ask two questions connected with this point: first, where is the form of government ever existing, which has provided such security for the possession of property, and the enjoyment of rational freedom, as that which you are about to disturb in one of its essential elements, viz. the constitution of the House of Commons; and secondly, what proof have you in the history of any country, that a popular assembly, formed on the principle of that uniform right of voting which you are about to establish, has practically co-existed with a monarchy and with an aristocratical body, with powers and functions like the House of Peers. It is only now, since the Revolution of July, that France is about to make a similar experiment. At no former period since the downfall of her absolute monarchy, has there been a Chamber of Deputies directly returned by an individual right of voting. Up to this time, as was truly said by the noble lord, the member for Wootton Bassett, (Lord Porchester) in the ablest first speech which I ever heard delivered, there have been breakwaters against the vehemence of popular opinion. When the national assembly was constituted, it was not returned on any such principle as that of uniform and equal right of voting. A complicated system of election was devised, founded on three bases—geographical, arithmetical and financial, the basis of territory, the basis of population, and the basis of contribution. The assumption of such basis may have been an absurd one; but two out of the three bases were nevertheless assumed, for the express purpose of controlling popular opinion, and of preventing intelligence and property from being overwhelmed by numbers. How can you hope permanently to preserve the free action of two such authorities in the State, as a limited monarchy and an hereditary peerage, if you make the popular assembly the immediate uncontrolled organ of the public will; if you devise no means by which property can exercise a proportionate influence in the election of that popular assembly, but give an equal right to the poorest class of electors, with that you give to the most wealthy? What is the result of this first experiment made by France, of that principle on which we are about to act? France has very recently adopted it—what is the consequence? Why, that the men who headed the Revolution of last July are already become unpopular; their doctrines are too moderate for those of the present constituent body; and in almost every election, they struggle with difficulty against men avowing more democratic and republican opinions. And yet, with this example before us, we are pressed at this moment to adopt the same system as that adopted by France—the same in respect to its uniformity, but much more popular and extensive in respect to the numbers by which the right of voting is to be exercised. It is triumphantly asked, will you not trust the people of England? Do you charge them with disaffection to the monarchy and to the constitution under which they live? I answer, that without imputing disaffection to the people, or a deliberate intention on their part to undermine the monarchy, or destroy the peerage, my belief is, that neither the monarchy nor the peerage can resist with effect the decrees of a House of Commons that is immediately obedient to every popular impulse, and that professes to speak the popular will; and that all the tendencies of such an assembly are towards the increase of its own power, and the intolerance of any extrinsic control. Among the great majority to whom I find myself reluctantly opposed, I cannot help thinking that there are many who, as the excitement is subsiding, are casting a long, lingering look behind, at the ancient institutions of their country, and doubting whether or no there is any such paramount necessity to justify us in incurring the danger of this immense change. I heard, the other night, a quotation from Cicero, made use of by a right hon. member whom I do not now see in his place (Sir James Mackintosh). That hon. member, in the course of a very long and very animated speech, did me the honour, in quoting the opinion of Cicero, in favour of making accessions to the popular power, to suppose that I might have been familiar with it. I did think, notwithstanding that my classical recollections are impaired somewhat by political occupations and public duties—I did think that there were, in the admirable treatise from which that quotation was extracted, some other expressions of a totally different character—some splendid lessons with respect to the principle of changes in established governments, from which, even now, after the lapse of so many centuries, we may derive benefit. I was pleased to see the hon. member drawing political knowledge from a mine so richly stored—I was pleased to see him shedding a light upon our discussions, which he drew from so bright a fount. I repeat with respect to himself, that generous wish which he expressed with regard to Mr. Burke:—“Long may those studies be the solace of virtuous and venerable age." The right hon. member will excuse me if I refer to that very treatise, ay, and to some expressions immediately preceding the very passage he quoted, and attempt to extract from the writings of Cicero a salutary caution. They contain a tempered and very dignified reproof of the haste in which changes in forms of government are sometimes determined on. Cicero condemns the injustice of looking only to one side of the question, and observes to Quintus:—"Vitia quidem tribunatus, præclare Quinte, perspicis. Sed est iniqua in omni re accusanda, prætermisiss bonis, malorum enumeratio, vitiorumque selectio." Now, Sir, let me comment upon that text. Cicero, it seems, was not for condemning institutions rashly, nor was he an advocate for an enumeration of the faults, prætermisiss bonis, of any form of government. "Nam isto quidem modo," he continues, "vel consulatus vituperabilis est, si consulum, quos enumerare nolo, peccata collegeris." Yes, says Cicero, if you adopt this course, no institution will be safe. So I say in the present instance, with respect to the small boroughs and the influence of the peerage: who can doubt that if the government will join with the press in condemning them, unlearned minds—minds unacquainted with the real fact—should madly adopt the censure; nay more, if the absurdity of hereditary legislation should be asserted; if it should be denied, that this prerogative is justly exercised by men who inherit the right from their fathers, without any necessity of personal qualification on their part, a ready assent will be given to such doctrines. More just is the calm observation of Cicero:—"Ego enim fateor in ista ipsa potestate inesse quiddam mali. Sed bonum quod est quaesitum in ea sine isto malo non haberemus." I cannot defend the sale of boroughs—I am not ignorant of the exercise of absolute nomination, yet I am not certain that it will be possible to eradicate these defects, without depriving the country of good that more than counterbalances the evil. Let us act, Sir, upon these maxims of caution; and not, in our too great eagerness to eradicate defects, upset the constitution, which has ensured to the country more happiness and more liberty than any other has ever enjoyed. The learned member opposite (Mr. Macaulay) has contended that the House of Commons is unfit for the purposes for which it is intended. He asserts, that we have consulted the interest of the tax-consumer before that of the tax-payer—that we are in arrear of the intelligence of the age—and, being undeserving of the representative character, that we must submit to extensive reformation. But, Sir, I deny the fact—I deny that the House of Commons, as at present constituted, neglects its duty, or has become incompetent to perform the functions of a legislative assembly—I deny that it is in arrear of the intelligence of the age; and if I do not prove, to the perfect satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind, that the specific charges brought by the learned member against the conduct of the House, are utterly unfounded, I will consent to abandon the whole of the case at once, and go to the second reading of the bill. The first charge is, that we have not laid taxes upon property, but have imposed them upon articles of consumption which press upon the poor. But what were the circumstances under which the Property Tax was removed at the close of the last war? The government was desirous of maintaining that tax—they did, in fact, all in their power to maintain it; but in spite of every effort, it was removed by this House, in consequence of the petitions of the people, demanding its repeal, and charging the House with gross neglect of its duty if that tax were suffered to exist. No less than 400 petitions were presented to the House, to induce it to take off that tax, and, in consequence of those petitions, it was removed. What was the motive for the repeal of the beer duty? Did that repeal show indifference to the comfort of the poor? The complaint is, that we acted too precipitately in the repeal of the duty; and that, in our eagerness to promote the present comfort and enjoyment of the poor, we have overlooked the checks on intemperance and immorality. What pretence is there for saying, that the House is in arrear of the intelligence of the age? Is that charge supported by the conduct of this House on the question of the currency? Or was this House in arrear of the intelligence of the age, when it passed those laws of commercial intercourse introduced by Mr. Huskisson? If the House of Commons had been a reformed House, elected as now proposed, is there any one who believes that those laws could have been enacted? The Catholic question, again, showed that the House of Commons, in consenting to remove the Catholic disabilities, was not in arrear of the intelligence of the age; and

I ask again, if the new House of Commons had existed at the time of the passing of that bill, whether there is a chance that it would have been carried? In that pamphlet which has been so often quoted—Friendly Advice to the Lords—it is admitted, that the Catholic disabilities were removed against the opinions and wishes of the great majority of the people, of the majority of that very class of voters which you are now about to create. Again, the test and corporation acts were repealed against the wishes of the people. [No, no.] Well, I will not rely upon that fact; but at least the Catholic disabilities were. That measure is admitted on all hands to have been passed contrary to the opinions and feelings of a great majority of the people. And if this be the fact, it is rather hard at one time to charge the House of Commons with exceeding the liberality of the people, and acting in contradiction to their feelings and opinions, and at another to represent it as less enlightened and less liberal than the people, and to urge such contradictory statements as grounds for a reform; and the learned gentleman says, that the country has been governed so well, that we must have a House of Commons capable of governing it better. This sentiment has met with the applause of the other side of the House, and on it they would build such great and dangerous innovations. It amounts to this, that without parliamentary reform, for the space of 400 years, there has been so elastic a principle of improvement in the government, such a power of accommodating itself to the spirit of the age, and to the circumstances of the people, that this country has been governed better than any other country on earth has ever been governed. Having effected all this, it becomes necessary to do—what? I should have thought, to adhere to a system which had produced such immense benefits; but no—the inference is the very reverse; in these days of illumination, the just conclusion is, that you ought to upset and destroy that system altogether. The member for Calne says, that looking through the whole habitable world, contemplating society as it now exists in every quarter of the globe, nay that ever since civil institutions have been formed by man, he cannot find any society so perfect as that of England, so far as concerns the development of intellect, the improvement of science, the cultivation of the land, the enjoyment of liberty, or the protection of property. But, adds the hon. gentleman, although all this be true, there are certain defects, which are of such a nature and extent as completely to justify a total change in the representative system. And what are these great defects which require the hazarding of every blessing, for the chance of correcting them? Why, first, there is the state of the penal code; next, the bottomless pit of chancery; and thirdly, in this flourishing and happy country, a new system of representation is necessary, because there is a cumbrous legal process of fines and recoveries. Oh, Sir, I am sick of the miserable pedantry which urges, that in consequence of such petty defects the great advantages of our state of society are to be forfeited; the more miserable, since all these defects the House is not only competent, but has repeatedly manifested its anxiety to remove. If the hon. gentleman can show, that this is not the case—if he can show that the House of Commons, as it is now constituted, is unable to apply adequate remedies to evils of such a nature, then I will confess, that the House stands in need of a reform. But how absurd it is to say, here is a constitution which has given the people every blessing of civil government, but yet cannot remove a few evils which may exist in subordinate institutions. But do I rest here? No. I will prove that these evils being admitted in their fullest extent, you have a better prospect of their remedy by the present House of Commons than you have by a reformed one. What can your new constituency—the £10 householders, know of reforms in the court of chancery—or of your defective system of fines and recoveries? I am sure that if I were to ask a given number of them what fines and recoveries meant, the majority would answer, that a fine was a pecuniary penalty, and recovery a state of convalescence. What was the mode by which the great advocates for reforming all such abuses found their way into this House? Did not Sir Samuel Romilly sit in parliament for a close borough? Does not the learned gentleman himself find his way into this House by a similar avenue? And did not Lord Chancellor Brougham sit for a close borough? In fact, the close boroughs may be said to have generated the reformers. But what pretence is there for charging the House of Commons collectively with indifference to the reform of these specific abuses? By whom was the bill of Lord

Lyndhurst rejected? By the House of Commons. On what ground? Because the House was determined to have a more searching and extensive reform of the court of chancery. By whom was the first blow struck against fines and recoveries? By the House of Commons—and at this moment we have bills before us, originating in an address from this House to the throne, for the absolute destruction of those very fines and recoveries. Then with respect to the penal code; this House has shown a disposition to mitigate its severity. With respect to forgery, I introduced a bill remitting the punishment of death in certain cases. The House was not satisfied, but remitted that punishment much more extensively; and though the bill did not ultimately pass in that shape, it was not this House, but the House of Lords, which restored the punishment. The House of Commons rejected the advice of his Majesty's ministers. It resisted their influence, and insisted upon repealing the punishment of death for the crime of forgery. Why, then, if the arguments of the learned gentleman have any weight, they prove that the reform should take place in the House of Lords. It is they who have defeated the benevolent intentions of the House of Commons, and yet we are proposing to reform not the House of Lords, but the House of Commons, which, in all the instances to which I have referred, has shown that it is neither behind the intelligence of the age, nor neglectful of the complaints of the people. I say, then, Sir, that the alleged reason for change in this House is utterly destroyed. I will now say a few words with respect to the bill itself. It may be said to contain two great principles; the first is the principle of disfranchisement; the second is that of constituting a new representation. Four times have there been essential alterations made in the bill; and although we see held out the phantom of the £10 right of voting, yet four times has that very matter been subjected to changes, and to changes so important, that my confidence must not be asked for those who have felt it necessary to make them. At first the right of voting was given to resident £10 householders, and residence was insisted on as a necessary qualification for the franchise. Now mark the alteration which has been made. What is the effect in Manchester? It altered the constituency of that place so much, that instead of giving the right of voting to resident £10 householders, by a little alteration, the great principle of residence is thrown overboard—it is overpowered by non-resident occupiers of warehouses and counting-houses, and thus the original ground of residence is cut away, as forming the condition of qualification. And then, Sir, what is the effect of the change that has last been made? When gentlemen are asked to support this bill, it is in vain to attempt to conceal the fact from men equally informed and intelligent with ourselves, whose interests and feelings are so deeply affected, that these changes are making alterations by tens of thousands in the numbers of the constituency of the country. I know this may be called mere inadvertency; but really, Sir, if through the inadvertency of his Majesty's government, these changes can be made in a bill, affecting not less than 100,000 people, let me say, the time is not yet come when we can maturely deliberate upon so grave a matter: we are not yet in a condition to legislate at all upon it, and least of all will this House stand excused in hastily passing a law which is brought before us under such circumstances. The projectors of this bill, after having established the £10 franchise, come forward with subsequent alterations which totally alter the character of the constituency. As the bill now stands, every £10 householder is disqualified who pays his rent more frequently than half-yearly. The bill originally gave the right to the weekly and the quarterly tenant. By confining it to the tenant paying half-yearly, you disfranchise many thousand voters in places that I could name. In Birmingham there is a very numerous class of persons who pay rents of 3s. 10d. or 4s. per week, which amount, of course, to £10 a year. By the simple insertion of the words quarterly payments or half-yearly payments, I care not which, there is no use in concealing the fact, the number of such voters would be reduced by many thousands. Why raise expectations so inconsiderately, and defeat them with equal precipitation? What avails it to say that you have acted inadvertently. That you have been administering prussic acid—and that you forgot to look at the prescription. You have made another, and a most important change. You have by this new bill admitted land into the value of the £10 holding. It seems a simple and easy matter to insert "land," but will any man deny, that this is a most important change? Without saying whether these changes are good or bad, I do say that these facts destroy my confidence in the ability of his Majesty's government to conduct such a question to a salutary and happy conclusion. I hope, that hon. gentlemen will consider the effect of the alteration made by the insertion of the word "land" upon our rural economy. If one thing more than another would tend to improve the condition of the peasantry, it is the attaching of small gardens to the tenements they occupy. Now, by making the possession of land with a house a qualification, we encourage landlords to take away those small gardens where they are now enjoyed, and to withhold the possession of them when otherwise the possession might be conferred. It may be said, that landlords will not be influenced by this consideration, and I know that they ought not, but I contend, that the policy and the principle of that law must be bad which tends to sacrifice the improvement of the condition of the peasantry to electioneering interests. These are the main grounds on which I oppose the second reading of this bill. The hon. member who spoke last, expressed his hope that I was prepared to bring forward some scheme of reform, and has taunted me with being at length a reformer. But what did I say in the last session respecting reform? I said, that having left one government in consequence of its resistance to reform, and another government having been formed pledged to reform, I would, rather than risk a change of government—seeing the impossibility of constituting an administration opposed to reform—support a measure of reform introduced by my opponents, provided that measure were perfectly consistent with the safety of the institutions of the country. I said, I might be wrong or I might be right, but that is the extent of the declaration I made, and which I am prepared to make again. I have been uniformly opposed to reform upon principle, because I was unwilling to open a door which I saw no prospect of being able to close; it was not because I thought that the transfer of the franchise from East Retford to Manchester might be in itself injurious, but because I was of opinion that a government which should unsettle the minds of the people upon this subject, would be responsible for the consequences that must result. I certainly was one of those who opposed the giving representatives to Manchester, and to other large towns; because I thought the advantage of such a measure not sufficient to counterbalance the evil of altering the constitution of parliament, and agitating the public mind on the question of reform. And if it be truly said, that the demand for reform has been a steadily increasing demand, if it be the fact that nothing short of this bill will give the least satisfaction, surely I was justified in doubting whether the grant of members to three or four large towns would stay the public appetite for reform, and whether it would not prove the commencement, rather than the close, of the discussion. I do not admit, however, that the settled opinion of this country is fixed, and permanently decided, in favour of this bill. I would advise those who assert it, not to rely too confidently on the duration of the present excitement; to bear in mind the causes which have combined to foment it—and to consider whether they are of lasting operation. Our sober judgment has been disturbed by the recent events in France, by sympathy in the triumph of liberal opinions, and by a natural indignation at the illegal exercise of authority. While those feelings are at their height—a government is formed pledged to reform, and they redeem that pledge by a more extensive measure of reform than was expected by the most sanguine reformer. They dissolve the parliament in order to take the opinion of an already excited people, on a question of all others the most requiring sober and dispassionate inquiry, and they superadd to every other cause of agitation, an appeal to the personal wishes and opinions of the king. With regard to the dissolution of the parliament, it might be right or it might be wrong, but nothing could be more unwise than to countenance the popular belief, that the king was personally interested in the question of reform. I do not for a moment call in question the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to dissolve the late parliament, but I do call in question the prudence with which that prerogative was exercised, the time and mode of its exercise, and above all, the lavish use of his Majesty's name and authority, with the view of influencing election contests. I regret, most deeply, that through their organs of the press, the government condescended to the humiliation of propagating tales which could only be addressed and suited to the lowest and most vulgar class of minds. I regret most deeply that they should, for any purpose whatever, have resorted to the dangerous expedient of teaching the people to associate loyalty to their king with hostility to the constitution of parliament. I do not think it a happy circumstance that the feelings of the people have been thus excited; I doubt the existence of an unanimous feeling as connected with this measure on their part; and I deeply regret that the sober and temperate judgment of the people has been disturbed by a variety of causes. But, Sir, if this feeling be such as we have heard it represented, and if it shall permanently endure, I am then ready to admit, that no government can go on without enacting such measures as shall alleviate and remove that intense feeling. But all I ask is, time for deliberation upon a question of such vital importance; I say, do not rely upon this temporary excitement—do not allow that to be your only guide—do not force this Reform Bill upon the country, upon the assumption that the unanimous voice of the people demands it. I doubt the existence of any such ground; and if you do find hereafter that you have been mistaken—if you find that the people have only been acting under an excitement produced by temporary causes—if they are already sobering down from their enthusiasm for the days of July, let the House remember, that when the steady good sense and reason of the people of England shall return, they will be the first to reproach us with the baseness of having sacrificed the constitution in the vain hope of conciliating the favour of a temporary burst of popular feeling; they will be the first to blame us for deferring this question to popular opinion, instead of acting upon our own judgment. For my own part, not seeing the necessity for this reform, doubting much whether the demand for reform is so urgent, and doubting still more whether, if carried, this measure can be a permanent one, I give my conscientious opposition to this bill. In doing this, I feel the more confident, because the bill does not fulfil the conditions recommended from the throne—because it is not founded on the acknowledged principles of the constitution—because it does not give security to the prerogatives of the Crown—because it does not guarantee the legitimate rights, influences, and privileges of both Houses of Parliament—because it is not calculated to render secure and permanent the happiness and prosperity of the people—and above all, because it subverts a system of government which has combined security to personal liberty, and protection to property, with vigour in the executive power of the State, in a more perfect degree than ever existed in any age, or in any other country of the world.

JULY 12, 1831.

Lord John Russell having moved the order of the day for a Committee of the whole House on the English Reform Bill; Lord Maitland moved, that the petition of the burgesses and inhabitants of the borough of Appleby, which had been presented on the 22nd of June, should be read, and then the petition having been read, his lordship proceeded to move that it be referred to the Committee, and that the petitioners be permitted to produce evidence in respect to the facts stated in the petition, in order to show their claim to be exempted from the operation of that clause in the bill by which they were to be included in the schedule A, containing a list of those boroughs that were to be disfranchised altogether.

Lord John Russell decidedly opposed the motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL expressed his earnest hope, that the majority of the House, anxious as they all must be to guard against establishing so dangerous a precedent as would be done in this case, would well weigh the nature of the petition before them. Should the noble lord who last spoke prevail on the House to reject the motion now before them, it would be decisive as to disfranchising all these boroughs without hearing them. The noble lord said, that the House was competent, as a legislative body, to decide whether they would proceed to disfranchise certain boroughs, on the principles laid down in the preamble of the Reform Bill. He would not discuss the question as to the competency of the House to do so; the petitioners themselves did not controvert this opinion—they did not deny the legislative body to be capable of making laws, but they argued thus:—"We admit, that the principle upon which the disfranchisement of boroughs is to be effected, is a correct one, but we want to show, that the principle does not apply to us." And would any majority of that House, however powerful, and satisfied of the policy of adhering to that principle, refuse these petitioners the opportunity of showing that the principle of the bill did not apply to them? They urged that, as the borough contains more than 2,000 inhabitants, they ought not to lose the right of returning members to parliament, and they desired to show that such is the fact, that the population return of 1811 was correct, and that of 1821 erroneous, by omitting one of the parishes. In what way were the facts they asserted to be established? Surely not by general discussion in the House, but by satisfactory evidence. Admitting the distinction between property and franchise, let us show the latter the respect to which it is entitled. If the House were prepared to refuse these parties a fair opportunity of proving their case, it would establish a most dangerous precedent; for what would prevent the same precedent from being extended to any other bill which might be brought before them; and by which the rights of property or of persons might be endangered.

After a lengthened discussion, Lord John Russell said, the government were prepared to admit the statement of the petitioners, as far as the parishes were concerned, but he would not enter into the case until the bill was in committee.

On the motion for going into a Committee on the second day,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that one point of importance had arisen out of the discussion of last night, to which he wished to invite the attention of the noble lord and of his Majesty's government. The House had decided against hearing counsel in support of the allegations embodied in the petition from the borough of Appleby, but it appeared to him that that decision could not be understood as peremptory against receiving evidence in support of claims to be exempted from the operation of the bill. He would put it to the noble lord whether it were not very possible that Appleby, Ashbourne, or Wareham, for example, might petition for the purpose of being permitted to prove bona fide that they were really entitled to their present franchise, on the principle laid down by ministers themselves, and not with the dishonest design of unfairly impeding, obstructing, or defeating, the Reform Bill. If any case should be proposed for re-consideration where mere vexatious delay was evidently the object sought, then surely it was open for the majority summarily to reject the proposition; but he could see no just reason why they should shut the door indiscriminately on every complaint of grievance, on the assumption that it must necessarily have originated in factious and improper motives. He wished, therefore, to know whether it were the intention of his Majesty's ministers to lay it down as a general rule, that no borough was to be allowed to offer any evidence to the committee, to show that it ought not to be disfranchised. In his opinion the committee should be instructed to receive evidence, and it would always have it in its own power to reject that which was unnecessary, inapplicable, or proposed only to create delay. Another difficulty in connexion with this subject also presented itself to his mind, and he would take that opportunity very briefly to explain its nature, in the hope that the noble lord might be induced to remove it, the rather, as the objection would still hold whether he were disposed to recognise the principle or not. Commissioners, it appeared, were to be appointed for the purpose of dividing the counties, with a view to carry into effect the provisions of the bill; and pursuant to their report the House of Commons hereafter would be in some degree re-modelled. The report then, must, of course, have a very material bearing on the question itself; for certain counties, according to the principle of the measure, were henceforward to be allowed four representatives, and the distribution of these representatives would entirely depend on the decision of the commissioners. Now, if he could be informed by what principle the commissioners thus appointed were to be guided in such divisions, it would, in some degree, simplify the subject, and enable him more distinctly to understand it, and help to disembarass him of a difficulty which he could not at present satisfactorily get over. He was the more desirous of information, as a noble lord, favourable to the principle of the bill, had given a notice of motion, to the effect that such counties, instead of being divided into two separate districts, should remain undivided, and, as a whole, return their four representatives. In the case of Warwickshire, for instance, it was highly important to know whether Birmingham and Coventry were to be included in one division; as every hon. member must see that the landed interest would necessarily be materially influenced by an arrangement which might give the freemen of those places a double franchise. He mentioned this one instance merely in order to illustrate the nature of his objection.

Later in the evening, the House having resolved itself into a committee,—

Sir R. Peel said he meant to address himself simply and exclusively to the matter before the House; and notwithstanding all that had been said, he should confine himself to the question—whether the consideration of the schedules A and B should be adjourned? He should act on the admonition of the noble lord opposite, and make but a short speech. It often happened, that the short speeches were most able and effective. Now, the last word, effective, reminded him of an expression which had been used, he believed by the right hon. member for Windsor—he meant the word “talented.” He accounted for the right hon. gentleman’s using so vile a word, by his having read so much of Irish documents of late. In the discussion, he should avoid as much as he could, any reference to the principle of the bill, which they had had sufficient opportunity to discuss; and it was not regular to renew that part of the discussion in the committee. The time to do so would be in the House, on the motion that the report of the committee be received, or upon the third reading of the bill. There were many details which required discussion; and to them, in the committee he should, as far as possible, confine himself. He thought, that if his Majesty’s government had taken the prudent course after they had obtained a majority of 136 upon the general principle of the bill, not to insist upon the discussion of the details, without waiting for necessary information to be laid before the House, they would have done more than at present to satisfy the House and the country. He knew, indeed, that the advocates of the bill were already satisfied with the information which they possessed, and that they were afraid they should be overtaken by the returns of 1831. They were acting on the principle of population, that is to say, of 2,000 and 4,000; but then they took the population of 1821 as their basis, although they should have, in three weeks, the returns of the population for 1831; by which, perhaps, before the bill could leave that House, it might be proved, that those places which were exempted from the disfranchisement ought, according to the principles of the bill, to have been subjected to it; and those which had been subjected to it, ought to have been exempted. It had been said, those who furnished his Majesty’s ministers with the information on which they had acted, were the partisans of ministers; but no partisans ever performed a service to their party in a more clumsy manner, for documents so conclusive, as to the necessity of delay, he never saw. The noble lord, when he produced these documents, could never have supposed, that the members would look so far as page 58. The noble lord said, that the information contained in these documents was not strictly official. That might be; but it was information sought for and obtained by his Majesty’s government, and deemed by them of great importance; and it was information, in which palpable and not immaterial errors were to be found. In page 58, the names of Bolton, Huddersfield, Bradford, Kidderminster, Kendal, Macclesfield, Oldham, Rochdale, including the township of Spotland, and in short, the names of all the towns, twenty-five in number, inserted in Schedule D were all contained. One gentleman was deputed to collect information connected with the population, in all those several towns; and in his report he states, that he has collected the information furnished in his report, from what he considered the best sources of information; but that if more time had been allowed him, more correct information would have been obtained on the subjects which he was instructed to enquire about. He would not characterise the change the ministers proposed as a new constitution; he would use no objectionable term; he would only say, they were about to make an important change in the representative system; and here was a gentleman, consulted by his Majesty’s ministers, and called upon by them to collect information, whose own report showed, that his Majesty’s government and the House were not in possession of the information on which they could rely, and which might be obtained if a little more time were allowed. But his Majesty’s ministers wished not to wait for this information, and to force the House to discuss and decide, before it was in possession of the requisite information. His right hon. friend had so much understated this case, that the House would perhaps allow him to explain the position in which it was placed. It was not in possession of the instructions under which the gentleman acted who made this report. Whenever a legal opinion was referred to, there was also a clamour for the case; for it was truly said, that the opinion could not be understood without the case; and, in the same way, he said, that the House could not understand this gentleman's report, until it had his instructions. It appeared, however, by his own report, that he had taken a fortnight to complete his mission; and whatever might be thought of the skill and prudence of his Majesty's ministers, their generosity and candour, in producing these documents, could not be doubted. He gave them great credit for it, and hailed it as a good omen of the future discussions on the bill. This gentleman in collecting information, took a town a day, and even a day for each town exceeded the portion of time allowed him. He was not to spend more than a day in collecting information relative to any one town; and probably, though it was not so stated, he was paid by the day. He stated distinctly, however, that one day exceeded the portion of time allowed for his enquiries concerning the population of Rochdale, including the township of Spotland; and therefore he asked the noble lord, whether it were fair to go into the question so far as Rochdale and the township of Spotland were concerned, until the information which this gentleman could not procure, within the time allowed, but which he distinctly intimated might be obtained, had been procured. He had pointed out these errors, because he held it to be his duty to do so. It might be more politic to leave these flaws in the measure, for he was against the bill; but, at the same time, he was its consistent opponent, and if it must be passed, he wished to see it passed with the least mischief to the country. It was yet, perhaps, possible that some of its more injurious clauses might be got over; but if, on its third reading, he found that the evils still over-balanced the good, he should continue to vote against the measure. He trusted, however, that opportunity would be afforded for perfectly fair discussion on every portion of the subject; but at the same time, he would not be a party to any vexatious delay; while, on the other hand, it should be remembered, that those who were more sincere in favour of the bill ought to be the greatest advocates for a full discussion of its details, with a view of making them as perfect as possible. He would briefly state what he considered to be the main defects of the bill, which still remained unanswered, after all that had been said on the other side. In the first place he could not see the advantage of this wholesale disfranchisement, for he set a much higher value on prescription than the noble lord appeared to do; the next point to which he had never heard an answer was that which had been so well urged, that the taking away the nomination boroughs would prevent the accession of new talent to the House; the third point was, that if this bill were carried, there would be no certainty of any one who was called upon to be a minister of the Crown being returned, after the required vacation of his seat on his appointment to office; his next ground of objection was, that this change would be the means of excluding from the House of Commons men of retired habits, but of profound knowledge, who would not like to present themselves before the £10 voters instituted by this bill. Further he had to observe, that the bill would be the means of entirely excluding the colonial interest; and lastly, he objected to the bill, that under a limited monarchy it did not afford sufficient check against the passions of the people. They were about to make an experiment of a uniform system of representation, and were destroying one of those checks, sanctioned by successful usage, without substituting any other. Having said so much as to the merits of the clause now before the committee, he wished to state why he thought it would be more rational to postpone its consideration. Such a course would be consistent with the principles of all who were friends to moderate reform, who might then show how far they were ready to go. Nor would it be inconsistent with the views of the noble lord who introduced the bill, as stated by him not long since. He did not want to quote the noble lord's words, and he admitted, that in the altered temper of the times, a justification might be found for a change of opinion on the subject. The noble lord, however, did not always consider it the wisest course, that disfranchisement should precede enfranchisement. Two years ago the noble lord said, "Let us first agree what towns should be enfranchised, and then we shall consider what boroughs may be disfranchised, and what compensation it may be expedient to grant them." He had, therefore the high sanction of the noble lord, as a moderate reformer, to the principle that they should first consider to what large towns it was proper to give the right of returning members. It had been said, that in doing this a certain arbitrary line must be adopted, and so it must, if the House first proceed to determine what boroughs were to be disfranchised. The most rational course, however, was, to determine, in the first instance, what towns should be enfranchised; and having determined that, to make the disfranchisement commensurate with the enfranchisement. If this course had no other recommendation, it would be preferable on the ground that it would afford something like a check to perpetual disfranchisements. When disfranchisement should hereafter be proposed, it might be said, we have not destroyed the small boroughs as a nuisance, but as a necessary consequence of enfranchising large towns, and the disfranchisement would not precede the necessity for such a measure; but if it could be said, that the House disfranchised boroughs having less than 2,000 inhabitants, and gave the franchise to towns containing a population above 10,000, let it be able to reply, that at least it substituted large for small towns, and only agreed to a disfranchisement commensurate to the necessity of the case. It would be a great advantage, therefore, in his opinion, to postpone the consideration of schedule A. He did not approve of schedule A, on principle; but if he were obliged to consider it, he should prefer doing so after the House had decided to what towns the elective franchise should be given. If they proceeded to disfranchise certain boroughs, as if they were abating a nuisance, the precedent might be used hereafter to demand the sacrifice of any borough to a popular clamour for reform. Upon this precedent they might be called upon to yield to another and more extensive reform, and what opposing check would their own acts and deliberations offer? If a borough containing less than 2,000 inhabitants might be considered a nuisance, and deprived of its franchise, might not a borough containing less than 5,000, inhabitants hereafter be so considered; and upon what principle could the noble lord then refuse to sacrifice it? He had confined himself to stating the grounds upon which he objected to schedule A, and cordially adopted the proposal of his right hon. friend, to postpone the consideration of the clause.

In a debate on the question for going into a Committee on the third day,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE, rising after Lord Althorp, said he could not avoid expressing surprise at the language of the noble lord. He did not hear his hon. and learned friend (Sir C. Wetherell), in any part of his speech, discuss the principle of the bill. His hon. and learned friend's observations had a direct reference to the matter before the House, and he had put questions of great importance to the government, which the noble lord, he must say, had pointedly evaded. The hon. and learned gentleman had asked for information on the subject of that bill which makes population the test of disfranchisement. He had asked what evidence they possessed on the subject of that population, and the noble lord had not thought proper to answer him. The noble lord said, that he appealed to the people of England. When the noble lord made that appeal with so much confidence, the people of England might perchance reply by asking a question of the noble lord. They might ask, whether it were fitting that the population was to be the test of disfranchisement, when the government took the population, not as it existed at present, but as it was stated to be ten years ago? The noble lord might answer his learned friend or not, as he pleased. It undoubtedly was in his power to refuse to do so, but declining to answer would be well understood. It was his (Sir Robert Peel's) decided impression that the ministers were unable to answer; that they did not possess the power to give an answer. He hoped, however, that the learned gentleman would consider well before he moved for the information he required. If the test of population were adopted, it would undoubtedly be necessary that the returns should be correct; but he thought it expedient to avoid taking any steps at present which would seem to recognise the fact, that population was to be the test. If he thought that, by voting for the more accurate information required by his hon. friend, he should, at the same time, be admitting population to be the test of disfranchisement, undoubtedly he would vote against his hon. and learned friend's motion. If, however, a majority of that House came to the determination that population was to be the test, it would then be a question for their most serious consideration, whether they were to take as their test the old returns of 1821, or those which they were to be in possession of in the course of the next fortnight. Could the House possibly forget what they had heard that night on the subject of the returns? Could they forget, that the hon. member for Preston (Mr. John Wood) had told them, the returns of 1831 were not to be depended on, because he knew that tricks had been practised to increase the numbers in particular places; and that in one borough, with which he was acquainted, 300 persons had slept the night before the return was made, in order to bring it within the rule? So, by this argument, if from any accident the population of a borough was increased; if the stage-coach happened to break down, and six persons more than ordinary slept in the borough of Malton, that was to save it from disfranchisement; or if a great fight happened to take place in the vicinity of a particular town on the day of the return, that was to determine the point of disfranchisement. And yet, in the midst of all these difficulties and absurdities, they were called on to take the population returns as a method of determining the right to exercise the elective franchise. Nothing, he apprehended, could well be more absurd. It reminded him of an academical absurdity which was probably familiar to the House. It was this—"given the height of the mast and the name of the vessel, to determine the length of the voyage." This no doubt appeared very absurd, but the principle, if principle it could be called, on which this bill went, by which the House was required to solve the problem—"given the number of women and children in a certain place, to determine the independence of the electors," was equally absurd. He would ask the government to answer him this question—If your object be to put an end to the nomination boroughs—and you have declared that to be your principal object—why is it, that you permit these nomination boroughs to retain one of their members, because they have a fraction above 2,000 inhabitants? If you wish to destroy all nominations and corrupt influence, as you say, why do you not take away their members altogether, instead of permitting them to retain one? But then it would probably be said, that they were about to call in a new constituency. Why, it might happen, and in many places he believed would happen, that a greater number of respectable £10 householders were to be found in boroughs which did not come within the line of 2,000 inhabitants, than in boroughs which possessed more than the required 4,000. This showed the fallacious nature of the principle on which they were required to proceed. The noble lord had, indeed, found something of that kind himself. In the case of Downton and St. Germain's, the noble lord had been compelled to acknowledge, that there were not a sufficient number of £10 householders to form a respectable constituency. Could there be a stronger evidence in favour of the principle for which he and his hon. and learned friend contended—that population was not to be taken as a test of competition for the elective franchise, or of inefficiency in the exercise of the right which it confers? For these reasons he objected to population as a test at all of the necessity of disfranchisement; but if the House should ultimately be of opinion that population ought to be the test, then for the same reasons he was prepared to contend, that they should take the latest, and it was presumed to be most accurate, return, that of 1831. Under any circumstances he made bold to assert, in contradiction to the noble lord, that the discussion was not irrelevant to the question before the House.

In the committee, later in the evening,—

Sir Robert Peel, rising after Dr. Lushington, who had followed Sir Edward Sugden, said, that if he were inclined to renew the discussion on the principle of the bill, the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman who sat down on the ministerial bench afforded him an opportunity. But he would adhere to the rule which he had laid down, and not revive the discussion of the principle while the bill was in committee. He trusted, that both sides of the House would come to the consideration of the measure, determined to lay aside all angry feelings, and he hoped his hon. and learned friend (Sir E. Sugden) would set the first example of forbearance, and abstain from any personal recrimination. His character stood too high to be hurt by any insinuations which could be thrown out against it, and he need not repeat to the House that explanation which proved most satisfactory to the last parliament, relative to his conduct with respect to the borough of Weymouth. The House, he understood, was to consider the boroughs enumerated in schedule A, as being part of the first clause, and he rose to offer a suggestion which would facilitate the discussion upon the bill, if it met with the concurrence of the House. Fifty-seven boroughs were included in the schedule, upon each of which it was competent for any gentleman to raise a discussion, involving the consideration of the whole bill. Now, he thought the best course would be, to take the sense of the House on this question, whether all boroughs containing fewer than 2,000 inhabitants should be disfranchised, and when the will of the House was clearly manifested by a decided majority, he, for one, should not be disposed to repeat the division in the case of each particular borough, upon the understanding that, with respect to every borough where a prima facie case could be established, that it did not fall below the line drawn by ministers, an opportunity for full discussion should be afforded. He, however, still reserved to himself the right to speak upon the principle of the bill, when the report was brought up, or upon the third reading of the bill. He trusted, that all sides would enter into the committee with good humour, and abstain from throwing out imputations of any sort. Let them remember, that they were now forming a new constitution, and if it were to be adopted, no time was to be lost in making it as perfect as possible.

Rising after Mr. Hudson Gurney, who had followed Mr. Baring,—

Sir Robert Peel, in explanation, said, that he was as much opposed to the general disfranchisement included in the bill as his hon. friend; but as on the principle of that disfranchisement the House had overruled him, he thought that it would be a waste of time to enter into discussions on those boroughs which fell within the rule which the House had determined on. Reserving the right of pressing for the rejection of the whole clause on bringing up the report, or on the third reading of the bill, he repeated, that he did not consider it would be necessary to have a separate division upon every borough. He should be content, that one decision should affect all boroughs in schedule A which had a population confessedly under 2,000. For instance, he would take the case of Blechingley, and if a vote of the House disfranchised Blechingley, he should be satisfied to consider that as extending to all boroughs similarly situated. But for all other boroughs—that was to say, for all which could make out a prima facie case, that their respective populations were above 2,000—there should be separate consideration. To bring this question to issue, he would suggest that the word “each,” be left out of the clause.

Sir Robert Peel again, in reply to Mr. John Campbell, said, it might be very well for the hon. and learned member for Stafford, as a friend to the bill, to make the suggestion that the word “none” should stand instead of the word “each,” but the opponents of the measure must follow the course that seemed best to them. The bill said, that each borough inserted in schedule A should be disfranchised. Now the proposition before the committee was, with the view to prevent this disfranchisement, to leave out the word “each,” which, no doubt in this case meant “all;” and it was on the withdrawal of that word he wished to take the sense of the House. The word he proposed to leave out would make nonsense of the whole clause. He begged leave now to propose, pro forma, that instead of the words in the first clause, “That each of the boroughs enumerated in schedule A, &c., shall cease, &c.,” that the clause stand, “That of the boroughs, &c.”

Sir Robert Peel afterwards said, he did not intend to consult hon. gentlemen opposite as to the course he thought proper to pursue. They wished not only to draw up the bill, but also to propose the amendments that the opponents of the measure were to make. He had suggested that the word “each” should be left out to save time, and with a view, undoubtedly, of defeating the bill. Nothing was more common, than to pursue such a course, and propose that all the words after the first should be left out.

JULY 15, 1831.

In a Committee on the fourth night, on an amendment moved by Sir Andrew Agnew,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the advantage which had been taken of the declaration which he made the other night, as to the course of proceeding he should adopt with respect to this bill, was enough to discourage him from making any similar declaration again. What he had proposed to do was, to take the opinion of the House on the principle of disfranchisement in general, instead of troubling the House with a division on the case of each particular borough. The hon. baronet's (Sir A. Agnew's) amendment had been given notice of two or three days before. It was not made in any concert with him, for the hon. baronet did, in fact, vote against the amendment which he moved last night. But time ought to be given to discuss whether the disfranchisement should be total or partial? He should pass over the taunts of the hon. member for Colchester. He thought he could afford to do so. He was quite sure, that they would never come to the details of this bill if they were constantly diverted by considerations of a personal nature. The hon. member for Colchester said, that the omission of the word "each," had been proposed in order to make nonsense of the clause. That he admitted; it would generally be the effect of moving the omission of certain words from any clause; but it would have been perfectly competent for any gentleman to have made sense of the clause, by moving that six or seven of the boroughs in schedule A be retained. He was not a strenuous supporter of the hon. baronet's amendment; but when this alternative was offered him, he should follow the course pursued by all statesmen, and of the two evils adopt the least. There was another line of conduct which he might adopt—that of leaving the House altogether; but that was not a course consistent with his duty as a member of parliament; and he should therefore remain in his place, and try to amend the bill as much as possible. The noble lord had told the House, that at the time of the union of Ireland with England, the close-boroughs were disfranchised; but the noble lord had forgotten to mention this important fact—that pecuniary compensation accompanied the disfranchisement. He admitted, however, that there were at present great difficulties in the way of pecuniary compensation, arising from the state of public feeling on the subject.

The amendment was negatived by 316 against 205.

On the question that the words "Aldeburgh, Suffolk," stand part of the clause, relating to schedule A,—

Sir Robert Peel said, it was not his intention unnecessarily to detain the committee, by pressing a division in the case of Aldeburgh, for other cases would arise, when the same question could as well, or perhaps more conveniently be determined by taking the sense of the committee. But he felt it necessary to state, that, as he altogether questioned the propriety of making population alone the test of qualification, he should for his own satisfaction, as well as from a sense of public duty, take the sense of the House on the propriety of including within the schedule A the very first of those boroughs which clearly came within the line of disqualification drawn by the noble lord as to the number of 2,000 inhabitants.

Rising after Mr. O'Connell,—Sir Robert Peel said, that if the hon. and learned gentleman's principles were acted upon, the House would be at sea, and it would be absolutely necessary to remodel the bill. Said the hon. and learned gentleman, "I do not care about the population—whether it be more or less—but I condemn the boroughs solely because they are nomination or corrupt boroughs." Said the noble lord, "I have no means of knowing the degree of influence which is used, and therefore I presume it from the amount of population." The hon. and learned gentleman seemed to think this perfectly absurd; and in that he perfectly agreed with him. He wanted to know, not the number of inhabitants, but the degree of influence used.

The question that the words "Aldeburgh, Suffolk" should stand part of the clause, was agreed to without a division; the chairman of the committee was instructed to report progress, and the House resumed.

PRINCE LEOPOLD'S ANNUITY.

JULY 18, 1831.

Lord Althorp, after some prefatory remarks relating to Prince Leopold's resignation of his annuity, on the accession of His Royal Highness to the throne of Belgium, read the following letter from His Royal Highness to Earl Grey, received that morning:—

“MARLBOROUGH HOUSE, July 15.

“My Dear Lord Grey;—Before I quit the country, I am desirous to state, in writing, the intentions and views which I had the pleasure of communicating to you verbally this morning on the subject of my British annuity.

“As Sovereign of Belgium, it is not my intention to draw from this country any portion of the income which was settled upon me by Act of Parliament at the period of my marriage. Your lordship is, however, well aware, that up to the very moment of my leaving England, I have maintained my establishments here upon their accustomed footing, and that, consequently, there remain to be fulfilled and discharged pecuniary engagements, and outstanding debts, to an amount which it is quite impossible for me to state at the present time with precision. As soon, therefore, as I shall have accomplished the payment of these demands, it is my intention to make over, into the hands of trustees, whom I will without loss of time appoint, the whole of the annuity which I receive from this country, in trust for the following purposes:—

“I shall require my trustees to maintain, in a state of complete habitation and of repair, the house, gardens, and park, at Claremont; and farther, to pay all the salaries, pensions, and allowances, which I shall deem a proper reward to those persons who have claims upon me, for their faithful services during my residence in this country. I shall, in addition, require them to continue all those charities, and annual donations to charitable institutions, which have been allowed or subscribed to, either by the Princess Charlotte or by myself, up to the present period.

“All these objects having been fulfilled, it is my wish and desire that the remainder shall be repaid into the British exchequer.—I remain, my dear Lord Grey, most faithfully yours,

(Signed) “LEOPOLD.”

Mr. George Robinson having expressed his satisfaction at this spontaneous concession, on the part of His Royal Highness, which had superseded the necessity for a question which he had intended to ask on the subject,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said he conceived, that there could be but one feeling in that House as to the extreme liberality of Prince Leopold, in thus foregoing his pension, to which he had as clear and undoubted a right as any one member of that House had to his own estate. He was, therefore, glad that the hon. member for Worcester had had no opportunity of asking any questions on the subject. As to His Royal Highness's compulsory resignation of his allowance, or any part of it, that was a thing that could not have been thought of; and the wise conduct which had just been announced to the House, could only be considered an act of voluntary and unqualified liberality on the part of Prince Leopold. To him it seemed a very wise act, and well calculated to recommend him to the affections of those who were about to place him on the throne of their country.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

JULY 20, 1831.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the day, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England.

On the question that Bletchingley stand part of schedule A,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Lord Althorp, said, that the noble lord, in the speech he had just made, had opened the discussion anew into the whole principles of the bill. He must enter his protest against the doctrines which had been laid down by the noble lord. The noble lord said, that when they looked at the measure as a whole, they would see that its object was, to give to the people a full and fair representation in parliament, and that as such, it might be justly described as a restoration of the ancient principles of the constitution; for that those principles were, that the people should be fully and fairly represented in the Commons House of Parliament. Now that involved the fallacy, that the people of this country ever had the right which it was proposed to give them by this bill. He would deny that the phrase, "the people of England," ever meant the people of England as they were polled by this bill. What was meant by the people of England, when we spoke of the representation of the people of England in ancient times, consisted in the great corporate bodies, and those great classes of the community to whom the franchise was intrusted, and of whom the members sent to parliament were the representatives. But the word "people" was never used then as it was in the present bill—it was never used so as to mean £10 householders, who had never hitherto possessed a right to that franchise, which it was now proposed to give them. The elective franchise, as it had been established in England in former times, had never existed in the form in which the present bill proposed to establish it, but in a much better, more practical, and more beneficial form. He was far from denying, that a sentiment of dissatisfaction had been expressed throughout the country with regard to what were called nomination boroughs; but that dissatisfaction, and that clamour, with respect to those boroughs, he felt justified in attributing entirely to the manner in which this measure had been brought forward by the government, under the sanction of his Majesty. The ministers themselves had excited that clamour, which they pleaded as one of the grounds for disfranchising those boroughs. So far as burgage tenure boroughs were concerned, they certainly could not be described as any usurpation on the rights of the people. It was said, that the possession of such boroughs could not be advantageous to the aristocracy, and, indeed, the lord advocate of Scotland had argued, upon a former night, that as the right of returning members from such boroughs was vested in individuals, it was not probable that it could be exercised for the benefit of the general body, and that, in fact, the possession of such boroughs was disadvantageous to the interests of the aristocracy at large. But though the power might be vested in the hands of a single individual, was it to be supposed that it ever would be used by him for the promotion of his individual and personal interests, and not for the promotion and support of the interests of the general body to which he belonged? If, for instance, they should give members to Birmingham, was it probable that those members would attend only to the interests of Birmingham, and not to the interests of the iron manufacturers at large? Now those nomination boroughs served the same purpose exactly with respect to the property and interests of the aristocracy.

In reply to the Attorney-general, Sir Robert observed, that the observation of the hon. and learned gentleman as to those who were reformers since March last, could not possibly apply to him (Sir R. Peel), for he had never during his life been a reformer, and certainly not a reformer since March last. He had quitted office on the question of reform, he was opposed to the present measure, and he should continue to give it his opposition.

DELAY OF THE REFORM BILL.

JULY 21, 1831.

Lord Althorp moved, "That the Order of the day for the committee on the reform of parliament (England) bill, do take precedence of public petitions, notices of motions, and other orders, on each day for which it may be appointed."

In the conversation which ensued,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL was satisfied, if the noble lord would only trust to his own plain and unbiassed judgment, that he would find more facilities for carrying forward the measure, than by attending to the recommendations of the newspapers, and considering their suggestions. Let the noble lord act on his own judgment, and disregard their advice—treating with indifference and contempt, as he (Sir Robert Peel) did, the shameful menaces by which it was attempted to deter members of that House from performing their duty. The noble lord had trusted the House, and what had been the consequence? A disposition had been excited to throw no obstacles in his way, which had gone so far, that even petitions had not been presented, notices of motion had been waived, and no desire shown to delay the proceedings of the House. If they were told, however, that they were to surrender their judgment, and not examine into the details of a measure that was to give a new constitution to the country, to that he could not agree, and of such a proceeding he entirely disapproved. That was not treating the important subject as it deserved; but any party who should propose measures for the purposes of delay would find them recoil on the proposers. At the same time, the subject should be fully and fairly considered. There were already several notices given of motions for amendments of parts of the bill; there were at least sixteen such notices; two had been given by the noble lord (Milton). Of these sixteen notices, no less than ten had been given by gentlemen who voted for the second reading of the bill, but who thought it right that the subject should be brought under the consideration of the House in the same aspect as it appeared to them. If, out of those sixteen, ten were given by gentlemen who were friendly to the principle of the bill, was it fair—was it just—to impute to those who were not friendly to the bill, who brought forward amendments, a motive to delay it? It was said that the bill would be defeated by delay. What was the meaning of that? Had the ministers not a majority to support the bill? If it was meant, that by discussion the appetite for reform would be abated, that would be due to the fair influence of reason, and nothing else. If the public should become as weary of the discussion as the House was—if they should look for some other topic of interest, some other cause of excitement—if that were to be the consequence of delay, it showed there was ground to doubt if the clamour for reform was produced by the evils of the system, and showed that those who dreaded delay had a conviction that it was a mere temporary excitement, which would die away before the voice of reason. He would do his best, however, to facilitate the object of the noble lord, if the noble lord was disposed not to press his motion, to dispense with the order, and trust to an amicable understanding. Such an understanding had taken place last session; and under it they had begun private business at three o'clock, and the public business at five; that had continued through the session without any inconvenience, and, therefore, he thought an amicable understanding would be better than an order of the House, establishing a most dangerous precedent, such as that proposed by the noble lord. Besides, an order could not be efficacious, as the members might insist on their right to bring forward any subject, or to present petitions, when the motion was made for going into the question of reform. He was sure, that if the order were withdrawn, and an understanding agreed to, that would be adhered to. On all these grounds he must press the noble lord to withdraw his motion, and be content with an understanding that the business of reform should have precedence of all other business.

Lord Althorp consented to withdraw his motion, on the understanding that the Reform Bill should go into a committee, every night on which it was to be discussed, at five o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

JULY 21, 1831.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee on the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England was read, and the House resolved itself into a committee.

In a discussion on Mr. Croker's amendment, that the borough of Downton be excluded from schedule A,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. Stanley, said, that the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down, put the question upon the fairest possible grounds. It was strictly a judicial question; and nothing could be more satisfactory than to see his Majesty's ministers equally divided upon a question of that nature.

Mr. Stanley denied that there was any division amongst his right hon. friends. All he said was, that if the borough were taken out of that schedule, it would still not be violating the principle of the bill, as Downton stood upon special and peculiar grounds.

Sir Robert Peel resumed, observing that the parties concerned resigning their interests in the borough was a matter of no importance; for the bill went to sweep away all such interests. After noticing the number of places in Wiltshire which the bill would disfranchise, he went on to observe, that the wider the space over which any collection of electoral houses were spread, the more perfect and complete would be the independence of the place, and thus would the objects of the bill be more effectually fulfilled. Not, of course, that he desired to contribute to that object for itself—nothing could be further from his wish—but he only urged that consideration as calculated to procure for his view of the question the votes of those who supported the principle of the bill. He confessed he saw no reason upon earth why the inhabitants of Salisbury Plain, not having votes for the county, should not have votes for some town, provided they occupied houses of sufficient value. It was one of the cases in which he thought the principle of the bill could be most safely and advantageously applied. All the members for Wiltshire would surely support the amendment of his right hon. friend—all likewise would support it who feared the growing influence of the towns, and desired to preserve the agricultural interest from being unduly depressed.

In the discussion on the question, whether the borough of Newton should or should not stand part of schedule A,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. C. A. Pelham, said, he agreed with the hon. member as to the expediency of hon. members confining themselves more than they had done to the immediate subject before the committee, and not, like the hon. alderman opposite, indulge in a meandering discourse, half prose, half poetry, touching the politics of the last fifty or sixty years, including the American and French revolutions, the Continental wars, the state of Ireland, and the National debt. He, as well as the noble lord, had the honour of being a constituent of the hon. alderman, and must say, that such an oration would hardly be tolerated at their Common Hall. The hon. alderman was in error, in supposing that they, on the opposition side of the House, felt disposed to taunt those hon. members who had voted with them in their large minority of last night, though friendly to the principle of the bill. By no means: he admired them for their high-minded conduct, and trusted, that in several other matters of detail, the opposition would have the benefit of their votes. It was not to be supposed, that because hon. members had expressed their determination to support the principle of the bill, that, therefore, they were tied down to its every detail, without the power of adopting or proposing such verbal amendments as might be necessary. If such were the case, there would be an end to their character as a deliberative body. He could not, as a liveryman of the city of London, help regretting that his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Alderman Thompson), had not, in his late intercourse with a small party of his constituents, instead of entering into the unnecessary explanation he had made, in his usual manly manner addressed the livery thus:—"Gentlemen, I have voted for the second reading of the bill, and am still determined to support its principle; but I do not feel that I am, therefore, fettered so as not to exercise my own discretion with respect to its details." Had the hon. alderman addressed the livery thus, he was confident that, at the next election, the livery would raise him to the head of the poll.

JULY 26, 1831.

In the discussion on the motion that the borough of St. Germain's stand part of schedule A,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL, rising after Mr. Lambert, said, he supposed that the hon. member for Rye would report the hon. member who had just sat down, to those members of the Political Union of Manchester, who were becoming exasperated at the delay which the Reform Bill had experienced, and who had determined to denounce such members of that House, who, when the details of the bill came under consideration, chose to touch on perfectly irrelevant topics. The hon. member (Mr. Lambert) had called upon the different reformers in that House to come forward and defend their opinions, and had laid the foundation of almost interminable debates; and whenever delay and factious opposition should be again charged against the gentlemen on the opposition side of the House, he would always refer to the example of the hon. member, who had given provocation to debate, which required the utmost forbearance to resist. It would, therefore, be but fair for the vengeance of the members of the Political Union to fall solely and singly on the head of the hon. member himself. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Stanley) said, that the disfranchisement of the borough of St. Germain's might be a departure from the letter of the bill, but it was an adherence to its principle. Then he (Sir R. Peel) was at a loss to know what the principle was; and he thought that the right hon. gentleman was bound to show, that this borough would continue to be a nomination borough, when a new constituency of £10 voters was thrown in. He doubted the policy of disfranchisement of the kind proposed. By it, that portion of the agricultural population, not being freeholders or copyholders, but inhabitants of £10 houses, would be deprived of the right of voting: while, on the other hand, if the franchise of boroughs were extended into the surrounding districts, that particular class of persons would be admitted into the franchise, and form a more independent set of voters than the householders in towns, because, being more scattered, they would be less likely to be acted upon by political clubs and unions. But the right hon. gentleman had stated, that the object of the bill was, to prevent small towns being swamped by country constituencies; though he had previously understood, that the object of the bill was to destroy the unity and individuality of every borough, and admit a new class of voters from agricultural parishes. In fact, how had ministers acted with respect to the borough of Christchurch? The area of Christchurch was twenty-seven square miles, or upwards of 17,000 statute acres. The total number of £10 houses in the borough of Christchurch was eight; and therefore the surrounding district was to be included, in order to make up the requisite number of 300. Then how could the right hon. gentleman contend that the spirit of the bill was not to swamp small towns in country districts? He, therefore, was of opinion, that the spirit of the bill would not be violated by allowing St. Germain's to retain the elective franchise.

Mr. Lambert stated, in reference to what had fallen from the right hon. baronet, respecting the Political Union of Manchester, that the indignation of any individual or society was perfectly indifferent to him.

Sir Robert Peel applauded the sentiments of the hon. member, but informed him, that at an early period of the evening, during the progress of the bill, they were threatened with the enmity of the members of the Political Union, if any delay with respect to the Reform Bill took place; and he certainly thought, that the hon. member ought to be the first person against whom their enmity should be directed.

St. Germain's was ordered to be inserted in schedule A.

THE FRENCH KING'S SPEECH—RAZING OF FORTRESSES.

JULY 27, 1831.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said he had wished to take that opportunity to put a question to his noble friend, relative to the convention to raze and demolish certain of the fortresses which had been established for the protection of the Netherlands since 1814; but that was now unnecessary, his noble friend having thought proper to communicate the Protocol to the House. Another question, however, that he wished to ask, was this: The convention which determined that certain fortresses should be razed, had been settled by the four powers, England, Russia, Austria, and Prussia: and to this convention for razing the fortresses France was not a party. If he understood the matter correctly, however, the whole of the fortresses were not to be demolished, and it was not yet determined which of them should be, that being left to a future decision. The question, then, he wished to ask was, by whom was it to be decided which of these fortresses should be demolished? Was it to be decided by the same parties who had signed the convention? and, as France had not been a party to that convention, was she to have no concern in deciding which of the fortresses should be demolished? He did not wish to provoke a premature discussion on this important subject. Of late, indeed, foreign politics had not occupied much of the attention of the House—not that he was contented, not that he did not foresee much cause for future apprehension in the present state of foreign affairs; but the attention of the House had been absorbed by other things, and he had been extremely unwilling, seeing the situation of his noble friend, to call for any explanation, or provoke a premature discussion that might diminish the chances of maintaining peace. He should still have preserved silence, had it not been for the speech from the throne lately made in another country. That speech referred to two countries with which the interest and prosperity of this kingdom were closely connected—Portugal and Holland—which made it necessary to ask for some explanations. He said, he did not wish to provoke premature discussion, but only to obtain such explanations as would enable the House of Commons to understand in what manner the interest of England might be affected by these events. The part of the French king's speech which referred to one of these subjects, was this—"The fortresses erected to threaten France, and not to protect Belgium, will be demolished." It was said there, that these fortresses were erected to facilitate aggression on France. The speech supposed what he was bound to say was not correct. Those fortresses were not raised to threaten France; they were raised to defend Belgium, and the neighbouring countries, against France. He must object, therefore, to the language which had been used, and must, at the same time, remark, that the manner in which the destruction of these fortresses had been announced by France, was a departure from the ordinary courtesies in practice among nations; and the more so, as it appeared they were not to be dismantled immediately, but were, on the contrary, to be made the subject of ulterior negotiations, to which it would appear that France was not to be a party. He would not, however, enlarge on this point, because he was anxious to avoid provoking discussions which might prove inconvenient to the government: and he would, therefore, at once pass to that other portion of the French king's speech, on which he begged to put a question to the noble secretary for foreign affairs. In that speech he found the following words:—"To obtain reparation, demanded in vain, our ships of war have appeared before the Tagus. I have just received the news that they have forced the entrance. The satisfaction hitherto refused, has been offered to us. The Portuguese men-of-war are in our power, and the tri-colored flag flies under the walls of Lisbon." By that passage, the French king announced to his subjects, that the fleet of Portugal, the most ancient and the most faithful of the allies of England, had fallen into the power of its enemies, and that the tri-colored flag floated victorious in her capital. That passage announced that there was war between France and Portugal. It announced that the victorious fleet of France had forced the defences of the Tagus, and that the capital of Portugal was at the mercy of the conqueror. Under any other circumstances, it might not, perhaps, be necessary to require any explanation of the events which preceded this state of affairs in Portugal; but it was impossible to put altogether out of sight those treaties which bound this country to the defence and protection of her most ancient ally, and the peculiar nature of the obligations which those treaties imposed on this country, to defend Portugal against all unjust attacks. He did not mean to go the absurd length of contending that England was bound by those treaties to defend Portugal, either by the employment of a military force, or even by remonstrances, when she decidedly persisted in wrong-doing; but he thought it must be admitted by all who had read the treaties, that they were bound to assist Portugal in repelling unjust aggression. It was, therefore, very material to that House to know what were the real facts of the case. The question, therefore, which he wished to put to his noble friend was, whether there existed, on the part of France, such just and urgent ground of offence as had entitled her to force the passage of the Tagus, or whether the casus fœderis had arrived—whether the cause of complaint was such that the aggression of France could not be avoided, and that had or had not arisen, which imposed upon us the obligation of succouring our ally?—He hoped he had said nothing which could promote premature discussion; it had been his anxious wish to avoid it. He should therefore confine himself to the two questions—which, to avoid misapprehension, he would now repeat. The first was, whether in the negotiations which were, as it was now understood, to precede the demolition of a portion of the fortresses, France was to be called in by the four great powers as a party to such negotiations? The next was, whether the noble lord was disposed to make the House acquainted, through the means of any documents or correspondence which had passed on the subject, with the peculiar state of circumstances which had led to the attack of the French on Portugal, and brought about the events which enabled the French king to announce, that the tri-colored flag floated in the Tagus?

After an explanation from Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel said he was glad to hear what his noble friend had stated with regard to those barriers, which had been most erroneously called fortresses intended to menace France, and not to protect Belgium. He again declared, that he was anxious not to excite any unnecessary discussion; but as that might be the last time any such opportunity would be afforded him, he could not allow it to pass without expressing a hope that the king of Holland would not be excluded from those future negotiations to which the noble lord had referred. It should not be forgotten, that although the fortresses were supported for the defence and protection of Belgium, they were intended still more for the defence and protection of Holland—a country in the safety and independence of which England had the deepest interest, the integrity of which country must be always, with England, an object of the most anxious solicitude. He begged, indeed, to call the attention of the noble lord to the peculiar claim which Holland possessed to be consulted with respect to the disposal of the fortresses. The noble lord must recollect the convention between this country and the prince sovereign of the Netherlands, signed in August 1814, by which it was agreed, that two millions of money, received as indemnity for claims on France, should be applied to the repair of these fortresses, for the defence of Holland, and for the exclusive support of British interests. The noble lord must recollect, too, the terms on which this large sum was thus disposed of. He must remember, that in consideration of the sum applied to the erection of the fortresses, Holland consented to cede to England, in perpetuity, the colonies of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo. Now if Holland, in the course of the negotiations, was to be held as in no way interested in the fate of these fortresses, he would beg to ask, what recompense had she received for surrendering these colonies, which England held as a consideration and a satisfaction for the money she consented to advance, in order that these fortresses might be placed in a proper state of defence?

The papers were ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

JULY 27, 1831.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England,—

The subject for discussion was the second clause of the bill, which was read as follows:—"And be it enacted, that the boroughs enumerated in Schedule B, to this Act annexed, shall, after the end of this present parliament, return one member, and no more, to serve in parliament for each of the said boroughs."

On the question being put,

SIR ROBERT PEEL rose, and spoke to the following effect:—Before we proceed to the consideration of the cases of individual boroughs included in schedule B, I intend to discuss a preliminary question of very high importance, and one that concerns the interests of the whole class of boroughs. The decision upon the general question thus raised, will be a conclusive one, and, once taken, will determine the point for each particular case, and render detailed discussion upon that point unnecessary. I propose, that each of the forty boroughs included in schedule B, instead of returning only one member, as contemplated by the bill, shall retain its present privilege of returning two; and I shall move as an amendment on the motion of the noble lord, that the word "two" be substituted for "one." If, therefore, the House affirm my proposition, each of the boroughs will return two members, and will thus escape partial disfranchisement; and if, on the contrary, the committee shall decide that the word "one" stand part of the clause, I shall abstain from raising the question in the case of each individual borough in schedule B. I think that the course that I now propose will save the time of the House; and I entreat the most serious and impartial attention of all parties, while I state the important considerations that induce me to propose the adoption of the course that I now recommend. I am not about to recommend a discussion of the general principle of the bill; but I shall confine myself to a statement of facts, which are as well deserving the attention of those who are friendly to the bill, as of those who take the same view of it that I do. I would appeal to his Majesty's government themselves, entertaining a confident hope, that if I shall be able to adduce valid reasons for continuing to the boroughs enumerated in schedule B, the right of returning two members, my reasons will be permitted to prevail, and will induce the ministers again to pursue the honourable course which they took last night in the case of the borough of Saltash, and revoke a decision which subsequent consideration proved to be erroneous. In the first place, I contend, that the adoption of my proposal is not inconsistent with the principles of the Reform Bill. There is not a word in the preamble of the bill which points to the disfranchisement of the boroughs enumerated in schedule B. The preamble recites that—"It is expedient to take effectual measures for correcting divers abuses that have long prevailed in the choice of members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament; to deprive many inconsiderable places of the right of returning members; to grant such privilege to large, populous, and wealthy towns; to increase the number of knights of the shire; to extend the elective franchise to many of his Majesty's subjects who have not heretofore enjoyed the same, and to diminish the expense of elections." Now, I cannot deny, that this recital, if admitted to be correct, applies to schedule A, and binds us to the complete disfranchisement of those boroughs; but it has no reference to the partial disfranchisement of the boroughs in schedule B. The preamble of the bill, therefore, leaves those who entirely assent to it at liberty to vote with me. The most determined enemy to nomination boroughs may also vote with me. There may be boroughs of that description in schedule B, if reference be had to their present constituency; but other provisions of the bill will destroy that constituency, and will substitute for it a new and more extended one. I have a perfect right to assume, that after this bill shall have passed, nomination will be effectually excluded in the case of every borough named in schedule B. If it will not, why does the government reserve for these boroughs, or any of them, even the half of their existing privilege? The question is one, not of degree, but principle. The bill assumes nomination to be vicious and unconstitutional; but if it be so, it is so in the case where one member is to be returned, as well as in the case where there are two. If you suspect the existence of nomination in schedule B, your remedy clearly is, not partial disfranchisement, but complete extinction of the privilege through which it is to be effected. I repeat, therefore, that the most decided enemy to nomination is at liberty to vote with me. Having removed out of my way these preliminary difficulties, and shown this to be a question fairly open to the consideration of all parties, whether friends or enemies to the bill, I will now consider the intrinsic merit of the proposal. First, I contend, that it is recommended by long prescription and almost uniform usage, so far as England is concerned—and let it be remembered that we are now discussing the English representative system, and no other—that the usages of England in respect to representation are, therefore, mainly to be relied upon. Now, in every instance in England, in which the elective franchise is exercised, with few exceptions only, in which there is a single member, two members are returned. There are also the cases of the city of London and of the county of York, wherein there are, severally, four. 489 members sit for England, and five only, out of the whole number, sit for boroughs having a single return. A different practice prevails, it is true, in Wales, in Scotland, and in certain cases in Ireland. In the two latter cases, it was adopted at the respective periods of their union with England; but we are to consult, for present purposes, English precedent and English usage, and not to look at the necessities which might be imposed by events so peculiar as the unions of different parts of the empire. If usage and prescription are to decide the question, the decision must be in favour of my proposal, and I contend, that the appeal to reason and good sense is equally decisive in its favour; and that, apart from all considerations of usage, that plan of representation which gives two members to certain places, in preference to one, ought to be adopted. If we were merely arguing a priori—if we were devising, for the first time, an electoral system for a new country—and if we should assume 500 as the proper limit to the number of representatives, it would be easy, in my opinion, to prove, that it would be better to give the right of sending two members to 250 towns or districts, rather than a single member to each of 500. By doing so, you would ensure a more perfect representation of the feelings and sentiments of the whole people; you would diminish the chances of the undue preponderance of one class of interests or opinions; and you would be more likely to effect that object which ought never to be overlooked, namely, the ensuring at all times to the minority, its fair share of weight and influence in the public councils. But I would rather confine myself to the circumstances of England, and to the state of society as it exists in this country. I appeal to those who have practical experience on this subject, and who are conversant with the feelings and habits connected with elections in England. Surely they must know, that there is an immense advantage, when contending parties are nearly balanced, in having the means of effecting an amicable compromise, and of warding off the necessity of absolute triumph and unqualified defeat. What is it that gives keenness to election contests? Not merely general politics, but local and hereditary attachments, the preference of this family to that, the influence of property newly acquired contending against that of ancient family and long-established connexion. Beware how you relinquish the only means of amicably adjusting the balance between such rival pretensions. Think of the animosity which you will engender, the more bitter as the circle is narrow within which it is confined, if there be no alternative but complete, unmitigated victory on one side or the other. How certain will be the provocation to contest on every returning vacancy, and how lasting the mortification which will follow defeat. I argue from what I know, and from circumstances of which I have had experience. I represent a borough—no nomination borough—but a borough containing near 4,000 inhabitants, in which every inhabitant householder, not in the poor-rate, has a vote, and is proud of his franchise. It returns two members, one friendly to the bill, the other hostile to it—one supporting the government, the other opposing it—one returned through the influence of an ancient name, and of all the associations which are connected with old connexions and hereditary attachments; the other through the influence of neighbourhood, residence, property, and friendly and constant intercourse. How many instances there must be where similar divisions of opinion and interests prevail; many, perhaps, in which they are very nearly balanced; and could it, in such cases, be for the public advantage, or could it promote local peace, to leave no alternative, at all times and under all circumstances, but the complete exclusion of one party and complete triumph of the other? Even on this single ground, I must contend, that my amendment would be entitled to support. But this is a narrow ground, indeed, compared with that on which I am now about to urge its adoption. I am now to consider in what manner public interests, and those of the highest concern, will be affected by its rejection. By the vote of last night, which inflicted total disfranchisement on all the boroughs in schedule A, we have made an enormous change in the representative system—a much greater change than was expected by any reformer, not a member of the king's government. By that vote, fifty-six boroughs, entitled for centuries to the elective franchise, have been destroyed; and 111 members, being far more than one-fifth of the whole English representation, will shortly cease to exist. I cannot believe that the sober judgment of the House will affirm the decisions of the committee—that no appeal will be permitted in such cases as those of Appleby, of Downton, and Plympton: but if that shall be the case—if our proceedings are irrevocable—let us, while we have yet time to repair, at least in some degree, the evil of these proceedings, maturely consider the effect of them, and their bearing, not upon this borough or that, but upon those vast interests of society which are affected by them. In this country there are two great interests, the agricultural on the one hand, and the commercial and manufacturing on the other, having the closest ultimate connexion between their mutual prosperity, but occasionally taking very different views of the best mode of promoting their individual, and ultimately their common welfare. Let us consider how these interests are likely to be affected by those enactments of this bill which are already decided on, by those we are at present considering, and by those we shall have hereafter to consider. I hold in my hand a map of England, which has been prepared (I know not whether by a friend or an enemy of the Reform Bill), with the view of presenting, at one view, those places that are to be totally, and those which are to be partially disfranchised; and those also which are to acquire the right of hereafter returning members to parliament. Now, I propose to divide England into two great divisions, and to draw the line of demarcation in that manner, which will most fairly and effectually separate the purely agricultural counties of England from those which are either chiefly manufacturing, or partly manufacturing and partly agricultural. The line must be, in some degree, arbitrarily drawn, and, on each side of it, there must be partial exceptions; as in the case of counties which do not fall exactly within the description which I wish to assign to them; but I know no line which will better effect the object I have in view, than the one which I propose to draw. It extends across England from that indenture in the coast which is made by the mouth of the Severn, to that indenture in the opposite coast which is made by the inlet of the sea called the Wash. In short, the line may be considered to be drawn from Gloucester, in the west, to Boston, on the east coast of England. To the north of this line the great coal-field of England is situate, and the manufactures depending upon coal are chiefly carried on. The division to the south of the line includes those counties of England which are almost entirely agricultural, and in which, speaking comparatively, there is little scope for manufacturing industry. There are, I believe, eighteen counties to the north of the line, and twenty-three counties to the south of it. The northern counties are the following:—Northumberland, Cumberland, Durham, Westmoreland, Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Monmouthshire, Herefordshire, Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Rutlandshire. The southern counties are:—Hertfordshire, Essex, Suffolk, Cambridge, Bedford, Huntingdon, Northampton, Norfolk, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire, Dorset, Devonshire, Cornwall, Somersetshire, Gloucestershire, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, and Middlesex. Now let us examine, how the schedules and enactments of this bill affect these two divisions of England, and the interests which are connected with them. Fifty-six boroughs, returning 111 members, included in schedule A, have been already doomed to destruction; five only of these boroughs are to the north of the line, fifty-one are to the south. The counties north of the line lose only ten members, while the counties south of the line lose 101. So much for schedule A. I will proceed to schedule B. By schedule B, forty-one boroughs are to lose each one member. At the commencement of these proceedings, the number was forty, but the transfer of Saltash from schedule A made the number forty-one. Of these forty-one boroughs, only eight are to the north, while thirty-three are to the south of the line. Thus, the northern division will lose sixteen members, while the southern will lose sixty-six. From this it will appear, that the combined operation of schedules A and B is, that the manufacturing counties will lose eighteen members, while the agricultural counties will lose 134 members. I should be quite aware, even if the noble lord opposite were not taking notes of what I have said, that the boroughs in schedule A, being nomination boroughs, and in a great measure aiding the commercial and colonial interests, their loss cannot be fairly said to be entirely an injury to the agricultural interests. I do not deny that there is considerable force in this argument. But the argument has no reference to the forty boroughs in schedule B, which are avowedly not nomination boroughs. It cannot be denied, that the forty members to be returned under schedule B will be indebted for their election to local considerations, and will be bound to consult the especial interests of their constituents. I, and others, may think it unwise to make local interests exclusively predominate; but they will predominate; and forty new members, given to the boroughs in schedule B, to be returned hereafter, not by nomination, not by corporations, not by absent free-men, will be purely local representatives, and, in this sense, will be a clear gain to the districts from which they are sent. I say, then, here is an excellent opportunity to redress, in some degree, the wrong inflicted by schedule A, by enabling each borough in schedule B to return two members instead of one. I should rather say, by permitting them to retain their ancient right and privilege. So much for the destructive part of the bill; I will now proceed to the constructive portion of it, and I will enquire, whether it tends to restore the equipoise between the manufacturing and the agricultural interests, which the other part of the bill so seriously disturbed? Quite the reverse. So far from offering any compensation to the agricultural division of the country for the losses sustained from schedule A and schedule B, it makes matters infinitely worse: so far from offering any thing like an equivalent, the preponderance of the northern counties is increased greatly by this part of the measure. I again refer to facts. Schedule C creates twelve new boroughs, which are to return two members each. Every one of these boroughs, with the exception of the metropolitan district boroughs, and two others, is to the north of the line. Now, with respect to the metropolitan district boroughs, although it is certain that they are to the south of the line, yet it is as certain that their creation, so far from being advantageous to the agricultural interests, is calculated to operate in an exactly opposite direction; because, if even the interests of manufacturing towns shall conflict with the interests of the agricultural districts, the metropolitan members will unite with the former, rather than with the latter. Putting aside, therefore, the metropolitan districts, Finsbury-square, the Tower Hamlets, and so forth, with which agriculture has no sort of concern, the only two towns on the south of the line gaining two members by schedule C, are Frome and Devonport. Thus, out of the twenty-four members to be returned for these boroughs, no fewer than twenty are to be returned, either from boroughs northward of the line, or from the metropolitan district boroughs. Now for schedule D. By schedule D twenty-six boroughs are to be created, each to return one member. Twenty-four of these twenty-six are absolutely on the north of the line. Only two are to the south of the line. What are the two? What are these two strongholds of the agricultural interest which are allotted to us out of the twenty-four? Why, they are worse than nothing; two overgrown watering-places, Cheltenham and Brighton. What, then, will be the aggregate effect of this bill? What is the balance of loss and gain? The total loss of the division south of the line is 134, the loss of the division north of the line, eighteen. And when we proceed to look further into the constructive clauses, to see what new members are given, we find that the gain of the division south of the line is, excluding the metropolis, and throwing in Cheltenham and Brighton, six members: that of the division north of the line, thirty-three. Now these being the facts of the case, this being the balance of loss and gain, I ask whether my proposal is an unreasonable one—that each of the boroughs in schedule B, forty in number, thirty-three of which are to the south of the line, should retain its existing right, and continue to send two members to parliament? I do not call upon you to restore schedule A; I assume that you will adhere to it; that you will disfranchise every one of the fifty-six boroughs which it includes, but I entreat you to pause before you proceed further; to consider the extent of the change you have already made, and the hazard of unsettling and deranging a balance which time, rather than reason, has adjusted, but which may not on that account be the less conformable to justice. Has there been, hitherto, any undue and unjust protection to agriculture? Have manufactures languished for the want of representation? And—founded on property, on numbers, or on past neglect—have they a just claim for that great preponderance in representation which they will have in the new system as compared with the old one? Bear in mind, that commerce and manufactures have a great advantage in this respect over agriculture. With equal numbers of representatives they may exercise a much more powerful influence on the public councils. The power which agriculture can bring to bear, is more isolated, more dispersed, than that of manufactures. It has less of activity and energy, and cannot be combined and brought to bear on one point by simultaneous action, like that of commerce and manufactures. The influence of the press, whether it be for good or evil, tells more rapidly and contagiously on the aggregate societies of towns, than on the inhabitants of country districts. Political unions, and all the devices which, by means of combination, give to men acting in concert a moral force greater than their actual numbers, tend to increase the influence of a manufacturing as compared with an agricultural population. Every consideration, then, derived from the nature of landed property—from its liability to the envy and rapacity of the many—from the position, habits, and characters of those who occupy it, enforce the policy and necessity of providing carefully and permanently for its protection. Consider the class of voters whose privileges would be extended by the adoption of my amendment. They would be the small occupiers of houses and land in agricultural districts in the neighbourhood of small towns. Speaking generally, their interests would be identified with those of agriculture, themselves being either directly engaged in it, or dependent upon its prosperity for their own. If you tell me they are an unenlightened class—I answer, enlighten them by their admission to civil privilege; rub off the rusticity of their habits; extend their contracted views, by inviting them into the contentions of political and party struggles. It was with this object that, in framing the jury bill, I purposely called this class into increased action, and sought to familiarize them with the performance of civil duties, and to multiply their points of contact with the more intelligent inhabitants of towns. Granted, that they are indisposed to innovation—that their disposition is to maintain things as they are—that they are governed by local ties and by personal attachments, rather than by considerations of general politics—it is on that very account that I conjure you to extend their influence: they constitute the ballast of the vessel of the state. Beware how you heave it overboard, under the fatal impression that it is an useless encumbrance, occupying space that might be more profitably employed. It may at times retard the velocity of your movement: it may make you less obedient to the sudden impulse of shifting gales; but this, and this alone it is, that enables you to extend your canvass, and ensures the steadiness of your course, and the security of your navigation. In the most perfect contrivances of mechanical skill, there are dead-weights, that may seem to the superficial observer to answer no useful purpose; there are opposing movements, which the ignorant may consider to be produced by a wasteful application of power; but these are, in fact, the devices of consummate ingenuity to check superfluous and extravagant force, and, by controlling the useless and irregular rapidity of parts of the machine, to smooth and harmonize the action of the whole. In the working of political mechanism similar effects may be produced by giving to that class of the constituent body, to which I have been referring, and to that class of representatives whom they will probably select, not a preponderance, but a just influence in the state. This bill makes ample provision for the introduction of active and enterprising talent into the future House of Commons. The same arts by which the favour of popular constituencies has been secured out of doors, must be resorted to within. We shall have abundance of young and zealous advocates for the improvement of the political system—sincere and honest in their endeavours to effect that improvement—but too much disposed to overlook the difficulties and the hazards of perpetual change. They will be influenced by the double stimulus of too sanguine expectations of the good to be effected by innovation, and of pleasing constituents as impatient as themselves of partial evil or temporary distress. Who is to oppose them? Who is to give that advice, and utter those warnings, which a longer experience in public life, and calmer and profounder views of public affairs, may dictate? Will those men, whose judgment has often swayed the decisions of this House—men of retired habits, averse to the bustle of contested elections, disqualified by age and inclination from competing with younger and more active spirits—will they, in the due proportion, find their way within these walls? Take a man like Mr. Sturges Bourne, for instance—and I name him with respect and honour—can there be a doubt of the value of his opinions, and the general soundness of his views? You have closed to him, and the class of which I have made him the representative, those avenues to this House which were opened to them by the small boroughs. Is it likely that they will seek the favour of very large constituent bodies? Even if they do, do they not incur obligations tending to diminish that peculiar influence and usefulness which I have assigned to them? Now, if you adopt my proposal—if you give to the towns in schedule B eighty, instead of forty members—you will facilitate, to a certain degree, the return of that class, whose exclusion will be not a private, but a public misfortune. These, Sir, are the combined considerations on which I rest my proposal. I ask you to redress an inequality in your scheme of representation unfavourable to the southern division of England, and to the interests which are connected with it; to do this—as you can do it—without violating any one principle of the bill—without reviving one nomination borough—without depriving any class of the advantages you propose to confer upon it. Let Ireland—let Scotland—let Wales—each have the increase of members which you propose to allot to her. I ask for no increase to England; but why diminish its present number? I want forty members to effect my object; and, by a strange coincidence, I find exactly forty vacancies arising thus:—You propose to diminish the present number of the English members by 154: you add 114 new members, by enfranchising towns and adding to county representation; there remain forty. Dispose of them, by acceding to my proposal, and you maintain the existing, the long-established amount of English representation. You do more—you avoid an extent of change that is not required to satisfy the preamble or fulfil the principle of your own bill. Why make wanton innovations? Why not rest satisfied with the destruction already completed? Why not give a fair trial to your own scheme; and, after having destroyed every nomination borough—having extinguished above one-fifth of the English representation—be content, for the present, with a much greater change in government than was ever yet attended with success? If you disregard my opinion, listen to the counsel of one of your own body, who has cast a retrospect on history with the eye of a philosopher rather than that of an annalist, and has taught us how we may benefit by the lessons which wisdom gleans from experience. In taking a review of the institutions of the Anglo-Saxons, in the first volume of his History of England, Sir James Mackintosh condemns the narrow, unphilosophical spirit in which the antiquaries of the seventeenth century investigated the state of our ancient constitution, and raises a warning voice against short-sighted legislation and rash experiments in government, which, if not intended, is, at any rate, admirably adapted, for our instruction. After blaming the prejudiced views of the Tories, he proceeds thus:—“The Whigs, with no less deviation from truth, endeavoured to prove, that the modern constitution of King, Lords, and Commons, subsisted in the earliest times, and was then more pure and flourishing than in any succeeding age. No one at that time was taught, by a wide survey of society, that governments are not framed after a model, but that all their parts and powers grow out of occasional acts, prompted by some urgent expediency, or some private interests, which in the course of time coalesce and harden into usage; and that this bundle of usages is the object of respect and the guide of conduct, long before it is embodied, defined, and enforced in written laws. Government may be, in some measure, reduced to system, but it cannot flow from it. It is not like a machine or a building, which may be constructed entirely, and according to a previous plan, by the art and labour of man. It is better illustrated by a comparison with vegetables, or even animals, which may be, in a very high degree, improved by skill and care, which may be grievously injured by neglect, or destroyed by violence, but which cannot be produced by human contrivance. A government can, indeed, be no more than a mere draught or scheme of rule, when it is not composed of habits of obedience on the part of the people, and of an habitual exercise of certain portions of authority by the individuals or bodies who constitute the sovereign power. The habits, like all others, can be formed only by repeated acts; they cannot be suddenly infused by the lawgiver, nor can they immediately follow the most perfect conviction of their propriety. Many causes have more power over the human mind than written law; it is extremely difficult, from the mere perusal of a written scheme of government, to foretell what it may prove in action.” These, Sir, are truths which no sophistry can evade; and if they be truths—if it be justly and wisely said, that government is not a machine which can be constructed by the art of man, according to a previous plan—if habits cannot be infused by lawgivers—if many causes have more power over the human mind than written law—above all, if it be extremely difficult, from the perusal of written schemes of government, to foretell what they may prove in action,—then I conjure you, who are sitting in judgment on the British constitution, to distrust your own sagacity, and to retain, as far as it be possible, that hold on the mind of man—those motives to willing obedience—which are supplied by ancient usage and the habitual deference to authority.

In reply to Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel said, the noble lord seemed to have misunderstood one part of his argument. The noble lord could see no reason why Mr. Sturges Bourne should not ask for the suffrages of the electors of Lymington. Now, what he (Sir R. Peel) said was, that these places were the only ones to which men of retired habits would repair in order to effect their return to parliament; and therefore he contended, that they ought to be allowed to send two members instead of one.

On a division, the numbers were: for the amendment, 115; against it, 182; majority for the clause, 67.

On the question that the borough of Chippenham stand part of schedule B, Captain Boldero denied the accuracy of the population returns of 1821, respecting that borough, and offered to prove their error by evidence.

Ministers objected to this offer.

Sir Robert Peel called the particular attention of the committee to the case. The offer of the hon. and gallant member was such as he apprehended could not be refused. The further they proceeded, the more he became convinced, that a great error had been committed in not referring the whole of these details to a select committee. In 1821, by the population returns, there were in Chippenham borough and parish, 576 inhabited houses. He turned to the population return of 1811, and by that it appeared, that there were in Chippenham borough and tithings, 668 inhabited houses. It was clear, therefore, that there must be some mistake. Surely that was a very strong presumptive proof, that the hon. member might be able to show that there had been some great error in the other point.

Mr. Pusey stated, that by the population returns of 1821, Chippenham was rated at 521 houses, and 3,600 inhabitants; but he was in possession of a parish document, which proved, that in 1821 there were 756 houses. He had no doubt, that at present the place contained 4,300 inhabitants.

Sir Robert Peel begged to add, that in 1811 there were thirty-three uninhabited houses, and in 1821 nineteen; so that, by comparing the two returns, 100 houses and upwards, unless it were asserted that they had been taken down, had not been accounted for by the latter return.

Lord Althorp admitted, that there might have existed a mistake in the return of the number of houses in Chippenham, but denied that such a mistake involved another in the population return; and as to calling evidence to prove in what the mistake consisted, where, he might ask, was such to be had? How was it possible for any one to be cognizant of the population of Chippenham, except the person who had made the return on oath; and how could he be examined as to the credibility of his own return? He had little doubt there was a mistake in the return of the number of houses, but he had just as little doubt that the error had not extended to the population return.

Sir Robert Peel said, that there was one broad fact staring them in the face, which was, that there were 105 houses in Chippenham missing from the census of 1811. In that year the number was 705: and in 1821 the number returned was 600. It had been urged as a reason for this decrease in the number of inhabited houses, that trade had declined, that persons had become bankrupts, and that housekeepers had given up their residences, and taken themselves off elsewhere; but such was evidently not the fact, because the population of 1811 was greater in proportion, and the houses were more thickly inhabited, than in 1821; and when the noble lord talked of the difficulty of procuring any evidence on this subject, he must be suffered to remind him, that probably the man who made the return of 1821 was in existence, and to be found, and he could be brought forward to state the reason for having omitted to reckon so large a number of houses as 105 in the return made by him. He did not ask to have evidence generally, since such had been rejected; but, at all events, let the case of Chippenham be an exception to the others, having so fair a claim to that exception, until the facts were placed rightly before the House.

Later in the debate, Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Lord Althorp, said, in urging the noble lord to assent to the proposition for delay, and enquiry into the discrepancy between the population returns before the House, he did not want to throw unnecessary obstacles for the purpose of delay in the way of the bill. Let them drop Chippenham till enquiry had been made, it being evident there were no authentic data for them to legislate upon yet furnished, and proceed with the next borough on the schedule; and should it appear that the population did not exceed the line, he, for one, would vote for retaining it in its present position. They had disposed of several boroughs this night without meeting one which had such claims for consideration, and it was probable they should meet with no more such. He would therefore suggest, that a committee should be appointed to examine the returning officer, who was now in town, and they could proceed with other boroughs without establishing an inconvenient precedent.

On a division, the original question was carried by 251 against 181, majority 70; and Chippenham was added to the schedule.

JULY 28, 1831.

On the motion respecting Cockermonth,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should certainly spare the time of the committee, as he thought it unnecessary to trouble them after what had occurred last night in the case of Chippenham, when it was proved to the satisfaction of every man in the House—[“No, no!”] He felt it rather extraordinary that he should be interrupted in the middle of a sentence, when it could not be known to hon. members what he had to say. What he intended to have said was, that it was proved to the satisfaction of every member of that House, that no dependence could be placed on the returns of 1821. It was proved with regard to one point, that 106 houses of that place had been left out of the returns, and yet the committee had refused to hear any evidence as to how that error had arisen. His determination was taken, not to trouble the committee with any details concerning schedule B; for he now despaired, whatever case should be made out, of the committee doing any thing but condemning all the boroughs in the schedule.

On the motion that Dorchester stand part of schedule B,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he thought that there were very good reasons for giving to the borough of Dorchester the advantage of its connection with Fordington. The two places were one continuous town. Although Fordington was not in the borough, yet it constituted a part of the town; and, according to the principle by which ministers had been guided, there appeared good ground for constituting an exception in favour of Dorchester. But, supposing that were not the case, then he admitted that the population of Dorchester was not sufficient to exempt it from the line laid down by the noble lord; but in making that admission, he clearly proved the absurdity of that line, because a borough was about to be disfranchised which it was admitted was most perfect. He would call the attention of the House to what he considered a more important principle. The constituency of Dorchester consisted of every inhabitant householder who contributed to the local charges. These in number amounted to 500; but the new rule would deprive the town of 200 of these, and would confine the constituency to 300 votes. It might be said, that he was stating this for the purpose of exciting dissatisfaction amongst those who would be disfranchised by this bill; but he wished explicitly to declare, that he would never ally himself with those whose object was to excite dissatisfaction amongst any class whatever. He must say, however, that it was a fatal error in this bill, that when the opportunity offered of maintaining the connection between the wealthy class of voters, and that class which was above pauperism, but below the line of being £10 householders, they neglected it, and thus lost the fair opportunity of softening the harshness of the arbitrary line which they had laid down. The government ought to have, in this instance, given the franchise to all those who were above pauperism. He did not mean to say by this that the people had the right to the elective franchise, for all they had a right to was to be well governed; but, by refusing the franchise under such circumstances, they were diminishing the chance that this arrangement would be final. It might be alleged that these poorer householders would be more open to bribery; but he could truly say, that, as far as his experience went, they were not in the least more open to bribery than the voters for residences of £10 value. The House had only to look at Liverpool to be convinced of that fact. He did not mean to contend for the indiscriminate admission of all the class of voters to whom he alluded; for he was aware that in manufacturing districts the franchise to £10 householders would be almost equivalent to universal suffrage. The very ground, therefore, on which he would refuse the franchise to householders under £10 in a manufacturing town, would be the same as that on which he would desire to continue it to Dorchester. The rule laid down of £10 qualifications, would admit in one place a lower class of voters than could be found in the £5 houses of the other. Here there was a case in which ministers might, with perfect safety, have permitted 500 householders to preserve their franchise; and, so far from disfranchising the borough, he thought that they ought to have seized the opportunity of continuing to it its present privileges as soon as they discovered that they could do so without violating their own arbitrary rule.

On a division, the original motion was carried by 279 against 193; majority, 86.

JULY 29, 1831.

On the question, "That the borough of Malmesbury do stand part of schedule B,"—Lord Althorp moved, that the further proceedings of the committee be deferred, and that the chairman do report progress.

On the chairman putting the question,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished to have some understanding with the noble lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to their sitting to-morrow. He thought they had better go on to the usual hour (it was then half-past twelve) that evening, and adjourn over, as usual, to Monday. Besides that the noble lord's motion took them all by surprise, it was contrary to an understanding which he had had with the right hon. the first lord of the Admiralty, respecting the progress of the bill. Unless some hours of relaxation were afforded hon. members, it would be physically impossible to do justice to the important measure before the House. The proposal for sitting to-morrow was, moreover, a direct violation of the noble lord's own former arrangement, to which the House had assented; and he had little doubt that many hon. members, relying on that arrangement, had paired off that evening, and gone into the country for the purpose of obtaining a little necessary recreation.—Ministers were as fully aware a week since as now, that it was his Majesty's intention to open London Bridge. There was ample time, therefore, to have given notice of the intention to sit on Saturday.

The committee divided on the question, "That the chairman do ask leave to sit again to-morrow:"—For the motion 216; against it 143—majority 73. House resumed. Committee to sit again the next day.

AUGUST 2, 1831.

In the discussion on the question that the borough of Sudbury stand part of schedule B,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL maintained, that no stronger case could possibly be brought forward than that of Sudbury. Undoubtedly Ballingdon was part of the town, and undoubtedly it had more than 4,000 inhabitants in 1821. The noble lord, who took a different view, had only two things to rely upon; first, that Ballingdon was not part of the parish of All Saints; and secondly, the act for paving and lighting in 1825. Now, that Ballingdon was part of the parish, there really could not be a rational doubt—it paid taxes, tithes, and church-rates, as part of the parish—it appointed one of the churchwardens—it had no chapel of its own, so that all the ceremonies relating to births, deaths, and marriages, were performed at the church of Sudbury. In a word, Ballingdon was part of the parish of All Saints for all legal purposes, and how or why should they then deny the relation? Then as to the act, he observed, that it was, in itself, a most preposterous piece of legislation; it consisted of 120 clauses, and one of them provided, that all houses thenceforth built in Sudbury should be perpendicular. Besides, no argument could be drawn, even respecting the limits of the borough, from such an act. There were numerous instances in which parts of boroughs had been known to be left out in such acts; and here there was an especial reason why the hamlet of Ballingdon should be omitted. It lay in the county of Suffolk, wherein the magistrates of Essex had no jurisdiction; there were, therefore, cogent legal reasons why Ballingdon should not be included in the act. He insisted that no claim could be more satisfactory, or more clearly established, than that which had been set forth for the borough of Sudbury; and he considered the ministers need not hesitate to do justice in this case, because it was one essentially peculiar, and could not be possibly drawn into a precedent.

Sir Robert Peel said, they were now out of the disfranchising clauses, and were proceeding to those of enfranchisement, and he rose to protest against that part of the bill which had for its object to enfranchise large towns at the expense of boroughs. If these were considered as spoils taken from places which had long enjoyed the privilege, he should decidedly object to the principle. He objected also to the principle, because it went to enfranchise so many towns. At the same time he was called upon to state, as he had done previously to the dissolution, that, looking at the difficulties which the government had to contend with—and though differing as he did from a majority of the House on the subject of reform, and taking into account the circumstances of the country—he should not throw any obstacles in the way of a moderate reform. As a member of the late government he had opposed the enfranchisement of large towns, not because he apprehended any immediate dangers from such a measure, but because he was afraid of entertaining the question of reform at all, and was fearful that any plan of reform, limited exclusively to enfranchisement, proposed by a government which had been previously opposed to all reform, would not give satisfaction, and would not, probably, be permanent, considering the feeling of the country on the question. On coming to schedule C, he should consider himself privileged to object to any of the clauses, particularly if those clauses should be urged on the ground that the boroughs in schedules A and B had been disfranchised, and that the vacancies caused by the disfranchisement must be filled up. What he meant was, that he would not consent to any enfranchisement on the ground that disfranchisement must be a necessary preliminary. With regard to the first clause, and notwithstanding the feelings of the country, he must say, that disfranchisement as a rule was unjust, and on that point he was prepared to yield nothing. Having regard to the prevailing opinion of the country, however, he thought it impossible to deny the right to Manchester, the first place mentioned in the schedule, to send members to parliament; but he thought that the principle of disfranchisement was unjust. He thought the rule adopted by ministers an absurd one. There was no sufficient ground, in his opinion, for disfranchisement; but he was not prepared to say that he would not yield on the score of enfranchisement. He thought that it was impossible to contend against the feeling of the country on the subject, and he was not disposed to diminish the favour of concession by unavailing opposition. But if he were proposing enfranchisement, he should say, that in all cases he would give the enfranchised place two members, not one. That was, if he had fifty members to give, he would select twenty-five places, and give each place two members, rather than select fifty places, and give to each one member. He certainly thought that the enfranchisement proposed was much too extensive; but as it was, if priority were given to any place, Manchester certainly deserved to be the first place enfranchised. Birmingham also was fairly entitled to the same advantage, and then followed Leeds, which ought to have the same privilege. On former occasions these were the towns to which it was proposed to give the forfeited franchises: then the franchise of Penryn was to be given to Manchester, that of Grampound to Leeds, and that of East Retford to Birmingham. That was proposed by those gentlemen who were favourable to the transfer. To the three towns which stood first he had no objection; to the fourth town on the list he should object. He never could have supposed, when he heard of a Reform Bill, that Deptford, and Greenwich, and Woolwich were to send members to Parliament. He believed, too, they dreamed as little of it themselves as he did. He understood that the principle of the bill was to destroy nomination boroughs; and yet it was proposed to give the franchise to Woolwich, Greenwich, and Deptford, places under the immediate influence of government, and by that means to constitute an enormous nomination borough. He objected also to the enfranchisement of the metropolitan districts. If it were desirable to give those districts increased representation, he should prefer doing so by adding two members to the county of Middlesex. The proper principle upon which to give representation was population, in order that large masses of the people might have a voice in the representation. On these grounds, and seeing the impossibility of resisting the proposed enfranchisement to certain large towns, he would not waste the time of the House by discussing or opposing the enfranchisement of Manchester, Birmingham, or Leeds; and no man more sincerely hoped that this change would turn out for their good. Taking, however, any single case—taking the town of Manchester, and the description given of it by hon. members, as to its increase in population, wealth, and industry—he would ask, was not this very increase the best proof that the right of sending representatives was not necessary to improvement, and that towns could flourish without having representatives within the walls of the temple of the state? Enfranchisement certainly was consistent with the practice of former times; but it ought to be recollected there was no corresponding disfranchisement. On these grounds he would not make any objection to the enfranchisement of the first three towns in C; but he should reserve the right to deliver his opinion on all the other places included in that schedule. When the committee came to Greenwich, Deptford, and Woolwich, he should move, as an amendment, that they be omitted, because he considered they were under influence—because it was dangerous to give the franchise to places in such proximity to the House—and because, both from moral and physical strength, they might influence the deliberations of that House. For these reasons he would take the opinion of the committee on giving the franchise to Greenwich and other places close to the metropolis. But he should consider himself at liberty to form what opinion he pleased with respect to the other proposed boroughs. He should certainly propose that Greenwich be omitted from the schedule C, and take the sense of that House on the question; because he objected to the undue influence which the metropolitan districts exercised over their members.

In reply to Lord John Russell,

Sir Robert Peel said he wished to make one or two observations on what had fallen from the noble lord opposite. The noble lord could not imagine how any person could support enfranchisement without disfranchisement. But he told the noble lord, that one was a question of expediency and the other of justice; and those who might be prepared to yield to the point of expediency, might still think themselves justified in resisting proposals which, in their opinion, were founded on injustice. But the noble lord had said, "You who have been against reform never should be a reformer: you are cut off from all possibility of ever becoming a reformer; and not even the circumstances of the country (altered in consequence of one government leaving office because they would not concede reform, and another coming in pledged to grant it; altered by the sanction of the king's government, and the king's name being given to their plan of reform, and by the weight and influence of the royal character being taken away from the constitution, as it had hitherto existed, and transferred to the support of an extensive change) will form any excuse for your turning reformer." And was it the noble lord who said, that he ought to allow no change to take place in his opinion, on the subject of reform? Had he ever taunted the noble lord with a departure from his principles? Had he said, that he would bind the noble lord down to the opinions which he had formerly expressed? If the noble lord's doctrine, that no change should take place in a man's opinions was to be considered as correct, what must be the feelings of his two right hon. friends opposite (probably Mr. Grant, and Viscount Palmerston), who, for fifteen years past, had distinguished themselves for their adherence to the political opinions of Mr. Canning, whose domestic policy was marked by the most decided resistance to reform in every shape? But did he deny to the noble lord, and his right hon. friend, the perfect right to take what course they thought fit, on account of the altered circumstances of the country, on the question of reform? Had they any other reason or pretext to assign for their support of the present measure, except the altered circumstances of the country? In 1826, when the application of the forfeited franchise of Grampound came to be considered, what course did his noble friend (Viscount Palmerston) take? Did he concur in the expediency of transferring it to some large town, or did he not rather adhere to the policy of Mr. Canning, and vote for transferring it to the neighbouring hundred? Had he (Sir Robert Peel) even insinuated that there was any thing unworthy in the course which the noble lord (Lord John Russell) had pursued? But he thought that the noble lord, after the speeches which he had made, and the able treatises which he had written on the subject of reform, and flanked as he was on the right hand and on the left by persons who had always opposed reform, should be the last person to taunt his opponents with change of opinion on the subject of reform. He knew not what possible advantage would result to him by changing his opinion, if change there was. He had uniformly held the same language since the question had been under consideration. After the change of government had taken place, he declared, that rather than risk another change of government in the then state of the country, he would lend his assistance to the government, in the hope that some moderate plan of reform would be proposed, to which he should be able to give his consent with justice. He still adhered to his declaration, and would support such parts of the bill as he could without violation of principle, and perpetrating injustice; and, in spite of the taunts of the noble lord, he intended to persevere in the course he had marked out for himself.

In reply to some farther remarks from Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel said, that he was willing to adhere to his opinion, and not take any share in the government. He was ready to pay that penalty for his opinion. He would not be a party to the hazard which he thought they were incurring by this bill. He would infinitely prefer paying the penalty of permanent exclusion from office, to sharing the noble lord's responsibility. But the proposal which he had made to-night was, in reality, the proposal which the noble lord had himself made a few years ago. The noble lord had thought proper to change the proposition which he first made, to grant compensation to the disfranchised boroughs, in consequence of the altered condition of the country, and that was the excuse he then offered for his own change of opinion—viz., the altered circumstances of the country.

Sir Robert Peel, in reply to Lord Althorp, said, that at present, from recent experience, he had great objection to enter into any arrangement at all. He did not mean to oppose any unnecessary obstacle to proceeding with the rest of the clause. He would, therefore, let Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds pass, without opposition, for the present. To-morrow, the committee might take the discussion on the rest of the schedule. If it should turn out that there was any thing to be urged, as to the local districts of the three places which he had just named, perhaps the noble lord would permit them to agitate it to-morrow.

The original motion was agreed to.

AUGUST 2, 1831.

Lord Althorp brought up a message from his Majesty to the following effect:—

“WILLIAM R.—His Majesty taking into his consideration, that since the parliament made a provision for the support of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Princess Alexandrina Victoria of Kent, circumstances have arisen which make it proper that a more adequate provision should be made for her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and for the honourable support and education of her Highness the Princess Alexandrina Victoria of Kent, recommends the consideration thereof to this House, and relies on the attachment of his faithful Commons, to adopt such measures as may be suitable to the occasion.”

Message to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

AUGUST 3, 1831.

On the motion of Lord Althorp, the House resolved itself into a Committee, to take into consideration the message from his Majesty, respecting a further grant of money to the Duchess of Kent and Princess Victoria.

His lordship then, after an explanatory statement, moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this committee, that his Majesty should be enabled to grant a yearly sum, not exceeding £10,000, out of the Consolidated Funds of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for a more adequate provision for her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the honourable support and education of her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandrina Victoria of Kent; and the said yearly sum to be paid from the 5th of January, 1831."

Mr. Hunt moved, as an amendment, the substitution of £5,000 for £10,000.

Sir Francis Burdett agreed with the noble lord (Althorp) in thinking, that no person ought to consider the proposed grant immoderate.

SIR ROBERT PEEL quite concurred with the hon. baronet, that it was better suited to the dignity of this country to make a just and independent provision for the maintenance and education of the heir-presumptive to the Throne, considering her age, than to leave her dependent on the voluntary, though very honourable bounty, of a near relation, now the sovereign of another country. He could not conceive it possible for any person possessing a proper feeling for the honour of his country, to desire to restrict the public bounty, in order to make the heir-presumptive dependent for maintenance and education on her relations. The grant proposed appeared to be liberal, and it ought to be so. It was not, however, more liberal than just, and he should give his cordial support to it, in preference to the amendment of the hon. member for Preston. Gentlemen were all aware of the claims made upon the liberality of persons in exalted situations. The hospitality which they exercised was nothing more than that decent hospitality which was frequently displayed by persons of less dignity; and it did not fail to serve as a great stimulus to the trade and manufactures of the country. These exalted personages were also large subscribers to many useful charitable institutions; and he was bound to say, that much more of this grant, contrary to what people generally imagined, would be expended in promoting public objects, than in maintaining the splendour of the individual to whom it was granted. It was quite consistent in those gentlemen who were advocates of popular principles, to be likewise the advocates for a suitable provision being made to those who governed the country; so that they might have the means of introducing themselves to the best society, and of accustoming themselves to that intercourse with their subjects, which was much more necessary on the part of the monarch of this country, than on the part of a despotic sovereign. As he could not see how this desirable object could be obtained at a less expense, he should vote for the proposition of the noble lord.

The committee divided on the amendment, and the numbers were—Ayes, 0; Noes, 223—majority, 223.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM BILL.

AUGUST 3, 1831.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee upon the Parliamentary Reform bill for England,—

The first question was, "That Greenwich, including the parishes of Greenwich, St. Nicholas and St. Paul, Deptford, and Woolwich, Kent, form part of schedule C."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, before they proceeded further, he wished to ascertain the construction which was to be put upon the twenty-fifth clause of the bill, which had a material bearing upon the present question. By that clause it was provided,

"that so far as it relates to any city or borough (except those enumerated in the said schedule A), which now has the privilege of sending a member or members to parliament, but does not contain of houses, warehouses, and counting-houses, more than 300 in the whole, such houses being assessed to the duty on inhabited houses, upon a yearly value of not less than £10, or such houses, warehouses, or counting-houses, whether separately, or jointly with any land occupied therewith, being of the clear yearly value of not less than £10, or being rated to the relief of the poor upon a yearly value of £10, the said last-mentioned commissioners, or the major part of them, shall within — months after the passing of this Act, proceed to incorporate with any such city or borough, for the purposes of this Act, any one or more parishes or townships, the whole or a part of which may be situated within, or adjoining to, such city or borough." What he wished to know was, whether, supposing a city or borough had more than 300 houses rated at £10 a year, the commissioners were empowered to annex adjoining parishes to places so circumstanced?

Lord John Russell said, the intention of the planners of the bill was, that the twenty-fifth clause should be taken in conjunction with the twenty-fourth, by which the commissioners would be authorized to declare the boundaries of cities and boroughs, and to incorporate adjacent townships, even though such places with which they were to form a part, should contain more than 300 £10 houses.

Sir Robert Peel understood by this, that the commissioners had power in all cases to annex the adjoining parishes to a city or borough, at their discretion.

Lord J. Russell said, it was so intended.

Sir Robert Peel said, he had not asked the question to provoke a discussion on that clause, but merely for the purpose of clearing away a doubt on the provisions of a subsequent clause, which had a material bearing on that now under their consideration. The question then before the Committee was, that Greenwich, Deptford, and Woolwich, should acquire the right of sending two members to parliament. He thought these places ought not to acquire that right. In considering the matter, he would cautiously abstain from entering into observations respecting the principle of the bill, reserving to himself the full right of speaking upon it when the report was brought up, and on the third reading. He meant, as he had done throughout, in discussing any of the details of the bill, to confine himself to the special circumstance under consideration. In this stage of the proceedings, he thought it would be more convenient to assume, that what had heretofore been done, had been done well, and justly, and rightly. Conceding this, therefore, for the present, he begged to state, that he saw no peculiarity which would entitle these places to return members to parliament. Assuming that they had dealt fairly and justly by schedules A and B, and that the franchises which were forfeited should be transferred to other more populous and wealthy places, still, he must deny that the selection of Greenwich and Deptford was justifiable, even according to the principle of the noble lord's bill. He would avoid all reference to the discussions which had taken place as regarded schedules A and B; but he felt it his duty at once to object to the granting the metropolitan districts that vast influence in the representation of the country which this bill would confer upon them. He would also state, that he was perfectly willing, in order to avoid unnecessary delay, to take Greenwich as a fair specimen of the suburban parishes which were to receive representatives, and to consider the division he meant to take upon this question as decisive of all the other districts. Certainly, he had been much surprised to find Greenwich, Woolwich, and Deptford, included amongst those places which were to be enfranchised. It was said, that Greenwich had heretofore exercised the right of sending members to parliament; but the noble lord could not, surely, rely upon that fact. He admitted that Greenwich had formerly sent a member; but to make that circumstance now available, the noble lord should propose to give representatives to every other place which had formerly been, and was not at present, represented. But the noble lord had put prescriptive right out of the question, because there were a number of places which he did not propose to enfranchise, and which had in former times, like Greenwich, enjoyed the right of representation. Even if that were admitted, there was no reason why the claim of Greenwich should be extended to the other places set forth in the proposition. In the next place, he was not aware that there was any trade carried on in these places which required protection. The only claim they really possessed was founded on population; and this could scarcely be considered a good one, as the population was found to vary with the establishments maintained there by the government. In the very useful notes attached to the population returns of 1821, it was remarked, that the population had fallen off in Deptford, and increased in Greenwich; and the falling off in Deptford was ascribed to a reduction in the dockyards; and the increase in Greenwich was attributed partly to the naval arsenal, and partly to the fact of a greater number of pensioners choosing to become residents in that town. From the influence, too, which the government would exert through these establishments, he contended, that in all cases in which the interests of the metropolitan districts were not directly concerned, Greenwich and its dependencies would be a nomination borough: but he did not object to it on that account, though it certainly seemed strange the noble lord should have selected it under the circumstances. Great, too, he observed, as was the hostility of the noble lord to nomination boroughs, the unconstitutional plan of giving to the king the right of nominating members to that House had been hinted at. It was true, the noble lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had not expressly stated that this would be hereafter proposed; but there was a mode of doing things which, with all apparent caution, rendered perfectly evident the object which men had in view—Dum tacent, clamant. The cabinet, as a responsible body, had expressed no attention or opinion upon the subject; but the noble lord who had introduced this bill had spoken of this project as a matter of grave consideration; and it was to be fairly presumed, he would not have ventured even upon this expression of opinion, without a perfect understanding with the other members of the administration upon the subject. The truth was, the noble lord was frightened at the probable consequences of his own measure, and was looking out, with a provident eye, for remedies to meet the evils which it would not fail to create. But to proceed more immediately to the question before the committee respecting Greenwich, upon which, to prevent unnecessary delay, he was willing to take the discussion upon all the metropolitan districts. He would, in the first place, admit, that it had been a blot upon our representative system that the great towns, such as Leeds, Manchester, and Birmingham, which had grown up in the country, had not been allowed to have a fair share in the representation; but this blot, he did not believe, could be fairly alleged to exist with respect to the metropolitan districts. For these he considered, that representation had been amply provided. Though some opulent and populous districts about the metropolis did not enjoy the right of returning members to parliament, yet, looking upon the metropolitan district as a whole, it could not be supposed to be perfectly provided. First, there were the four members for the city of London; secondly, there were two for Westminster; and thirdly, there were two for Southwark, making eight in all. To these might be probably added the two members for the county of Middlesex, because these members were not returned by a rural population, but chiefly by the inhabitants of the metropolis. In an extremely valuable return which had been laid upon the table, the members would find stated the number of families in the county of Middlesex which were engaged in agriculture, the number concerned in trade and manufactures, and the number of those employed in neither. From that return it appeared, that, in agriculture, there were only 9,393 families engaged, while 161,356 were engaged in trade and manufactures. This showed how large was the proportion of town influence to that of agricultural, since the ratio of those engaged was as 161,000 to 9,300. Indeed, the rural population in Middlesex did not altogether amount to more than 70,000 or 80,000, while the total population of the county was 1,140,000. Thus it appeared, there were ten members for the metropolitan district, and to them one of the members for the county of Surrey might, in his opinion, be fairly added; because, considering the influence of the borough of Southwark, and observing that the population of Brixton was a town population, and not a rural population, there could be no doubt that the town population exerted sufficient influence to return one member. The whole of the rural population of Surrey amounted to 130,000, while the town population of Southwark and Brixton amounted to 268,000. The consequence of all this was, that the metropolitan districts had eleven members—the four for the city of London, the two for Westminster, the two for Southwark, the two for Middlesex, and the one for Surrey. Never, therefore, was there juster cause for surprise, than that ten more should be added to them, giving the metropolitan districts twenty-one members. If ministers were to say, that the principle on which they proceeded was population, or contribution to the taxes, this case of enfranchisement would be intelligible; but in admitting that all they had heretofore done was done well, he was bound to say, this was not the principle upon which they proceeded. Population merely was not the principle of the bill. If the ministers were to say, that the principle upon which they proceeded was population, or contribution to the assessed taxes, this case of enfranchisement would be perfectly intelligible, and the metropolitan districts would then have a fair claim; but that was not the principle upon which they had proceeded. It was, indeed, impossible to suppose, that any ministry would bring a plan forward to deprive England, as a whole, of forty members, while it gave to the metropolis ten, in addition to the eleven which it already returned. It seemed to him, that the simple statement of this fact should be sufficient to deter the committee from assenting to the proposition involved in the question under consideration. A moment's reflection ought to convince every man of the undue proportion of representation which would be given by this clause of the bill to the metropolis and its suburbs, as compared with the great counties of Yorkshire and Lancashire. It should be considered with what justice these additional members could be given to the metropolis, after what had been done with the representation of the southern counties, and with the agricultural districts generally. Nothing could be more absurd, in his opinion, than to say, that as a town increased in population, so the number of its representatives should also increase. A proposition of that kind would be regarded as a wanton and unnecessary departure from the principles of the constitution; yet that was the very proposition which his Majesty's ministers submitted to the committee, in recommending the clause for enfranchising the metropolitan districts. Ministers said, that they would disfranchise all nomination boroughs: let them do so; they had some ground to proceed upon; but if they had any regard for justice—any desire to maintain a character of consistency—let them abstain from making such wanton and dangerous innovations on the constitution of the country, as those which were proposed by this clause. It never was a principle of the constitution of England, that representatives should be given to towns or districts, on account of their population only. The principle had been, to distribute the representation between large and small places, and, without reference to the amount of population, to give two representatives to every town on which the elective franchise was conferred. Upon this principle—to which there were but five exceptions—the opulent town of Liverpool, and the smallest borough contained in schedule A, were equally represented. The present bill departed from this principle. His Majesty's ministers rejected population as the ground upon which the elective franchise was, under this bill, to be given; they professed to take it only as the test—the absurd test—of whether or no a borough was a nomination borough; and whether it was or was not in a prosperous condition; but in this case they adopted that alone as the ground of enfranchisement. It required but little consideration to convince any man of the absurdity of such a test. As was very justly said the other night—the great complaint of the working classes being the want of employment, you take the numbers of the population as a test of the prosperity of any particular place; whereas, in point of fact, it very often happens that where the population is most numerous, there the poor-rates are most grievous, and trade or manufacture is in the least flourishing condition. In many towns, large numbers of Irish had located themselves; but every one would admit the absurdity of taking a population of 10,000 natives of the sister kingdom as a proof of the prosperous condition of a borough. In other cases, population had not been taken as the test of prosperity; or why was Liverpool, a town unsurpassed in increasing wealth and intelligence, and which, from its situation, and the enterprising spirit of its merchants, formed the great connecting link between this country and the western quarter of the world, left with two representatives only? Liverpool had a population of 200,000 inhabitants; did ministers on that account propose to add to its representation—to confer upon it the privilege of returning four or six additional members to parliament? No. Then what became of their principle of population? If that principle were a good one, and was therefore to be applied to the metropolitan districts, the metropolis having already eleven representatives, why should it not also be applied to Liverpool? There were many large places in the neighbourhood of that borough which had not hitherto taken any part in the election of members. By the provisions of this bill, they were to be incorporated with Liverpool, and thus the constituency of that borough was to be increased; yet there was to be no increase in its representation. This proved, that the case of the metropolitan districts was an exception to the general rule laid down by the bill. If the principle to be applied to the metropolitan districts was to be considered as a leading and a guiding one, how could the committee possibly neglect the claim of Liverpool to additional representation? The boroughs of Aylesbury, Banbury, Calne, Christchurch, Leominster, Malton, and two others of a similar stamp, containing, together, a population of 32,198, were each to retain the right of returning two members. Thus, sixteen members would be returned by a population of less than 33,000; while the town and neighbourhood of Liverpool, containing a population of 200,000, was to return but two. So, again, in the case of Birmingham, which contained a population of 170,000 or 180,000 souls; there, so devotedly attached were his Majesty's ministers to the ancient system of representation, that although, by the result of their own plan, they had forty franchises to dispose of, they would give no more than two representatives to the great town of Birmingham, with its 180,000 inhabitants—in short, they would give it no greater weight in the scale of representation than they had allowed the town of Malton to retain, which was saved by just eighteen persons from disfranchisement. He did not complain of this adherence to the ancient principle; on the contrary, he approved of it; but, if that were taken as the principle of this bill, it was incumbent on his Majesty's ministers to show some valid ground, some great and overbearing reason, why the metropolitan districts should be made an exception to it. If they meant to proceed according to population, and the amount of taxation paid by different places, they ought to apply the same rule to all. By the bill, certain commissioners were to have the power of incorporating and joining particular parishes with particular boroughs; but when they came to the metropolitan districts, their powers were all at once to become null and void; and Greenwich, and Marylebone, and other districts of the same kind, were to have their own distinct representatives. He had an unfeigned respect for London and Westminster—perhaps no man more; but he saw no reason why their suburban districts should not rather be incorporated with them, than allowed to have district representatives. He saw no reason why the districts in the neighbourhood of the metropolis should be made an exception to the rule which was to apply to those in the vicinity of Liverpool, Bristol, and other large towns, which had equally good claims to representation. He had now stated the reasons for which he would oppose this enfranchisement. The first proposition he wished to urge upon the House was, that in reference to the other parts of the country, the London district was already sufficiently represented. The second was, that the ancient usage of our representative system had been, to give an equal right to all places of returning two members, without reference to their population or contribution to the taxes. And the third was, that ministers had heretofore adhered to this rule—as, for example, in the cases of Calne and Manchester—the one of which they determined should retain, and the other should acquire, two members. Having, accordingly, adhered in all other cases to the ancient usage, they were bound in the present instance to show why they departed from it in favour of the metropolitan districts, and what were the peculiarities of these places which had so weighed with them as to induce them to desert their own principles. The point was, could that case be made out, which, upon a consideration of population, and contribution to the taxes, would entitle these districts to additional representatives? It could be made out, but it told against themselves. So far from these places requiring additional representatives, he thought, from their proximity to the seat of government, that they already had sufficient influence over it. He foresaw very great danger from giving members to the metropolitan districts; for looking at the particular circumstances of the great body of the constituency in communication—looking at their locality, their vicinity to the House of Commons, at the facility which they would always have of approaching the government—looking at the ready access which they would have to the reports of proceedings in this House—looking he said, to these matters, it could not be denied, that the constituents as well as the members for the metropolitan districts would have immense advantages over every other. Alluding to one of those districts—the parish of Mary-la-bonne—he might observe, that it was about to acquire two rights; because, according to the bill, if he understood it rightly, all £10 householders who had not a vote for the city of London were to have a vote for the county of Middlesex, which, added to their right of voting for the new borough, would create a double right. Now this representation, he considered, was little wanting to the parish of Mary-la-bonne. It so happened, that there were at least 100 members of parliament resident in that parish, and of these, very many had actually an identity of interest with the parish. In its select vestry there were no less than ten members of parliament, and he could appeal to hon. members present, whether these members were the least frequent in their attendance. From this he argued, that there was little danger that the interests of this district, which had virtually so many representatives, could suffer from not being enfranchised. If, however, it was deemed improper that the inhabitants of so rich and extensive a district should be left without their due influence in the general representation, why did they not proceed upon the same plan as in Lancashire and Yorkshire? Why did they not give additional representatives to the county of Middlesex? They might think they had done little in adding ten representatives to the eleven already enjoyed by the metropolitan districts, but they were much mistaken. They had deranged the balance of interests in this country more than was wise, and in a degree which would render any endeavour to adjust them hereafter a matter of almost hopeless difficulty. This balance was founded on prescription; but it was not the more unjust or the less to be respected on this account, and it produced a regularity and security which, in the practical working of the new scheme of the constitution, he feared it would not be possible to ensure. Let them not lay the flattering unction to their souls, that the whole effect of this proceeding would be the conferring of twenty-one representatives upon the metropolitan districts. It would create a new order of men in that House, which would alter in character and increase in power at each successive election. Antæus-like, the more they came in contact with their native earth, the greater would be their force, the higher their hope and vigour. Another point which might be urged was, that by this addition of town representatives they were giving an undue influence to the more active portion of the House that were desirous of changes, and that which, particularly in the present instance, was, from the vicinity, and from the aggregated nature of their constituency, more immediately under its control; for the members for towns, must of necessity be persons of more active habits than those who sat for counties; as well from the circumstances whereby they could alone recommend themselves to the representation, as from the character of their constituency. This, he thought, was no reflection on the country gentlemen. On the contrary, their indisposition lightly to alter ancient institutions and established usages, formed an admirable ingredient in the constitution of the House; and enabled it, when combined with the laudable desire of changes (let it be called) upon the part of the town representatives, for the sake of improvement, by the balance of these conflicting opinions, to approximate to, if they did not arrive at truth. But now, by taking away from the one class of representatives, and adding to the other, they were doing injury to the agricultural interests, without conferring any benefit upon the general interests of the country. Looking, he would say, for example, to the county of Middlesex, he should be inclined to conclude, that local interests and local attachments would go for nothing, but that men would be chosen, as in the case of one of the hon. members for the county to which he had alluded, for the marked line of politics they had pursued. He saw the hon. member for Middlesex selected to represent that great county, though he possessed no local connexions there, and selected indeed, evidently, for the line of conduct he had adopted in politics, which was that of watching with the greatest closeness, the expenditure of the country. He did not object to the honourable member on the fact that such had been the cause of his selection. The hon. member had only zealously performed what he conscientiously believed to be a public duty, and he was rewarded for it by the representation of the metropolitan county. The only reason for which he alluded to the circumstance, was, to show the sort of men that these metropolitan representatives were likely to be, and to mark, in consequence, the great additional influence which such men, so closely in communication with their constituents, must have in that House. There would be in this manner ten additional members for London, and the change would be most considerable. Viewing that change in its future effects by those which, so far as circumstances permitted, the prospect of reform had already produced, he must say, that he did not think it a change that was likely, upon the whole, to work well for the benefit of the country. He viewed it as a departure from the ancient usages of the country, and he could not but anticipate that it would not be for the better. He thought it would aggravate the loss the agricultural interest were about to sustain by the other parts of the bill, and that it would give an undue influence to the popular voice in that House. On these grounds, he should certainly resist giving the franchise, in the manner now proposed, to Greenwich, Woolwich and Deptford, by placing them in schedule C.

In reply to Lord Althorp, Sir Robert Peel wished the noble lord to understand, he had not intended to cast the slightest imputation on county members. Quite the reverse; all he had said was, they did not usually exert so much versatility, or desire for change, as the representatives of towns and boroughs. For this reason, he thought the provisions of this clause gave the party desiring change an additional power. He had always regarded the county members as a most enlightened, intelligent, and useful body, but they did not possess the active, restless qualities of their opponents.

On a division, the original motion was carried by 295 against 188; majority, 107.

The question was, "That Wolverhampton, including the townships of Wolverhampton, Bilston, Willenhall, Wednesfield, and the parish of Sedgeley, Staffordshire, stand part of schedule C."

In the discussion which ensued,—SIR ROBERT PEEL said, two representatives were to be given to the united districts which were to compose the borough of Wolverhampton. He therefore thought two should also be given to the united towns of Walsall and Wedgebury. They had been told, as the reason why this should not be done, that the former town had a mayor and corporation; but that was no reason why it should not be united with another town for the purpose of representation. The bill totally disregarded corporate rights or jurisdictions. Wolverhampton, they had been told, was a very large parish, with a scattered population. Regardless of these circumstances, ministers had determined to unite the whole (although there had been a difficulty, such was the nature of the population, to ascertain the number of £10 houses), and thus continue to confer on them the right of returning two members to parliament. At the same time they refused to unite Walsall with Wedgebury for the same purpose, in both of which towns the population was concentrated. The inconsistency of this arrangement was so manifest, that he hoped the noble lord would not persevere in it.

The motion was carried.

On the question, that schedule C stand part of the bill, Lord Milton moved, as an amendment, that the word "two" be inserted in the blank instead of "one."

Sir Robert Peel had already expressed his entire concurrence in the principle that every place to which the franchise was given, should return two members. He should much rather take twelve places out of schedule D, and give to each of them two members, than give one each to twenty-four places. He thought it would conduce to the internal peace of towns, if they had two members. It would prevent the clashing of interests, and remove many causes of dissension. If the motion of the noble lord were to be, that all the places in the next schedule should have two members each, that would give too great a preponderance to the manufacturing districts, which he could not agree to, but if the noble lord's motion was put into the shape he proposed, he (Sir R. Peel) would support it. The word "two" being inserted instead of "one" in the clause, then it would remain for the committee to select the places which should have two members. Of the twelve places to which he (Sir Robert Peel) would consent to give two members, Stoke was certainly one of the first. Although he did not know why his hon. friend had chosen to take this district out of its place, and discuss it there, he should vote for the motion. He hoped, that the vote would not be attributed to his Staffordshire partialities. He had already said, as a reason for desiring two members, that there was less likelihood of acrimony and party feeling in election contests where there were two parties, when each had a chance of returning a representative, than if the whole struggle was to return one. He would add another, to be found in the long list of townships, of which he would read the names. The town of Stoke-upon-Trent contained these townships:—Longton and Lane-end, Fenton Calvert, Fenton Vivian, Penkhill and Boothen, Shelton, Hanley, Burslem, with the Vill of Rushton Grange, and the Hamlet of Sneyd, Tunstall Court, Chell, and Oldcott. The very enumeration of those names, was surely sufficient to prove the advantage of having two members rather than one.

Further in the debate,—Sir Robert Peel contended, that the principles of the bill would not be departed from, by giving to twelve of the chief towns in schedule D two members, instead of the twenty-four towns one member each.

The amendment was negatived, on a division, by 246 against 145, and the original motion agreed to.

The next question was on the latter part of the third clause as follows:—"And that each of the principal places named in the first column of schedule D be a borough, and that each of the said last mentioned boroughs shall, after the present parliament, return (blank) member. The question the chairman said he had to put was, that the blank be filled up with the word "one."

Lord Milton moved, as an amendment, that the word "two" be substituted for the word "one."

In the ensuing discussion,—Sir Robert Peel, rising after Lord Morpeth, said, the hon. member who spoke last but one (Mr. Strickland) denounced the shallow doctrine of preserving a balance between the agricultural and the manufacturing interests. It might be shallow in principle, but yet it was impossible to convince one of those interests, that it would be wise to commit to the other the entire control over it. Each party would always naturally desire to be protected by its own representatives. The hon. member talked of the interests of the wool grower and the cloth-manufacturer being the same. This might be all true and very wise, but it was most extraordinary to hear it come from the very same hon. gentleman who complained that Yorkshire was not sufficiently represented, and who said, that his motive for supporting the proposition of the noble lord was, to give more representatives to the great manufacturing towns of Yorkshire. Let the hon. gentleman apply his own principle. If the interests of the wool-grower and of the cloth-manufacturer were the same, why not trust the agriculturist with the care of the cloth-manufacturer; and still further, if the principle was good for any thing, why not commit to the wisdom and management of Staffordshire, the interests of Yorkshire? He should prefer not being called upon to vote at all upon the question. If he were, however, so called upon—if the noble lord pressed the question to a division—he would support the amendment, because it affirmed an abstract proposition of which he approved—he meant the principle of double representation. At the same time he owned, that if he thought the noble lord likely to carry his amendment, he should be afraid to vote with him, because he should then expect that the same majority would transfer all the towns in schedule D to schedule C. In the abstract, he agreed that it would be better to have two members for each place, and looking at the whole as an abstract question, he was disposed to vote for the amendment of the noble lord, reserving to himself the power of saying to what number of boroughs this should be extended—that is, of saying whether twelve or twenty-four boroughs should be included in the schedule. He owned he was surprised at the argument of the hon. baronet in favour of single representation; taking, as he did, the principle, that the minority should not be represented at all. To that he was prepared to give his decided dissent. Would it be wise or politic to say, that where any great difference of opinion existed, on, perhaps, a most important public question, that the minority—which might be a very large minority—should be wholly excluded from all share in the representation? In times of peace and quiet, there might be little danger of such a principle; but times of storm and difficulty might arise. Would the hon. baronet's principle be then applicable? It reminded him of that beautiful simile of Horace—

—“Cum pæce delabentis Etruscum In mare;”

but the time might come,

—“Cum fera diluvies quietos Irritat æmnea.”

Yes, great questions would arise, with regard to peace or war, questions involving foreign and domestic policy, and in which there might be a collision between these two interests. Would it, then, be wise to adopt a system which should give either to the war party or to the peace party a predominant influence? It was very fairly said, in reference to the argument of the hon. baronet, that it went to cut up by the roots the system by which the majority was represented in that House. For instance, if there should be 501 on one side of the question, and 499 on the other, the proposition of the hon. baronet would prevent the voice of the minority from being heard. Assuredly, for all the purposes of petition and remonstrance, this was one of the most extraordinary propositions ever yet submitted to the adoption of the British legislature. The principle which he had heard urged over and over again was, that taxation ought to be co-existent with representation; and therefore it was, that, in order to secure representation to the minority, two members were selected, for it could not be done by one. The principle of giving one member instead of two was a novelty, and as such ought to be avoided. Gratuitous novelties tended to unsettle men's minds, and engender and foster a desire for innovation. It was because he wished to avoid, as much as possible, the introduction of novelties, and preferred two members to one, that he should now vote for the motion of the noble lord, whatever objection he might have to it in other respects. He wished the House to understand, that he voted for it upon that abstract principle.

In the discussion upon the question, that Gateshead, including the parish of Gateshead, Durham, stand part of schedule D—

SIR ROBERT PEEL did not suppose that the people of Newcastle would object to having three members. Newcastle would be the last place to complain of this additional honour. What did the hon. baronet (Sir M. W. Ridley) tell them? Why, that he represented Gateshead, and that he would be shorn of part of his beams, if he no longer represented Newcastle. The hon. baronet, the member for Newcastle, was the representative of Gateshead. He expressly admitted the fact. On the grounds of vast population, there was no pretence whatever for giving a new member to Gateshead. Newcastle had only 35,000 inhabitants, and Gateshead only 11,000. They were close together; they were united in trade, and, therefore, they might be well included in the same system of representation. It was too bad to aggravate the mortification of defeat by such arguments as had been advanced. A certain species of decency and decorum might have been expected in the triumph of the hon. members opposite over reason and the constitution. When they were about to disfranchise half the boroughs in the kingdom, it was strange and monstrous to hear the noble lord talk of the ancient rights of Newcastle, as a reason for preserving its franchise unaltered and unimpaired. When they were about to add adjoining boroughs to others, to sluice all the small boroughs that were not disfranchised by voters from the neighbourhood, when that even was not to be done by parliament, but by a sort of riding commission—a quarter-master-general; and when they were, by commissioners and deputies, disfranchising voters in all the boroughs that were reserved, it was to him most extraordinary that a respect for the rights of the people, should be assigned as one of the reasons for not uniting Gateshead to Newcastle. He was not aware that it would be necessary to divide the committee on any other place of schedule D; but on this place he was determined to divide, and record in a more emphatic manner than by speech, his condemnation of the conduct of ministers, in giving an additional member to Newcastle, while Chelsea, with its 46,000 inhabitants, was excluded from all share in the representation. If he stood alone, he would divide against including Gateshead in the schedule.

AUGUST 6, 1831.

On the question, that the town of Walsall, including the borough and foreign of Walsall, stand part of schedule D, Mr. Croker moved as an amendment, that the words, "and town of Wednesbury" be added.

In the succeeding discussion,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, his hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire (Mr. Littleton), had, on a former occasion, remarked, that the freeholders of Wednesbury, would rather enjoy their county franchise than be united with Walsall, and have the privilege of directly returning a member. Surely, that was no proof of the overwhelming desire of the people for the extravagant and dangerous changes to be made in this bill. The freeholders of Wednesbury, a large town, preferred the system under which they had so long been represented, to the bill of the noble lord. Walsall had only a population of 12,000.

Lord John Russell said, the population of Walsall was now 15,000.

Sir Robert Peel continued. The population was now 15,000! What, then, were they now to have recourse to the population of 1831? When the disfranchising clauses were under consideration, and rights and privileges, which had endured and been protected and upheld for four centuries, were to be assailed and destroyed, then the population returns of 1821 only were to be consulted. The gross injustice and inconsistency of such conduct must be evident to the whole country, and sooner or later it must produce its natural effect. He must remark, too, that it was wonderful to observe how strong an affection the noble lord had conceived for "municipal constitutions" since schedules A and B had been disposed of. While those schedules were under discussion, corporate rights were ridiculed; but now Walsall was to return a member by itself, because it was under one municipal constitution. Such inconsistency appeared both ridiculous and contemptible, and he should support the amendment. The argument of his hon. friend (Mr. Littleton) surprised him very much. His hon. friend had stated, that the people of Wednesbury were so well pleased with the right given to them by the bill, to vote for the county representatives, that they did not care to have a representative of their own. He was aware that it was useless to press the amendment, especially on a Saturday, unless the noble lord chose to lend a favourable ear to the representations which had been made.

The amendment was negatived, and the original motion agreed to.

AUGUST 11, 1831.

Sir Richard Musgrave presented a petition from the city of Waterford, signed by a great number of highly respectable persons, praying for an enquiry into the late affair at Newtonbarry, and also praying the House to adopt measures to disarm the Irish Yeomanry.

In a debate that followed upon the motion that the petition be printed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he regretted the importance, the undue importance, which had been given to the printing of this petition. He regretted, too, the mode in which the hon. member for Louth had thought fit to address the House. When he recollected the speech which that hon. member had made on the question of reform, and the desire he then expressed (and no doubt very sincerely), that all distinctions founded upon religious differences should be for ever abolished, it was with pain that he heard the hon. member arrogate to one particular class in Ireland the name of the Irish nation, to the exclusion of that other, and that important, though less numerous class, the Protestants of Ireland. He had before opposed the printing of a petition which cast reflections upon his Catholic fellow-subjects, and on the same ground he should now concur with those who determined to refuse the printing of this petition, which cast indiscriminate and groundless reflections on a large body of the Irish people. The petition stated, that the yeomanry fired upon the people, not only without orders, but in defiance of directions from their officers: that was not borne out by the facts that appeared in the investigation of the charge in a court of justice. After a full investigation, the charge of murder was dismissed. The case might again come forward for judicial investigation, and he thought, therefore, the House could not sanction the printing of the petition. To him it appeared wholly impossible that hon. gentlemen could believe the charges brought forward against the yeomanry. Did the noble lord (the member for Meath), who had three yeomanry corps in his county, of whose conduct he had spoken in the highest terms of praise—did he desire to give currency to such charges as were contained in this petition? It was hardly possible to believe that he could entertain such a wish. On these grounds, therefore, and on the ground that legal proceedings were either still pending, or were now likely to be commenced, with respect to the matter which was the subject of this petition, he should oppose the motion for printing it.

On a division, the motion for printing was negatived by 238 against 76; majority, 162.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

August 11, 1831.

On the motion of Lord Althorp, the House went into Committee upon the Parliamentary Reform bill for England.

The Chairman read the eleventh clause, as follows, viz., "And be it enacted, that each of the counties enumerated in schedule D, to this act annexed, shall be divided into two divisions, in manner hereinafter directed; and that in all future parliaments there shall be four knights of the shire instead of two, to serve for each of the said counties; that is to say, two knights for each division of the said counties; and that such knights shall be chosen in the same manner, and by the same classes and description of voters; and in respect of the same several rights of voting, as if each of the said divisions were a separate county."

Mr. Hughes Hughes proposed an amendment on the clause, the effect of which would be, to give the right of returning four members to the electors of the county at large, without any division of it.

In the following debate,

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that were he to consider this proposition abstractedly, and without reference to the bill, he should have the greatest objection to it. He should be sorry to see the immunities of the ancient divisions of England come to an end. When he heard the noble lord, the member for Yorkshire, on a former occasion, congratulate himself with respect to the county of York, and say, "We are in this proud situation—we are separate from every county in England; for true it is, we are to have six members, but we are to have two members for each of our old ridings, and we are to preserve those divisions that have existed since the days of Alfred; and, therefore, I object to the proposition of giving York ten members." When he (Sir Robert Peel) heard that from the noble lord, he thought it a just and natural feeling. It was one he did not wish to destroy; nor could he be surprised that any honourable man should feel an objection to a division of the limits, and the loss of the unity of his county. It was quite consistent that men should maintain those local feelings with a general feeling. God forbid they should be ever destroyed! and therefore, abstractedly from this bill, which he looked upon but as a precedent for a departmental division of the country, this proposition should have had his decided opposition. He thought it unjust to that display of public spirit which every man wished to see. And let it not be said, because there were now two nominal divisions in Sussex, that this would have no effect; for, after counties were divided into separate portions, their common feeling would be extinguished—they would be like Holland and Belgium, no longer the same. This might be derided as prejudice, but he, with the member for Yorkshire, must feel it was more. Let them look at the consequences. Let them take the county of Stafford for instance. When this division took place, he who belonged to No. 1 Stafford, would have a different interest from him who belonged to No. 2 Stafford; they would no longer have the same identity of feelings, as natives of the same county, which had before existed among them. It was true, that all this might be denounced as so much prejudice; so it was, perhaps; but, at the same time, those feelings existed, and it was a part of those feelings which had always made Englishmen so ready to defend the constitution of the country. Another provision of the bill, which he most seriously lamented was, that the division of the counties was to be effected by Commissioners, and not by the House of Commons itself. He saw no reason why the House should not undertake the task of dividing the counties. They had details enough before them. Why could not a committee of the House consider and report the facts, and the House make the final decision? He saw no reason why the House was not perfectly competent to decide on this point; and if it were so, on what constitutional grounds was the important functions devolved on another authority, without appeal to that House, of deciding what should be the future representation of England? It was a monstrous dereliction of duty, that that House—the representatives of the people—should devolve to other and extrinsic hands the office of deciding what should be the representation of twenty-five populous counties. The noble lord had said, there would not be an appeal even to the Crown itself, which would be barred from reviewing the decisions of these commissioners, however unjust. If the bill were to pass into a law, they were bound to use their best endeavours to make it perfect as far as it went; and he, therefore, thought, that they ought to make the most strenuous opposition to the appointment of commissioners, for the performance of a duty which really belonged to the House; and if it were said, that the House was too numerous a body to take this matter into consideration, his answer was, that in that case a committee of the House might be appointed, whose capacity to perform the task would be unexceptionable, and whose decision, as emanating from an authorized portion of the House, could not be called in question by the House itself. Another great objection which he had to this part of the bill was, that the House was called upon to give at once its consent to an indefinite division of all the principal counties of England, without so much as knowing whether the division was to run from north to south, or from east to west; so that, in voting for the additional members to counties, they would be, in fact, voting for something, the effect of which they could not by any possibility foresee. As he had already said, to the division of the counties, taking it abstractedly, he had the greatest objection; but when he viewed the subject with reference to this bill, at the same time taking into consideration the disfranchisement that had been inflicted on the borough system, by means of schedules A and B, he thought, that the adoption of the division of the counties was a judicious step. He had to consider in what manner he could best give that countervailing influence which should be consistent with such a measure; and he was bound to say, that he thought there were solid arguments for the division of the counties, as the means of maintaining the wrecks of aristocratical influence. He was glad to hear from the noble lord, that it was not intended entirely to destroy aristocratical representation; and he thought, that the small remains of that representation might be better maintained by dividing the counties, than by continuing them as they were at present. Those who thought the bill did not go far enough, might very consistently be hostile to such a plan; but he avowed that his reason for supporting it was, because he agreed with the noble lord, that the popular influence was greatly increased by this bill, and he thought that the division of the counties would give a kind of counterpoise. He repeated, that he never would vote for the introduction of clauses, which would render the bill inefficient, with a view of defeating it. Still he thought great improvements might be made. It was a great object with him to dispense with the necessity of employing commissioners, and to leave their duties to parliament itself. It would be a great advantage, under this point of view, if there could be an arrangement, after constituting the electoral districts of a town, to prevent any proprietor living in the town from exercising an influence in the county elections. He did not see the reason for excluding a 40s. freeholder from the right of voting for a town, and giving him a right of voting for the county. Why not, after determining the boundaries of a new town, say that all 40s. freeholders in the town, and £10 freeholders, should exercise the right of voting in the district, and not in the county, instead of telling them "You cannot vote for the district, though you may for the county." If the 40s. freeholders were allowed to exercise their elective franchise only within the new electoral districts, the necessity of riding commissioners might be dispensed with, and it would be scarcely necessary to look for £10 freeholders within the limits of a town. There was one other clause to which he had an objection. The bill gave to freeholders in counties of cities, for the first time, the right of voting for counties. In these counties of cities, the splitting of freeholds, and other practices, had led to the greatest abuses. He would call the noble lord's attention to the county of the city of Lichfield, where freeholders had a right to vote, and the noble lord knew how many annuitants had been created in violation of the spirit of the law. The bill would give to these annuitants of Lichfield, amounting to 400 or 500, a new right of voting for the county. It would be better to confine them within the county of the city, than to let them into the county. Much difficulty arose from the mode in which England was to be divided, which would throw considerable discretion into the hands of the commissioners; and it was extraordinary, that after this House had struggled so hard against the interference of another branch of the legislature with their elections, they should devolve so great a power of interference on gentlemen of whom the House could know nothing. Seeing the destruction of aristocratic influence which was to take place, from the mode in which the franchise was extended in towns, he thought that the safest course to take would be, to adopt that division of counties by which gentlemen of landed property would have their fair share of influence in the representation of counties. He owned that he had not seen any practical good effect from allowing Yorkshire to send four members for the whole county, rather than for its separate divisions; and he thought, that that county would have consulted its fair influence just as much, or more, in returning one of its own landed gentry, rather than the highly respectable individual who had since become high chancellor of England. Under these circumstances, he would vote in favour of the proposition of ministers, for the division of counties.

After some brief remarks from Mr. Gisborne, Sir Robert Peel said, they should be as much on their guard against fictitious votes in counties as in counties of towns. But on what principle were the counties to be inundated with these voters from towns? The spirit of the law was decidedly evaded by the creation of annuitants in this way. He had no objection whatever to the bonâ fide 40s. freeholders being left as they were, but he would certainly confine the new voters, and the annuitants, to the counties of towns in which they happened to be placed.

August 17, 1831.

On the House resolving itself into a Committee on the Parliamentary Reform bill for England,—

Lord Althorp moved the fifteenth clause—"And be it enacted, that for the purpose of electing a Knight or Knights of the Shire to serve in any future Parliament, for the East Riding of the county of York, the North Riding of the county of York, and the several counties enumerated in the second column of the schedule H to the Act annexed, shall respectively include the several cities and towns, being counties of themselves, mentioned in conjunction therewith, and named in the first column of the said schedule H; and that, for the like purpose, the county of Gloucester shall include that part of Bristol which is situate on the Gloucestershire side of the river Avon; and the county of Somerset shall include that part of Bristol which is situate on the Somersetshire side of the said river Avon."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the noble lord, following the hon. and gallant gentleman, had gone into questions not immediately before the committee. He concurred generally in the doctrines laid down by the gallant officer, for he believed it would tend to simplify the bill, if a person's right of voting were restricted to the district in which he resided. The 15th clause, which included towns and cities that were counties of themselves within the adjoining counties, for the purpose of county elections, was the subject now before the House, and to that he proposed to confine himself. He must, however, in the first place, thank the noble lord for his free, though somewhat tardy acknowledgment, that the discussions which had been raised on the opposition side of the House, had, instead of producing unnecessary and useless delay, furnished the ministers with many important improvements in the bill. This candid and honourable acknowledgment of the noble lord, was his (Sir Robert Peel's) answer to common-councilmen and Political Unions, who threatened them with the application of external force for the expediting their proceedings.

Lord Althorp said, across the table, that he for one had never charged the other side of the House with interposing needless delay.

Sir Robert Peel was happy to hear the noble lord again so candidly allow, that the object of those who had opposed the Reform Bill was, to make it as perfect as it could be rendered. The practical proof that the noble lord was right, was furnished by the fact, that because the House had accidentally proceeded faster than usual with the bill for one or two days, the government found it necessary to postpone a most important clause, because it had not been amended in conformity with the suggestions of that (the opposition) side of the House. He would, with the permission of the committee, make some observations upon the clause now proposed for their adoption. There were in all, nineteen corporate towns in England, and these, with the exception of the county of the city of Bristol—which was dealt with specially—were enumerated in schedule H, annexed to this bill. He wished that every gentleman would take the trouble to peruse a treatise, of singular ability and research, on the subject of towns and cities which are counties in themselves, written by Mr. Corbet. All the facts relating to the history of those towns, and all the constitutional learning bearing upon those facts, would be found stated, with great learning and clearness, in this treatise. In ten out of these nineteen corporate towns, the freeholders had no right to vote, either for the county of the town, or, if he might be allowed to use the expression, for the parent county. These ten corporate towns were Carmarthen, Chester, Coventry, Exeter, Gloucester, Kingston-upon-Hull, Lincoln, London, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Worcester. In four of them—namely, in Canterbury, Poole, Southampton, and the Ainsty of York—the freeholders had the right to vote for the parent county. In five of them—namely, Bristol, Haverford-west, Lichfield, Norwich, and Nottingham—the freeholders had a right to vote for the city, in conjunction with the burgesses. Now, although these anomalies existed at present in the rights of freeholders in these corporate towns, yet he did think, when they were overturning the ancient fabric of representation, and constructing a new one, that it would have been much better, and much more in conformity with the general principles of the constitution, to have given to the freeholders of such places the right of voting for the county of the city, rather than making them vote for the parent county. These places were, for municipal purposes, completely separated from the county surrounding them, and were, to all intents and purposes, counties of themselves. They, in general, had their own sheriffs, to whom the writ was addressed. He did not, of course, object to the parties now having a right to vote retaining their right, but to the mode in which it was proposed to confer that right on them. The circumstances of the different corporate counties might vary; in some places their limits were confined to the place where the town stood; in others they extended to some distance beyond it, but the connexion of the freeholders was generally a town connexion. This was particularly the case in those five counties in which the freeholders had hitherto possessed the right of voting for the city or town. Why were such persons to be turned over to the parent county? In Staffordshire, for instance, the greater part of the bona fide freeholders of Lichfield would be transferred from that city, wherein they had at present votes, to the county constituency for that division of the county to which Lichfield would belong. A weaver of Nottingham, with a 40s. freehold, would have a vote, and it was admitted on all sides, that he ought not to be deprived of his right; but surely it would be a much more desirable arrangement, to allow him to exercise that right for the place where he resided, and in which all his interests and connexions were centered, than to transfer him to the parent county, with which he had nothing whatever to do. And to what class of freeholders would this change be most prejudicial? Why, to the very lowest—to that class which was least able to bear expense. A 40s. freeholder was to have no vote for the town in which his freehold was situate, but was to be put to the expense of travelling thirty or forty miles to give his vote, even though an election for his own town might be going on at his door. Such an arrangement was injurious to the small freeholder, and also to the character of the county affected. It would not be said, that these counties of cities and towns were not strictly counties; for so strongly had the House felt them to be so, that when Mr. Fleming was Sheriff of Hampshire, it held, that he was not disqualified to sit for Southampton, which was the county of a city. That in itself, perhaps, was sufficient proof that the corporate counties were, in the eye of the constitution and the law, bonâ fide counties; and, in support of that position, he would quote the authority of Mr. Prynne, who stated, that the town and county of Bristol elected two representatives, who were as well knights of the shire as burgesses of that city. Even at the early period when the charter was granted to Bristol, forming it into a county, this was felt to be the case. In that charter it was expressly provided, that the city of Bristol should not be burthened with the support of more than two members of parliament, and likewise, that these two members should be considered as representing both the county of the city and the city. In those days the appetite for representation was not quite so strong as at present; and the city of Bristol apprehended, that, on its being made the county of a city it might be called upon to return four members—two for the city, and two on account of its new distinction. He apprehended, that the suggestion he was now making would be no infraction upon the principle of the bill, and, on general principles, he was convinced that the arrangement he proposed would be a strong guard against those abuses which would result from this part of the bill, as it now stood. He thought, that the freeholders of the county of a city should be allowed to vote at elections for the city, in conjunction with the householders, and the freemen who were allowed to vote under the bill. He was sure that great abuses would result from the present arrangement, which sent the freeholder of a town to vote for the parent county instead of the town. If a man attached a piece of ground, ever so small, to his warehouse—a garden, for instance—he would thus acquire a right to vote for the county. This facility of creating a double right of voting was pregnant with abuse, and he had no doubt, that Birmingham and Coventry would find means to return the county members, as well as the members for the town. The noble lord said, that he would prevent any such effect, by adopting the system in force with respect to freeholders in Ireland, and require a £10 qualification. That was an important alteration in the bill, and afforded another proof, if proof were wanting, of the utility of suggestions made, and discussions raised, by this side of the House. It should be recollected, that in the first instance the principle of the bill, as stated by those who had brought it forward, was to confine the right of voting in towns to resident voters. In fact, non-resident voters were altogether excluded in the first draft of the bill. An important alteration had, however, been subsequently made in this portion of the bill—an alteration, of which he entirely approved, but which, at the same time, it could not be denied, was a complete departure from the original principle of the bill: that alteration, consisted in making the possession of counting-houses and warehouses confer the right of voting in towns, and by means of such an alteration, the right of voting was given to 3,000 or 4,000 non-resident voters in Manchester alone. He thought that his Majesty's ministers did wisely, in admitting such persons to the right of voting in towns; but when they did so, why would they not admit freeholders also? He was of opinion, that it would greatly simplify the bill, if the general principle should be adopted, to confine the right of voting accruing from the possession of property, to the district in which that property was situated. Let the freeholder, whose freehold is in Lichfield or in Newcastle, vote for the member for Lichfield or Newcastle, and not for the member for Staffordshire or Northumberland.

The chairman having read the first part of the sixteenth clause, to the following effect:—"And be it enacted, that from and after the end of this present parliament, every male person of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, who shall be seized of and in any lands or tenements for life"—and several members having spoken on the subject, and the Solicitor-general having explained it,—

Sir Robert Peel thought—the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman, and the admissions which it contained, were calculated to prove beyond question, that the House had assented too hastily to the preceding clauses of the bill. He should not, in the present instance, go through all his objections to the clause, as he considered one of them alone would be sufficient—namely, that relative to the grant of the franchise in counties to the leaseholders for terms not exceeding seven years. He would say, that persons holding land for such short terms, and attempting to improve such property, were, by their own attempt at improvement, bound to the land under any terms, and consequently, more at the control of their landlords than tenants-at-will were. The hon. and learned gentleman admitted, that the clause was defective, and that it must be amended. It was now evident, that the subject was one of infinite importance, and he thought the objection of his learned friend, the member for Cockermouth, so conclusive, that it was impossible they could go further without the most mature deliberation. Was it not, then, most desirable, that in the present position of affairs, with their numbers thinned by the absence of those who were suffering under indisposition from long and protracted attendance to their duties, they should not persevere in attempting to pass the bill at present, but at once adjourn for three months, in order to give time for the perfection of this bill, by a better consideration of its details. He would put it, therefore, to the noble lord (Althorp)—and he never was more serious in his life in making any proposition than at that moment—whether it would not be advisable that he should to-morrow propose an adjournment of three months, in order that the House and the government might be better prepared by due deliberation to make this their new constitution perfect. It was no impeachment of the judgment of the government, that they were compelled to adopt such a course, and that they were not found to have proposed a measure of such importance, containing so many complicated details, and involving so many different interests, free from all defects. He trusted, therefore, that the noble lord would at once make up his mind to relieve them from further attendance, and that, pressed as they were by so many other questions of foreign and domestic policy, the ministers would not continue, night after night, urging forward a bill, which, it now appeared, according to their own admission, was so defective, that it required many considerable amendments. He would not enter at length into an examination of the clause; but he might observe, that while the hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-general) seemed to be of opinion that no practice of creating fictitious votes would be resorted to, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after describing the extent to which the multiplication of freeholds had been carried, was, along with the learned gentleman, about to put it in the power of landlords to resort to similar abuses with reference to leaseholds. It would operate to increase all the abuses of electioneering influence, and tempt men to divide their property. If it were asked, how were they to do this? he (Sir Robert Peel) would say, their agents could do it. A landlord had merely to empower his agent to grant leases, or give the agent himself a lease, and the whole machinery was put in motion. He must object to the ambiguous manner in which the clause was worded, and to the bad effects which the clause, as it regarded seven years' leaseholders, would have on the situation of the tenants-at-will in the midland counties. He concluded by repeating his hope, that the government would at once put an end to these difficulties, by proposing a long adjournment, to give time for a better consideration of the various provisions of the bill.

After some discussion, the question was then put on the first part of the clause and agreed to, including the amendment of Lord Althorp, which made it as follows:—
“And be it enacted, that from and after the end of this present parliament, every male person of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, who shall have any lands or tenements for life.”

BELGIC NEGOTIATIONS.

Sir Richard Vyvyan, after a speech of considerable length, moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a copy of all the Protocols and other documents relating to the conferences on the affairs of Belgium, which can be laid before this House without detriment to the public service."

Lord Elliot briefly seconded the motion.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he was not at all surprised that his hon. friend, the member for Oakhampton, should think, that the time was at length arrived when it was fitting that the House of Commons of England should have its attention drawn to the state of its foreign policy. He was not surprised that at a period when the popular assembly of every country in Europe which possessed a popular assembly, had its attention exclusively directed, not to the changes to be made in its constitution, but to the momentous circumstances which threatened the independence and the tranquillity of Europe;—he was not surprised, he said, that at such a period—when the ministers of other powers imposed upon themselves no reserve, either as to their own intentions or the intentions of other nations, an independent member of parliament, contracting no official responsibility, and labouring under no official obligations, should think, that the time was at length arrived in which it was incumbent that the only popular assembly in Europe silent on such interesting topics should not be the British House of Commons. No doubt, premature disclosures were liable to many objections, but complete indifference, perfect passiveness, and utter silence, were also liable to still greater objections. From such a course of proceeding, there might be presumptions drawn, which were false and unfounded—as, for instance, that we were silent because we were indifferent to the drama now transacting in Belgium. The position in which he stood upon this subject, was rather different from that occupied by his hon. friend, the member for Oakhampton. His noble friend, the Foreign Secretary, acting upon his responsibility as a minister, declared, that he was precluded by paramount considerations of duty from entering into any discussion upon this subject. His noble friend had stated, that whatever might be the suspicions which hon. members might entertain as to the course of policy pursued by his Majesty's government, whatever might be the imputations cast upon it, and whatever the arguments on which those imputations might be founded, he was precluded by a sense of duty to his country from entering into any discussion, and even from vindicating himself against any charges which might be brought against himself personally. If his noble friend thought, that at this critical moment all discussion should be avoided, his noble friend was justified in avowing such to be his opinion, and in taking his determination accordingly. If his noble friend told him, that the time was not yet come in which he could vindicate himself from the charges of his opponents, without making disclosures which might prove injurious to the public service, then, as there would be something ungenerous in making such charges against him, he would bridle in his own feelings, and abstain from calling for certain explanations, which he thought his noble friend ought, under other circumstances, to be called upon to give. Whilst he abstained from making such charges, he was bound, in justice to himself, to say, that in the whole of the annals of England never was there a case which so imperiously demanded explanation—never was there a series of transactions on which, at a period when the members of his Majesty's government should be released from the obligations of secrecy, it would be more incumbent upon them to vindicate themselves from the charges which had been brought against them. He could not forget, that there was, in support of the statement of his noble friend, the peculiar hour, the critical moment, at which this discussion was taking place. His noble friend had complained of the numerous questions which had been put to him from the opposition side of the House, on the subject of our foreign policy. They originated in an anxious desire to promote the interest and the honour of the country, not in any desire to embarrass the government [a laugh from an hon. member on the ministerial benches]. The hon. gentleman who smiled at this observation, might have unlimited confidence in his Majesty's government; he might not think it necessary to put any question to his Majesty's ministers; but it never was the practice of Englishmen, at moments like the present, to shrink from seeking such information from the government. Did the hon. member think, that at a moment when the king of France had declared, in the speech with which he opened his chambers, that the tricoloured flag was floating on the walls of Lisbon—at a moment when the French army was occupying the fortresses in the Netherlands—at a moment when, according to appearances, the only signs of military activity on the part of the British government were directed against its two most ancient allies, Portugal and Holland,—did the hon. member think, that such was the moment at which men who were anxious for the interests, and still more anxious for the honour, of England, were to be precluded from seeking information from his Majesty's government? His Majesty's ministers had always a right—and he did not mean to find fault with them for exercising the right—to refuse an answer to the questions which might be put to them [a cry of "Order, order"]. The hon. gentleman gave him an interruption, by his repeated calls for order, far more annoying than the disturbance of the gentlemen whom he wished to control.

Mr. Hume rose to order. It was not his hon. friend that had created this interruption; it was the cheering of some of the right hon. baronet's friends, who were then sitting around him.

An hon. member, seated just below Mr. Hume, likewise rose to order. He felt it necessary to state, that the disorder had been occasioned by the proceedings of the hon. alderman below him, the member for the city of London.

Mr. Alderman Wood rose to contradict the assertion which had just been made. He had interfered because he had heard an hon. member say with an oath, that "such language never yet came out of the mouth of man."

Sir Robert Peel would feel obliged to hon. members if they would replace him, without further delay, in the place in which he was before the interruption. He had been stating, that his Majesty's government had a right to refuse an answer to any question, an answer to which would be injurious to the public service, but then it must not be inferred, that because a question was put, it was put from a desire to embarrass the proceedings of government. What was the moment which his hon. friend had selected to put his question? It was the moment when France was occupying a part of the fortresses of Belgium. Whatever anxiety and alarm that occupation was naturally calculated to excite, he had heard, with the greatest satisfaction, the statement of the foreign secretary—a statement which he had not yet heard contradicted or qualified, and which he hoped would be verified in fact—namely, that the government had received assurances and engagements from the king of France, on which they could rely, that on the withdrawal of the Dutch troops from the Netherlands into Holland, the French troops would also be withdrawn from Belgium into France. That, he understood, was the answer given on a former evening by his noble friend, the foreign secretary, to a question which had been put to him by the member for Oakhampton. He trusted, that there would be no necessity to qualify that answer hereafter; but such being the answer of his noble friend, he was convinced that the period was so critical as to afford strong presumptive confirmation for his noble friend's declaration, that he was precluded from entering into any discussion. At a period so critical there was no medium between no discussion and discussion the most ample. He should, therefore, follow the example of his noble friend, and abstain from pressing questions to which an answer could not be conveniently given. He should not follow his hon. friend near him (Mr. Baring) into the consideration of the policy which was adopted towards Belgium and Holland in the treaties made at Vienna in the year 1815, nor of that which his hon. friend fancied ought to be pursued towards them now; for he could not enter into that discussion without transgressing the principle which he had just laid down. Even if this were the time for entering into it, he (Sir Robert Peel) should not have thought it necessary to enquire into the conduct of the king of Holland towards his Belgian subjects; for though he conscientiously believed, that the conduct of the king of Holland had been universally animated by a desire to promote the prosperity and happiness of Belgium, and that, for the fifteen years of his rule, the inhabitants of Belgium had enjoyed a degree of prosperity, liberty, and independence which they had never enjoyed at any past period of their history—yet, as a separation had been decided on between them, and as any attempt to re-establish the union between them would be impracticable, in consequence of all the powers of Europe having concurred unanimously with Belgium and Holland, that a final separation should take place between them, he did not see any necessity for arguing on this occasion respecting the conduct of the king of Holland. He would avow, at once, that he placed no confidence in the statements of the speech of the hon. and learned member for Kerry. He considered him as a prejudiced, a most prejudiced witness. He recollected the attempts which had been made by that hon. and learned member to effect a similar separation between two other countries nearer our own homes.

Mr. O'Connell: "No."

Sir Robert Peel: The hon. and learned gentleman said, No:—why, had not his war-cry for some months past been for a repeal of the union between Great Britain and Ireland?

Mr. O'Connell admitted, that he had advocated the repeal of the union, but not the separation of the two countries.

Sir Robert Peel: The repeal of the union then was admitted. Why, all that he had charged the hon. and learned gentleman with was, that he had made attempts to dis sever the union now happily existing between the two countries; and when he heard the members of his Majesty's government cheering the hon. and learned gentleman, and rejoicing in the success of the attack which he had made on the king of Holland, he (Sir Robert Peel) could not help recollecting, that those very ministers had vindicated their renewal of the yeomanry force in Ireland upon the principle that the hon. and learned gentleman was attempting to repeal the union. How did he know, that the details into which the hon. and learned gentleman had entered, were correct? Had he not heard the hon. and learned gentleman speaking of facts which he stated had occurred in Ireland within the last fourteen days, and declaring that an officer of the Crown had publicly avowed, that he had received instructions in some late prosecutions, to challenge every Roman Catholic or liberal Protestant who might be called to serve on the Jury? A more grievous charge against a government could not be made; it was an accusation of interfering with the pure course of justice; but as soon as he heard it, he declared his conviction that it was, as it had subsequently proved to be, utterly without foundation. If the hon. and learned gentleman could in one case state that which he believed to be true, but in which the hon. and learned Solicitor-general for Ireland had proved, by incontestable documents, that the hon. and learned gentleman was misinformed—if the hon. and learned gentleman was so imperfect a witness on circumstances occurring so lately in Ireland, and in the profession, too, to which he himself belonged—might not he infer, that his statements of what occurred in a foreign country were, to use the phrase of the hon. member for Middlesex, all facts, but much exaggerated?

Mr. Hume asserted, that he had not used the words "much exaggerated," he had only said "highly coloured."

Sir Robert Peel persisted, that the words used by the hon. member were "much exaggerated." He recollected them well. The hon. member said "much exaggerated," but he would take the version which the hon. member now gave; for it would suit his purpose equally well. What a miserable dispute was this about words! As if a high colouring were not a statement by which a false impression was given to facts which were admitted to have occurred! But, said the hon. member for Middlesex, "There is not a word in the speech of my hon. and learned friend, the member for Kerry, from which it could be inferred that though he deemed him a bad king for Belgium, he deemed him a bad king for Holland." Why, what a notion must the hon. member have of regal qualifications, if he could suppose a king, acting on the principles imputed to the king of the Netherlands, could be a good king for any country. The hon. and learned member, however, not content with his observations on the king of Holland, had thought proper to taunt and insult him and his late colleagues: and had called that side of the House where they were seated the "Refuge for the destitute!" What right, what ground had he to apply to them those taunts and insults? They might have been driven from office, and some of them might feel the loss of its emoluments, but there was not one amongst them who would have condescended to repair his shattered fortunes by wringing a contribution from the pockets of the wretched peasants of Ireland. They had taken no course in their public life which ought to have exposed them to the taunts and insults of the hon. member. They had never acted in defiance or evasion of the laws, and made that defiance or evasion turn to their own personal interest and profit. They had abstained from offering any insults to the hon and learned member for Kerry, and there were circumstances in his own case, of a personal nature, which ought to have prevented him from offering insults to others as unprovoked as they were undeserved.

Sir Robert Peel hoped his hon. friend did not for a moment suppose, that he had meant to question the propriety of bringing forward the motion; he only meant to say, that ministers were justified in withholding any documents the publication of which might be of inconvenience to the public interests.

The motion was withdrawn.

AUGUST, 18, 1831.

On the House resolving itself into a committee on this bill, a lengthened discussion ensued on various clauses; Mr. Wason referred the committee to clause fifty-five, where it was said, that "if any returning officer shall wilfully contravene or disobey the provisions of this act, or any of them," and contended, that refusing to execute the duty of returning officer would be a disobedience; he apprehended, therefore, that the effect would be, that the returning officer would be liable to any penalties the House might think proper to inflict for the non-performance of his duty.

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought there was a distinction between the returning officers whose names were in the bill and those to be hereafter named by the sheriff. The former were already responsible officers—the latter might be any body whom the sheriff pleased. It would be competent for the sheriff, under this bill, to compel any man he pleased to select, who resided in any borough, to perform the duties of a returning officer. There was no example of any one man having such a power; and therefore it was necessary that this power of appointment should be regulated in detail. To propose to prop up the defects of the law by calling in the aid of privilege, was one of the most strange pieces of legislation he had ever heard of. In order to render the clause complete, some words and some additions were necessary, to prescribe the duties, both of the returning officer, and of the sheriff with regard to him. It was monstrous to give such a power to any one person as this bill would give to the sheriff under its provisions. A sheriff might prevent any man from leaving the country. This was so unjust, that it was plain the clause required to be re-considered; and he implored the hon. and right hon. gentlemen opposite to re-consider the clause.

Mr. Serjeant Wilde, Sir Charles Wetherell, Sir Edward Sugden, and the Attorney-general having spoken on the subject,—

Sir Robert Peel said, that the main question was, whether the sheriff ought to have the power of appointing returning officers, and whether the person so appointed would be under an obligation to perform the duties of that office. The duty of the returning officers was, to revise the list of borough voters, insert and expunge names, and rectify mistakes. This was a very extensive power; and he thought it would be admitted, that committing irresponsible power to any person without appeal was extremely dangerous. That irresponsible power was, however, given by the present clause to the sheriffs of counties; and it might so happen, that a particular sheriff had a son or a brother a candidate for the representation of a borough, while he had the uncontrolled appointment of the returning officer. He also observed, that the returning officers would not be chosen from a class of persons much elevated in life, because any one who could show, that he was qualified to represent a borough would be exempted from filling the office of returning officer. And there was hardly any person liable to be called on to serve, who might not in some way or other obtain a nominal rent-charge or some other qualification, to exempt him from the office. It was true, that the sheriff was selected, on the recommendation of judges of assize, by the privy council, and that one of his duties was, to be returning officer for a county; but there was a great difference between such an appointment and the appointment of the returning officer to a borough by a single person. It used to be the case in Ireland for the Lord-lieutenant to have the unrestricted appointment of sheriffs; but so much inconvenience was found to arise from this practice, that an alteration was made in the system, and the judges of assize were directed to nominate three individuals, from whom the Lord-lieutenant chose one as sheriff. Upon the whole, he thought the power given by this clause to the sheriff was likely to lead to great abuse. There was another part of the bill which he wished to bring under the notice of the noble lord opposite. It was provided, that in case of the sheriff being incapacitated from doing his duty by sickness or other similar accident, a successor should be nominated, but no provision was made for the case of the sheriff being imprisoned for debt.

A number of clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed; the committee to sit again next day.

The Chairman having read the eighteenth clause—"And be it enacted"—that notwithstanding any thing herein before contained, no person shall be entitled to vote at the election of a knight of the shire to serve in any future parliament in respect of any house, warehouse, or counting-house, or of any land occupied together with a house, warehouse, or counting-house, by reason of the occupation of which respectively he, or any other person, shall be entitled to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in parliament for any city or town, being a county of itself, or for any other city or borough."

And Lord Althorp having proposed to amend it,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL could not help thinking, that, even on the noble lord's own showing, it was advisable to confine the right of voting to towns in which the freeholds are situated. The noble lord said, that there were two objections to it: first, that it would destroy the simplicity of voting, and next, that it would let in non-resident voters. In his opinion, it would greatly tend to simplicity, and he asserted that the argument as to non-residents did not fairly apply. In all cases of residence, the freehold gave the right of voting for the electoral district, and not for the county. How much more easy would it be to practise frauds under the system now introduced, than by confining to one person the right of scrutiny? With respect to the necessity of enforcing the principle of residence in towns, it was admitted, that the same objections which applied to non-residents voting in towns, applied in some degree to non-residents voting for counties. If it was not right, and if it was expensive, in towns, to bring non-resident freeholders to the poll, it was equally so to bring them to the poll in counties. The advantage, therefore, derived in this view, from obliging the freeholders in towns to vote for the county was not all clear gain. Again, the same objections which applied to non-resident freeholders, applied still more strongly to non-resident freemen. A non-resident freeman had often no connection whatever with the place for which he was entitled to vote. The right was usually acquired by birth, marriage, or servitude; and there was no necessity for his having any property within the town. It was also to be considered, that the non-resident freeman was often a person in a very low class of life, and, therefore, open to bribery, and very often not able to bring himself to the poll. In any one town, however, that could be named, there were very few small freeholders—he meant freeholders under £10—who were able to go to any expense in bringing themselves to the poll. The question, however, was, whether the small freeholder, within the limits of a town, had not a greater connection with the town member, than with the member for the county. The freehold generally partook closely of the nature of the town. Whatever promoted the interests of the town, usually promoted the interest of the town freeholder, and he had more ready means of access to, and communication with, the town member than with the county member, who resided, perhaps, at a distance of forty miles. Believing, therefore, that the simplicity of voting would be assisted by making the alteration, and that the evils of non-resident voters would not be increased by it, it had his support, and he hoped it would be adopted.

The original clause, as amended, was agreed to.

CITY OF DUBLIN ELECTION PETITION.

AUGUST 23, 1831.

Mr. Robert Gordon, after a speech of considerable length, proposed the following resolution: "That it also appears by evidence adduced before the select committee, appointed to try and determine the merits of the petition of James Scarlett, William M'Cleary, and others, severally complaining of an undue election and return for the city of Dublin, that official influence has been unduly exercised by the Irish government, at the said election, and that such influence, as exercised by Captain Hart and Baron Twyll, in favour of the late members, was a gross violation of the privileges of the House, and in direct contravention of the Law of parliament, as laid down in the resolution of this House of 1779."

The Attorney-general moved as an amendment,—

"That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be pleased to direct the law officers of the Crown in Ireland to institute an investigation into the system of fictitious freeholds which prevailed in the city of Dublin, and to take such steps to remedy the evil as might seem to them most in accordance with the ends of public justice."

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he wished to make an observation directed only to the order and form of the proceedings of the House—a matter of consequence when they were about to direct legal proceedings to be taken—and he would not be seduced by the hon. and learned member for Kerry, who complained of delay, to enter either upon the effect of the noble member for Buckinghamshire's amendment, or any other subject not connected with the question before the House. The simple matter was this:—The House had come to a resolution, that the system of bribery and fictitious voters at the Dublin election was a direct infraction of the law of the land. It was too late to consider that now, as it had passed; and it was proposed to follow it up with another—indeed, with two. One was to the effect "that the law officers of the Crown in Ireland be directed to bring to justice such persons as were guilty of bribing voters." An amendment was proposed, to leave out the last part of the resolution, and to substitute for it words to this effect:—"such persons as were concerned in illegal and unconstitutional practices." An objection had been raised at the other side, that it was not the practice of the House to give vague directions, but to select the persons to be brought to justice. He did not believe that to be correct; for it would be recollected, that, on an important occasion, the House had voted an address to the Crown after the riots of 1780, in very general terms. It was very vague, and only requested that his Majesty would direct the law officers of the Crown to prosecute any persons who were engaged in, or instigated those riots. It appeared to him (Sir R. Peel), however, that there was a considerable objection to the wording of the resolution. The hon. and learned civilian wished it to be so shaped as desiring the law officers to prosecute all such persons who might have been guilty of illegal and unconstitutional practices. It was too much to assume the guilt of any individual. Every prosecutor, it was true, might assume that, and the Attorney-general, no doubt, did so in every prosecution; but the House of Commons ought not to do any thing, or use any expression, which might prejudice any parties; and he would, therefore, rather see the word "charged" substituted for "guilty." Now, if they had voted, that the system pursued was an infraction of the law, surely it was too little that one class only should be punished, and it would be better if all who were charged with this infraction were directed to be prosecuted. In the first place, he thought it would be better to use the common phrase "prosecute" than "bring to justice;" and he would, therefore, suggest, that the wording be altered thus—"That the law officers of the Crown be directed to prosecute all such persons as shall appear liable to be prosecuted for an infraction of the law."

In reply to Lord Althorp, who thought it better that the resolution of the House should be confined to such offences as, being positively illegal, admitted of a legal remedy, leaving the mere moral offences, for which there was no legal remedy, out of consideration at present,—

Sir Robert Peel maintained, that, if the noble lord acted on this moral view of the case, perjury might pass unpunished, and yet it ranked in the eyes of most people much more as a moral outrage, than the illegal practices of giving or receiving bribes.

The House divided on the amendment moved by the Attorney-general, corrected as follows:—"That the law officers of the Crown be directed to institute prosecutions against the individuals who were charged with having given bribes to certain electors for the city of Dublin, during the late election." Ayes, 224; Noes, 147—Majority, 77.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

August 25, 1831.

On the House resolving itself into a committee on this bill, the chairman proposed the £10 clause.

Lord Althorp having stated the meaning and object of the clause,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that he would adopt the suggestion made by the noble lord, (Lord John Russell) and postpone the discussion on the principle of this clause, until all the amendments had been made in it, and the question were put, that these amendments stand part of the clause. His reason for doing so was, that he did from his heart sympathize with the noble lord as to the delays interposed to the progress of this bill, not by its opponents, but by its supporters. All the gentlemen opposite were ready enough to hasten over the destructive part of the bill, but now, that they had come to the constructive part of it, more strenuous advocates for delay could not be found. He saw from the Order-book, that one gentleman who had supported the second reading of the bill, had given notices of four amendments upon it; at least, he saw the name of Mr. Hughes Hughes appended four times to such notices. As he saw no prospect of getting through these amendments, at their present rate of progress, in four months, he would postpone to the period which he had before mentioned, the discussion upon this clause. He rose, at present, to ask the noble lord opposite a single question. At present, to qualify a renter of a house of not less than £10 yearly value to vote, all the rent which shall have become due from him previously to the 1st day of July in each year must be paid up. Now, in the midland counties of England, the practice was, not to collect the rent, legally due at Michaelmas-day and at Christmas-day, until three months after each of those periods; and if this clause were passed in its present shape, the result of it must be, to alter the present practice; for no tenant would have a vote unless he should have paid up his rent on the day it became due. This would cause great dissatisfaction in the country; for it would deprive the tenant of a privilege to which he had been long entitled. He wished to know whether this point had attracted the attention of the noble lord.

Lord John Russell replied in the affirmative.

Sir Robert Peel continued:—the clause as amended will open a wide door to bribery and fraud. For the candidate will only have to pay up the poor-rates and taxes of an insolvent tenant, who is in arrear to his landlord, to entitle him to vote; by such means corruption will prevail to a greater extent than ever before known.

Lord Althorp was of opinion that the objections of the right hon. baronet did not apply to the present arrangement.

Sir Robert Peel replied, that people were generally aware sometime beforehand when a general election would take place. The consequence would be, that when a general election was expected, the candidate would pay up the voter's rates and taxes for the previous half year. He would thus get the voter's name on the registry, and the voter might then forget to pay up the rates for the next half year. Besides, he wished to know whether it would be bribery for a candidate to pay up a voter's rates and taxes which were due a year before the election? He believed that a committee of that House had decided, that to pay up the rates and taxes of a voter, to enable him to vote, was not bribery.

After a long discussion, and in reply to a speech from the Attorney-general,—

Sir Robert Peel said, if the persons to whom the hon. and learned gentleman alluded, formed a class of most respectable, independent, and intelligent voters, how did it happen, that a bill had been laid upon the table of the House, within six weeks from the time when the hon. and learned member was speaking, to disfranchise the whole of them? At what period had it been discovered that they were a most respectable and intelligent class of voters? Government proposed to give them the right of voting by the original bill; but after two months of mature deliberation, the ministers became alarmed at the work of their own hands. They had created a power, endowed, like the monster in the novel, with tremendous physical energies, and when they found that they could not subject those energies to the control of moderation and reason—then it was that they shrunk appalled from their own success, and tried to destroy what they could not command or regulate. They then came down with another bill, by which they attempted to establish a more discreet class of voters—namely, those who paid their rent half-yearly. The real reason of the re-introduction of the clause which gave the right of voting to the intelligent and respectable class described by the Attorney-general was, that government had excited hopes which they were afraid to disappoint. That was the reason, and the only reason which could justify the re-insertion of the clause, but ministers shrank from acknowledging it. When the government had once told the artisans of Birmingham and Manchester, that they should have the right of voting, and when the proposition had become the subject of discussion in the Political Unions, it was not to be wondered at that ministers found it difficult to retract the original concession. But why did they not maturely consider their plan in the first instance? Why did they first propose to give the right of voting to hundreds of thousands of persons, as the Attorney-general said, and six weeks after bring in a bill to take it away, and then once more propose it again? In his opinion, there was no class of voters more likely to be under the influence of their landlords, than that of tenants who were liable to be ejected at a week's notice. Manchester, Norwich, Birmingham, and other large towns would have a sufficiently large constituency without this extension of the franchise. Those tenants in towns were in a very different position from that of the agricultural tenant-at-will, who could retain his farm six months after notice to quit had been served upon him. It by no means followed that a constituency of 30,000 voters, ensured a freer or fairer representation of a populous town, than a constituency of 3,000 or 4,000. Weekly tenants were to be found chiefly in the manufacturing towns, in which there existed already a numerous independent and respectable constituency, who would be overborne by the numbers of the class which the clause enfranchised. The introduction of that class into the constituency would deprive property and intelligence of their due influence, and, so far from improving, it would have the effect of degrading the representation. The powers which were given to Assistant-barristers and to Overseers, and the system of annual registration projected by the bill, would give rise to yearly electioneering contests; there would be no such things as an election without a contest, and the contest would be renewed at every returning period of registration. The system which this clause would establish, would be an imitation of the elective franchise of the United States in its worst feature. The House had been told, that the government was now, for the first time, to be carried on without patronage. For his part, he (Sir Robert Peel) thought it just and reasonable, that the government should exercise some influence over those whom it employed. On that account, he had not voted on another night against the government of Ireland, for doing, in a very clumsy and undisguised way, that which other governments before them had done with more discretion. Although he could not go the whole length of saying with the right hon. Secretary for Ireland, that preceding governments in Ireland had done the same thing to the same extent, yet he thought it natural and proper that they who were the immediate servants of the government should support the government. The House, by their vote the other night, had sanctioned, at least had positively refused to condemn, the exercise of such influence by the executive government. On what pretence, then, would it refuse to the possessor of property the exercise of a similar influence? The occupiers of houses paying a weekly rent, would be peculiarly subject to that influence. They were under the immediate control of their landlords, from the facility with which they could be dispossessed of their holdings under him. On all ordinary occasions they would be passive instruments in his hands, and in times of popular excitement, when ordinary considerations of interest were overborne by the clamour and fever of the moment, their whole weight would be thrown into the scale of vehement democracy. He could see no public advantage, either in the ordinary, or the extraordinary, agency of such a class of voters.

After various divisions, the clause was adopted.

August 26, 1831.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee,—

The Chairman said, the question before the Committee was, that, at line sixteen of the old print of the bill, and at lines thirteen and fourteen of the new print of clause twenty-one, the following words should be omitted—"Shall, by reason thereof, acquire a vote in the election for any city or borough, if such rent shall be payable more frequently than once in every half-year."

The Question, "that these words be omitted," was carried.

The next question was, that the following words in their stead should be inserted down to the end of the clause—"Shall, by reason thereof, acquire a vote in the election for any city or borough, if, by any agreement or contrivance, or by virtue of any act of parliament or otherwise, the landlord shall be liable to the payment of the rates for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; but that, nevertheless, where, by virtue of any act of parliament, the landlord shall be liable to the payment of such rates, it shall be lawful for any such tenant to claim to pay such rates, and upon his actually paying the same, to acquire the same right of voting as if his landlord had not been so liable for such rates. Provided also, that the premises, in respect of the occupation of which any person shall be deemed entitled to vote in the election for any city or borough, shall be the same premises, and not different premises respectively occupied for any portion of the said twelve months; and that, where such premises, as aforesaid, shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to vote in respect thereof, in case the yearly value or yearly rent of such premises, or the yearly value in respect of which they shall have been assessed or rated as aforesaid, shall be of an amount which, when divided by the number of such occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than £10 for each and every such occupier, but not otherwise."

A discussion ensued as to the meaning of the clause under consideration, and after some explanatory remarks by the Attorney-general, Lord Althorp, and Lord John Russell,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, as he understood the question, it was, that if a man paid £10 a-year rent and upwards, that gave him the right to vote, but this general right was qualified by certain local acts of parliament, which rendered the landlords of houses under the value of £18 liable for the rates. Whatever these might amount to, the tenant ought to have a corresponding reduction of his rent. If he claimed, by the payment of these to be entitled to vote, and if he did not obtain this, he was hardly treated. Considering these circumstances, he wished to suggest the propriety of adopting the system pursued with respect to the qualification for jurors, which was assessment to the poor-rates at a certain sum. If that were done, great difficulty would be overcome. He said this, however, assuming one uniform qualification for voting to be desirable, which he certainly did not think. God forbid an uniform right of voting ever should be established—but if it were, liability to the poor-rates was the simplest and the best criterion. Another test might be had in the number and size of the windows of a house. The clause, as it stood, would give a man who paid a certain amount of rent and taxes, a vote; but another who paid more to his landlord in rent, than his neighbour paid in rent and taxes, would have no vote because his landlord paid his rates.

In reply to Mr. Serjeant Wilde, who was of opinion that a number of topics had been introduced into the discussion, which were quite irrelevant to it,—

Sir Robert Peel said, that upon a clause, by which they were constituting a new election system for the country, it would be very hard if they were to be tied down, during the discussion, to the strict letter of it. He wished to know whether the noble lord, in framing this bill, had at all considered how far the 59th George III., c. 12, operated upon this particular clause. This clause gave a right to vote to every £10 householder, on the ground that such individuals formed a sufficiently enlightened part of the community to entitle them to that privilege. The preamble to the 19th and 20th clauses of the 59th Geo. III., expressed a very different opinion of them. He would take the liberty of reading it to the committee. It was as follows:—"Whereas in many parishes, and more especially in large and populous towns, the payment of the poor-rates is greatly evaded by reason that great numbers of houses within such parishes are let out in lodgings, or in separate apartments, or for short terms, or are let to tenants who quit their residences, or become insolvent, before the rates charged on them can be collected; and it hath been found in many instances the persons letting such houses do actually charge and receive much higher rents for the same, upon the ground and expectation that the occupiers thereof cannot be effectually assessed to the poor-rates, and will not be charged with, or required to pay, such rates, and do thus obtain an advantage to themselves, &c. &c.: for the remedy thereof, be it enacted, that the owner or owners of any house, being the immediate lessor of the actual occupier, which shall be respectively let to the occupier thereof, at any rent or rate not exceeding £20 nor less than £6 by the year, shall be assessed to the rates for the relief of the poor." The act of the 59th George III., which was a deliberate act of the legislature, evidently looked upon those £10 householders as any thing but an intelligent and a respectable class. The very next clause of that act was as follows:—"Provided also, and be it further enacted, that the goods and chattels of every occupier of any such house, &c., which shall be found in and about the same, shall be liable to be distrained, and sold for raising so much of any such rate or assessment, being in arrear, as shall have become due during the occupancy of the person or persons whose goods and chattels shall be so distrained, &c. Provided also, that every occupier who shall pay any such rate or rates, or upon whose goods or chattels the same or any part thereof shall be levied, shall and may deduct the amount of the sum which shall be so paid or levied out of the rent by him and them payable, and such payment shall be a sufficient discharge to every such occupier for so much of the rent payable by him as he shall have paid, or as shall have been levied on his goods and chattels of such rate, and for the costs of levying the same." So that the law of the land was, that if the occupier claimed to pay the rates, or paid a sum of money to redeem the goods distrained, he could clearly do it. Now, if the occupier of a £10 house paid the rates, he had the right by law to deduct them from his rent; and if he did deduct them from his rent, he ceased to be a voter. There was evidently a collision between this clause and the 59th of George III. He was convinced that, unless some arrangement were made between these two conflicting clauses, much confusion would arise. He hoped, that before the noble lord brought up the usual report on this clause, he would make some arrangement which would remedy this anomalous condition of the bill. The rates of course must be paid; but he was inclined to think, that the tenant who, on the faith of such an understanding as that supposed by the hon. member opposite, paid the rates for the purpose of voting, would have a right to recover from his landlord, or the poor tenant would have no protection; and if he made the deduction, in some cases he would lose the right of voting. Suppose, for example, a tenant had a rent of £13 a year, for a house on which his landlord was liable to £4 a year rates; if he deducted these he would lose his right of voting. Another difficulty appeared to him to be this. A case might arise in which a landlord had made a general composition for paying the rates for an entire row of houses, so that it would become a hard matter to ascertain the amount of rate which had been paid for any particular house as a portion of the whole.

Mr. Serjeant Wilde said, that, as the clause was now worded, the rates must be paid in order to entitle the tenant to claim his vote: but the tenant of a £10 house, as well as the tenant in joint occupancy, would be entitled to recover from the landlord, if he paid the rates beforehand for the purpose of voting. It frequently happened, however, that there were a number of small houses, of different sizes, of which the landlord paid the rates of all in one sum, by composition. Now, the only difficulty he felt was, as to the ascertaining of the proportion of rates in such cases, so that the tenant might be able to recover his vote, for he was inclined to believe, that in all cases the tenant could deduct the amount from the landlord, or recover it at law.

Sir Robert Peel was afraid that this bill, which used the words of the 59th George III., would give the tenants who paid their rates to secure a right of voting, a title to deduct that sum from their rent. It would be better, therefore, to give them this right of voting on payment of the rates expressly under the present bill.

The clause as amended was ultimately agreed to.

ACCELERATION OF THE REFORM MEASURE.

AUGUST 27, 1831.

Mr. Hume concluded a speech of some length by moving, "That in this present session of parliament, all orders of the day, set down in the order book for Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, shall have precedence of all notices set down for those days."

Mr. O'Connell seconded the motion.

Lord Althorp was of opinion, that if the House were really to commence business at five o'clock, and sit till one or two in the morning, business would proceed as quickly as if the House sat at one in the afternoon. He hoped the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished he was able to exercise some influence on his side of the House. That influence would then be exerted in favour of the suggestion of the noble lord, for he never saw business conducted in a manner which more entitled the individual conducting it to every deference. As it was quite evident, that the sittings of the House were protracted to this season with reference exclusively to the reform bill, he would take the liberty of earnestly advising every gentleman, as far as he felt it consistent with his duty, to avoid every other business which should interfere with the progress of the reform bill. He considered that it was not only convenient to members, but advantageous to the public interests, that gentlemen should be enabled to return to their seats in the country. That object could only be effected by devoting as much attention as possible to the reform bill. He hoped, that the example set by ministers would be followed, and that the suggestion to curtail the debates should be adhered to. He had not the slightest objection to meet at twelve o'clock; but it was a dangerous experiment to make, and a great interruption of existing habits. Even now the House got sometimes so bewildered with the introduction of words into the clauses—particularly when the chairman had the first edition of the bill, and the rest of the House the second—that it was often impossible to know what words were to be introduced. If the House closed its sittings at eight o'clock in the evening, four or five hours would be lost, because the habits of the House had been formed upon the plan of sitting till one o'clock. Let the noble lord persevere in the course he was now taking—let him appeal to the House in the way he had now appealed to it—and he (Sir Robert Peel) would venture to say, that not a single member would be found to oppose him.

The motion was withdrawn.

AUGUST 30, 1831.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the House resolved itself into a committee on the English Reform bill.

The chairman said, the committee had proceeded in clause twenty-two as far as the words "be it enacted," and it was proposed to insert the following after those words:—

"That no person shall have a right to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in any future parliament for any city or borough, except in respect of the occupation of such premises as hereinbefore mentioned: Provided always, That notwithstanding any thing hereinbefore contained, every person now having a right to vote in the election for any city or borough (except those enumerated in the said schedule A) in virtue of any corporate right, shall retain such right of voting during his life, in the same manner as if this act had not been passed, and shall be entitled to vote in such election, if duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained; and that every person now entitled to take up his freedom in any such city or borough in respect of birth, marriage, or servitude; and every son of a burgess or freeman of any such city or borough, such son having been born previously to the passing of this act; and every apprentice bound to any person in any such city or borough, previously to the passing of this act, shall be entitled to acquire the right of voting in the election for any such city or borough, either as a burgess or freeman, or in the city of London as a freeman and liveryman, in the same manner as if this act had not been passed, and shall enjoy the right so acquired during their respective lives in the same manner as if this act had not been passed, and shall be entitled to vote in such election, if duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained."

Mr. Edmund Peel proposed as an amendment, "To secure to the future resident freemen by birth, servitude, and marriage, a permanent continuance of their ancient and valuable rights."

Sir Adolphus Dalrymple seconded the amendment.

Mr. D. W. Harvey, in opposing it, stated his opinion that it originated with the enemies of reform, who had taken that course in the hope of entangling the friends of the bill, and impeding the triumph of the great measure itself.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, nothing could be more unjust than the charge made against his hon. relative, by the hon. member for Colchester. His hon. relative, so far from having any wish to take advantage of a thin House, had given long previous notice of his motion. He had, at an early period of the session, intimated his intention of bringing the subject before the House, and on Saturday last he had waived his right to bring forward the amendment, on account of the small number of members in the House. It was not, therefore, the fault of his hon. relative if more members were not present to take part in this discussion. The question was, whether a case had been made out for disfranchising freemen? and he must say, that a more miserable defence had never been set up for any measure of injustice than for the present. The hon. member for Colchester had borne testimony to the character of the freemen of that borough—had referred to the privations and hardships which they were ready to undergo in the honest exercise of their hereditary privilege—and yet he expressed his determination of voting against them. The hon. member for Exeter, and the hon. member for Gloucester, and the hon. member for Newcastle, gentlemen who were friendly to the bill, had all borne testimony to the independence of the freemen of their respective boroughs; but hon. members, in spite of such authority, were ready to give up the cause of their constituents. It was not true, as had been argued, that if this clause were rejected, his Majesty's ministers ought to relinquish the bill. They would not be justified in relinquishing the bill on such grounds. The amendment would not give the right of voting to non-residents. It confined the franchise only to resident freemen, who had obtained their freedom by marriage, birth, or servitude. He was unwilling to forfeit the franchise of those who had done nothing whatever to deserve the forfeiture, and who were described by all the members who had spoken, as persons of great respectability and independence. The hon. member afforded them the consolation that their conduct might be an example to the £10 householders. A fine example indeed! They have exercised their privilege with integrity and honour—and what is their reward? That they are to forfeit it for ever! He had said last session, that it would be a great hardship to exclude altogether from the franchise those persons who rented houses under the value of £10; and, notwithstanding the sneers of some hon. members who talked of an endeavour to enlist the discontented in favour of the opposition to the bill, he retained the same opinion. It was an error to sever altogether the connexion which now existed between that House and the humbler class of voters—unwise to brand all below a particular line with disqualification; it was a great hardship, too, on the excluded class—many of whom, in country places, were men of better education than those of the same rank of life in populous cities, and the day would yet come, when they would step forward and declare, that they were not satisfied, and claim the restoration of their rights. It was the argument of the supporters of the bill, that this class was advancing in intelligence, and why then exclude them now, when they are capable of understanding the injury, from all participation in the constitution? He was not for an indiscriminate admission of any class of voters, but he was for the maintenance of existing hereditary privileges, particularly when those privileges were possessed by the humbler classes of society. We had an hereditary monarchy, an hereditary aristocracy, and hereditary rights to property. We defended all these with the utmost pertinacity, but we had no scruple in confiscating the hereditary privileges of freemen. Beware of the precedent you are establishing. You cannot forfeit one class of hereditary privilege, though it be the humblest, without shaking the foundation of all. Independently of considerations of justice, there were considerations of policy to recommend the preservation of the corporate right of voting. It would tend to diminish the force of that objection which had been urged to the uniformity of the franchise established by the bill. He hoped he should have the support of the Attorney-general for the amendment; for the hon. and learned gentleman on a former occasion had argued, in discussing the 21st clause, that the more numerous the constituency, the more likely were they to be independent and incorruptible. The effect of the bill would be, to reduce the number of voters, in some instances, from 1,500 to 400, and in others, even so low as ninety-six. He was sure, therefore, that the Attorney-general could not, on his own principles, agree to such a reduction. The privilege was not prized by the present possessor so much on his own account, as on account of the hereditary right which the father transmitted to his children; on that ground, and not on any sordid principle, the loss of this privilege would be severely felt. The ministers had tried, but could not purchase the consent of the freemen to the forfeiture of the birthright of their children, by protecting their own existing interest in the franchise.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1831.

The House went into a committee on this bill.

On the 24th clause being read, Mr. Hume objected to it on the ground that it gave power to the grand jury to raise money by loan for the purposes of these works, and moved an amendment, the effect of which would be to secure the repayment of the money in five years instead of ten.

On the amendment being put,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought, that as some alteration was to be made in the grand jury system, it would be better to wait till then before they granted a sum of £500,000 to be placed at the disposal of the grand jury, which was, at present, an evanescent and irresponsible body. At the same time, he thought that, in legislating for Ireland, they often made three holes in attempting to mend one. He wished to see the nature of the system to be substituted, for at present he viewed the expediency of granting money to grand juries in Ireland, to be expended on public works, with some doubt. He was more anxious to grant money for Ireland than for England, because it was more wanted; but he wished it to be expended on some sound principles of economy.

Mr. Sheil having expressed his opinion that public works, wherever they had been carried on in Ireland, had produced great public benefits,—

Sir Robert Peel said he was of the same opinion. He had not intended to vote against the clause. If the alternative were offered him, either to reject the clause, or let it stand as it did, he should adopt the latter, much as he disliked the intrusting this grant to grand juries. He thought it would be an improvement of the clause to substitute five years for ten.

The committee divided upon the amendment: Ayes, 43; Noes, 81; Majority, 38.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1831.

Lord John Russell moved that the Order of the day for the third reading of the English Reform bill be read.

The motion being agreed to, the order of the day was read.

Lord John Russell then moved that the bill be read a third time.

On a division the numbers were:—Ayes, 113; Noes, 58; Majority, 55.

[So sudden and unexpected was the division, that about eighty members, amongst whom was Sir Robert Peel, were shut out. Their entering the House immediately after the motion was disposed of, occasioned considerable laughter].

Lord John Russell then proposed the following clause, to be added by way of rider to the bill: "And be it enacted, that if a dissolution of the present parliament shall take place after the passing of this act, and before both Houses of parliament shall have voted addresses to his Majesty, praying his Majesty to issue his royal proclamations as herein before mentioned, in such cases such persons only as would have been entitled to vote in the election of members to serve in a new parliament in case this act had not been passed, shall be entitled to vote in such election, and the proceedings at all such elections shall be regulated and conducted in the same manner as if this act had not been passed; but if a dissolution of the present parliament shall take place after both Houses of parliament shall have voted such addresses as aforesaid, and before the last day of April, in the year 1832, in such case such persons only shall be entitled to vote in the election of members to serve in a new parliament, for any county, part, riding, or division of a county, city, or borough, as would have been entitled to be inserted in the respective lists of voters for the same, directed to be made under this act, if the day of election had been the day for making out such respective lists; and such persons shall be entitled to vote in such election, although they may not be registered according to the provisions of this act, any thing herein contained notwithstanding; and the polling at such election for any county, or part, riding or division of a county, may be continued for fifteen days, and the polling at such election for any city or borough, may be continued for eight days, any thing herein contained notwithstanding."

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished to call the attention of the House to one or two objections which struck him to the present clause. That such a clause was necessary he was ready to declare, but that the present one met the difficulty of the case, he could not so readily admit. In the first place, it struck him that it placed, on the chance of a refusal of the House of Lords to concur in a proposal made by the House of Commons, the actual nullifying of the operation of the bill altogether. For what did the clause propose? That if a dissolution take place before "both" Houses shall have agreed to a specific address, to be founded on the report of the district-division Commissioners, such and such things shall take place. Now, suppose the House of Lords should not approve of this report, and therefore should withhold its assent from the proposition for an address, was it not plain that for every practical purpose the bill would be negatived? Now, this objection was not met by the present clause, which, indeed, was based on the assumption that "both Houses" would, as a matter of course, sanction the report of the Commissioners. It was true, he was ready to admit, the chance of their disagreeing was very remote—that the difficulty which he was pointing at was very improbable; but still it was possible, and if it occurred would be fatal to the bill, supposing the general measure to have been in the mean time approved of by the Lords and Commons, and that objection were not conquered. The second objection was of still more force. The clause provided, that after the "last day of April, 1832," should a dissolution take place, either by a demise of the Crown, or the exercise of the prerogative, that the right of voting shall be just as if the bill had passed into a law. Look to the results of such an arrangement. In such a state of things, they would have neither the votes under the existing system, nor the constituency which the bill was intended to provide, but would be placed in this strange position—that they would be obliged to receive the vote of every man who presented himself, and said he rented a £10 house. The bill provided, that a strict registry, with a very complex machinery, should be preliminary to the right of voting; that, in fact, no man could be entered on the list of voters who had not been duly registered, and undergone every proper scrutiny, as to his qualifications, before the registering officers. But the clause was founded on the fact, that no such registry had taken place: that was an extraordinary state, and any person might vote, whether he were registered or not. One right of voting was by occupancy; and if the votes were not registered, how could it be known that the claimants actually had such a right? The supposition was, that no registering of the new votes had taken place which would create difficulty, and there could be no enquiry whatever as to the validity of the claims. Every man who supposed he inhabited a house of £10 rent, or which would be assessed to the poor-rates, would claim a right to vote. He would tender his vote, and there would be no means of controlling or refusing him, and no means of checking his assertion that he lived in a house rated at £10. All enquiry, then, would be set aside, and every person who brought forward a claim must be allowed to vote. Admitting the necessity of some provision like the present clause, he could not support it, because he considered the first part of it as very clumsy, and the latter part of it as very objectionable.

The clause was agreed to, and added to the bill by way of rider.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1831.

The Order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate upon the third reading of the English Reform bill having been read,—

A discussion ensued, in which Sir Charles Wetherell denied the right of the Crown to suspend the issuing of writs to all places enumerated in schedule A, and concluded by moving as an amendment that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow.

The Speaker having put the amendment from the chair,—

Mr. Crampton offered some remarks by way of explanation, and was followed by Lord Althorp, who said it was a most unusual course, and almost directly at variance with the usages of that House, to stop the progress of a debate for the purpose of calling upon his Majesty's ministers to give an explanation of any point upon which any hon. member might conceive certain opinions to have been propounded.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, it now appeared that the opinion of the hon. and learned gentleman, the Solicitor-general for Ireland, was not in unison with that of the noble lord who held the principal place in his Majesty's government in that House, but that, on the contrary, the noble lord considered the doctrine to which his hon. and learned friend had referred, an unconstitutional doctrine. Whether it were strictly legal the noble lord did not take upon him to say. But, when the first minister of the Crown in that House declared, that the maxims advanced could not be defended as constitutional, he conceived that the object of his hon. and learned friend was answered, and that he might very well, with the permission of the House, withdraw his motion. The hon. and learned gentleman complained of the unkindness of his hon. and learned friend. Why, undoubtedly, all motions referring to the opinions of individuals might have an air of unkindness; but could the hon. and learned gentleman suppose, that any thing but a paramount sense of duty had induced his hon. and learned friend to bring the matter forward? He admitted that, generally speaking, it was not usual to make the members of a government responsible for the opinions of their subordinates. But this was a question of prerogative, and one upon which the ministers themselves would be the legitimate advisers of the Crown. When he heard the hon. and learned gentleman, in the second version of his opinion, declare, that the Crown had the power, in concurrence with the House of Commons, to suspend the writ for any place it pleased, he could not help saying, that if such were constitutional doctrine, they held every right and every privilege, however important, at mere sufferance. But let the House not proceed further in an interruption of the great question before it. He thought his hon. and learned friend had done what was perfectly just and proper, in eliciting the declaration which had been made by the noble lord, and, that declaration having been made, the necessity of his hon. and learned friend's motion, and of any further discussion upon it, were prevented.

of the debate, I will, if the House will lend me its attention, dismiss the notice of every subordinate and extrinsic topic, and proceed at once, without a laboured preface or superfluous apology, which only consume time, to the consideration of the capital and paramount interests that are involved in this discussion. I pass by the exciting topics of the French revolution—I say not a word on the details of the bill—they have been treated already with consummate ability; and of all the objections which I have to this measure, the smallest of them is—that it is impracticable. One preliminary observation I must make, in response to the sentiments declared by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If in this debate, from this side of the House vehement or angry expressions have been occasionally used, they have been used without the desire to inflict pain on the feelings of our opponents, and if that pain has been felt, it is now shared by him who gave it. If, on the other hand, attacks of at all a personal nature have been made upon us, they are now buried in that oblivion which extends, we trust, over our own casual warmth or intemperance.

I proceed at once to those two great questions which throw all others into the shade. First, what are the motives for making the greatest practical change that was ever deliberately made in the constitution of any country; and secondly, what are the prospects of real and substantial good to be effected by that change? When the noble lord (Lord Althorp) told us that he was about to make a speech of more than ordinary length, I did think, notwithstanding all our past disappointments, that the time was at length arrived when his Majesty's government would give us some satisfactory explanation on these heads—that, instead of merely repeating, that we must pass the Reform Bill—that the people require it—that we must yield to their wishes—I did expect to hear, even at this eleventh hour, first, a calm exposition of the practical evils and grievances endured by the people of England; next, a demonstration that those evils and grievances, the existence of which was so established, were fairly attributable to defects in the constitution of the government; and lastly, that there was a reasonable prospect that the projected change in the constitution would provide a remedy for the evil, and redress for the grievance. I have heard nothing of the kind from the noble lord. His speech was little more than a desultory answer to cavils and objections that have been made to the details of the bill.

The noble lord says, the bill makes no change in the constitution of the country—that it leaves untouched the sovereign authority, and the functions of the House of Lords; and he consoles us by telling us that, after the bill has passed, we shall have, as we had before, the King, the Lords, and the Commons. But what avails it to retain the name and the form, if the essence and the substance be lost? Will the Crown, will the House of Lords, continue to possess the legitimate independent authority which the constitution assigns to them? If they will not, they become unsubstantial pageants, unreal mockeries, that serve no purpose but the purpose of delusion. The names and the forms are to be retained! And when was it that power was usurped—whether that usurpation was effected through the ambition of single men, of oligarchies, or of popular assemblies—when was it that names and forms were not retained? And for what purpose? Why, to ensure the success of the encroachment, to avoid too violent a shock to the prejudices and feelings of the governed—to pay a dishonest homage to those instincts of our nature, which rally round ancient institutions, involuntary and unreasoning affections. What tyrant in ancient history—what successful soldier in modern times—what democratic body, aiming at the monopoly of power, has been foolish enough to neglect the outward observance of these politic decencies? Not Cromwell—not Buonaparte—not the popular assembly in France that framed the Constitution of 1791. That assembly professed their respect for monarchy, and their devotion to the person of their king, and while they did this—

And placed a barren sceptre in his gripe;”

thus mocking him with the emblems of a power, the substance and reality of which were transferred to themselves. This bill does not violate the forms of the constitution—I admit it, but I assert, that while it respects those forms, it destroys the balance of opposing, but not hostile, powers: it is a sudden and violent transfer of an authority, which has hitherto been shared by all orders of the State in just proportions, exclusively to one. In short, all its tendencies are, to substitute, for a mixed form of government, a pure unmitigated democracy. It may be said, and said with truth, that it is easy to assert this, as it is easy to deny it, and that mere gratuitous assertion, unaccompanied by proof, is worth nothing. Proof we cannot have—we cannot demonstrate the future consequences of new institutions—or of changes in those that exist; but this at least cannot be denied—that all great changes in government are of uncertain issue—that the tendency of popular assemblies, in an equal degree at least with other depositories of power, is to increase their own authority, and that the facilities for that increase are peculiarly great. And it does, in my opinion, admit of clear and unquestionable proof—that the effect of this bill is, to make a most extensive change in the whole system of government—first, by a positive addition to democratic influence—and, secondly, by a removal of those checks by which such influence has been hitherto balanced and controlled. What is the character of the change we are about to make? It is not a change limited by the necessity of the case; we are not content with the destruction of nomination boroughs, but we act as if we were seeking pretences for wanton innovations—as if we preferred change, not for the good it effected, but for the principle it established. Granted, for the sake of argument, that nomination boroughs must be disfranchised—but why alter the constituency of every county, every city, every borough, without exception, in the United Kingdom? Why enact that the ancient boundaries and limits of almost every place must be changed; and why give authority to a score of roving commissioners to make that change in every place, if they shall so think fit? These unnecessary innovations, not required by any principle of the bill, make of themselves, quite independently of their practical operation, a change in the temper and spirit of the people: they sow the seeds of perpetual restlessness; and they involve the certain consequence—that this cannot be a final measure.

This bill, I repeat, gives an enormous exercise to democratic influence. It does this by the character of the constituency it establishes, and by the removal of every existing check on popular passion, without the substitution of any equivalent control. We double the weight in one scale, and as if that were not sufficient to destroy the equilibrium, we make a corresponding deduction from the other. The constituency of towns is to consist of £10 householders. Objections have been made to this right of voting on account of its uniformity. It certainly is not uniform. You take an absurd test of property and intelligence, and you just invert the principle on which it should be applied. In the small town, where a general right of voting might be exercised with comparative safety, you limit the right. In the small town, house-rent is low; weekly tenancies scarcely are known; and many a respectable and intelligent man occupies a house which is neither rated nor valued at £10. But in the large, overgrown, manufacturing town, there, where you might with ease have constituted a very numerous, and at the same time a respectable and intelligent constituency—there, where house-rent is high, where the worst part of the press has the greatest influence—where there is the facility for clubs and combinations—there you overbear the weight of education and property, by admitting to the right of voting every mechanic who may pay 3s. 10d. a week for his habitation. This very man, who has so little substance that his landlord will not trust him with longer than a weekly occupation, whom the magistrates will not accept as bail because they do not consider him in the light of a resident householder, is to have a privilege, which numbers and combination will make an exclusive one. I will do the government the justice to admit, that they saw the danger of their own enactment; they tried to retract—they made the effort to exclude the weekly tenant—but they were soon rebuked by a higher power; were made to apologise for their inadvertence, and compelled to restore the weekly qualification, notwithstanding their admission of its danger.

Having, by the right of voting thus established, given almost a predominant weight to democracy, you studiously exclude, at the same time, every counter-vailing influence. In estimating the reduction of that influence, you must not look to this bill alone, but must consider the effect of those other bills which are to change the system of representation in Ireland and Scotland. In Ireland that system, as originally founded, did not overlook the necessity of guarding by special precautions the interests of property, and the interests of the Established Church, as opposed to numbers, and to the religious tenets of the majority. So modified, that system did operate, in some degree, as a practical check upon democratic influence generally. That system, though the absolute necessity of new precautions was admitted three years since—was admitted almost as a condition of the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities—is now to be totally abandoned. The Scotch representation is to be changed; it, too, was a practical check upon democratic influence. I say not whether it was a check wisely contrived—I do not contend that it must be necessarily continued because it served that purpose—I only assert the fact, that it did operate in the manner I have described; and that the removal of that check, without the substitution of an equivalent, increases the power on which it established a certain degree of control.

The influence that was exercised by peers, not as peers, but as possessors of property, through the nomination boroughs, is to be utterly annihilated. So rapid is the progress of the principles to which this bill is subservient, that doctrines that were repudiated at the commencement of this discussion are now openly maintained. It was said at first, that all that was sought was to destroy the illegitimate authority exercised by the House of Peers. It was then contended, that by the original theory of the constitution, the two branches of the legislature ought to be perfectly independent—that all influence exercised by the House of Lords in this House ought to be carefully excluded—and the express reason given for this exclusion was, that the Lords had a co-ordinate authority with ourselves. But now a new doctrine is maintained—a doctrine extending far beyond the present case—which teaches the House of Lords, that they, like ourselves, must conform to the popular will—that they hold no independent authority—or at least, that if they dare to exercise it, it is exercised at the peril of their order; and it was reserved for this night to hear, and to hear from an officer of the government—from a sworn legal adviser of the Crown—that there is not only a power, but a strict legal and constitutional right, to legislate without the intervention of the Lords. I am not surprised at the manifest incredulity of a great portion of the House. They did not hear the speech of the Solicitor-general for Ireland, and they certainly will not believe, without having heard it, as we did, that the law-officer of the Crown maintained, that if it should please the House of Commons to address the Crown to omit the writ of election to any number of places specified in the address, the Crown would be authorized, without reference to the House of Lords, to omit the writ, and thus remodel the House of Commons at his own discretion. One exception from its principle the Solicitor-general did make, but that exception was limited to Milborne Port—the nomination borough which he himself represents. His doctrine was, I admit, utterly disavowed and repudiated by his colleagues—but what must be the change already made in the temper of men's minds, and their views of the constitution, when a learned and estimable man, specially selected to advise the Crown on questions of constitutional doctrine and prerogative, can gravely and deliberately maintain, in spite of statute laws to the contrary, that the House of Lords is a cipher, and that we and our constituents, if we should displease a majority of this House, incur the risk of perpetual disfranchisement at the pleasure of the sovereign!

There remains, as a check upon democratic influence, the influence of the Crown. That influence is already so diminished, as far as patronage is concerned, that it scarcely tells in the scale. Even the prerogative of the choice of its own ministers, though nominally left to the Crown, is confined by this bill within the narrowest limits. The Crown will not be able to appoint to high office any man who may maintain an unpopular opinion—who may shrink from the trouble or expense of a contested election—who may despise the arts by which popular favour is frequently acquired—or may dislike the exhibition of a hustings. The single circumstance that you make every election, without exception, a popular election, has a tendency to affect the practical working of the government, and to diminish the authority of the Crown in respect to the choice of its ministers, in a degree, the amount of which it is difficult to calculate.

Here I close this part of my argument, the object of which has been to show, that the substantial change made in the constitution of this country, whatever deference there may be to forms, is one of immense and perilous extent—that it is a change entirely in favour of democratic influence, effected by the double operation of positive addition to that influence on the one hand, and the removal of all opposing and counterbalancing power on the other.

Surely there is tremendous hazard in this change—why do we incur it? Give us the satisfaction of feeling that we are justified in making this great experiment—that there are some evils, felt or impending, from which we shall escape—some good, some real and substantial good, which we may reasonably hope to attain. To repeat to us night after night, that the people demand this change, and that, whether for good or evil, it must be made, is any thing but satisfactory to a rational and dispassionate mind. We are here to consult the interests, and not to obey the will of the people, if we honestly believe that that will conflicts with those interests. It is to invert the relation of the people to their representatives, if we are to exclude all exercise of our unfettered judgment, all calculation of probable consequences, and to yield without resistance, and against our reason, to the prevailing—perhaps the temporary—current of popular feeling. If the object sought were a definite one—if we could estimate the just extent and value of the concession—we might have the less reluctance to the grant; but we fear that our first advance will be on a declivity, that our first resting-place will not be a secure one; we fear, that the prophecies of good may not be realized, that we may have to contend hereafter with the suggestions of defeated hopes and mortified pride, unwilling to admit an error, too prone to attribute failure not to the extent, but to the limited character of the first innovation; and to insist on the progress of the mouvement, as indispensable to the accomplishment of its object. Where is the madman that would refuse compliance with these demands of the people, on any ground of private interest—of the loss of borough influence by this peer or that great proprietor—on any ground, in short, but the honest one, of rational doubt, whether the change required is for the general and permanent good? If that doubt be sincerely entertained, it cannot be satisfactorily resolved by the vain repetition, “The people will have the bill, and you must pass it.”

I propose to review those arguments in favour of this measure which have been mainly relied on in the course of the present debate. They are almost exclusively confined to one speech, the speech of the member for Calne (Mr. Macaulay), who felt that, for decency's sake, something more was wanting than a mere appeal to the number of petitions, and the general demand for the bill—and who, from his acuteness and eloquence, was wisely selected to supply the deficiency.

One hon. gentleman who preceded him (Mr. Hawkins, member for Tavistock), made an observation which I will notice before I examine the argument of the member for Calne. He said, in a speech which, by the way, coming as it did from a man of great ability, and therefore considerable authority, was an example of eloquence which I hope will not captivate the reformed parliament. The age of concocted witticisms is past, time is too precious for laboured antitheses, and long strings of elaborate and frigid conceits. The hon. gentleman was profuse in his attacks upon us; we do not deprecate his wrath, we only entreat him to visit us with some more intelligible and less tiresome infliction.

The hon. gentleman argues that there are anomalies in the present system of representation, which are revolting to reason and good sense; that there may, he admits, be anomalies in the new system; but as they are fewer in amount, and less in extent, than those discoverable in the old, therefore we who cling to the old have no right, on the score of anomaly at least, to object to the new.

I answer, in the first place, that no system of government, no institution, must necessarily be condemned on account of apparent or even actual anomalies. A mixed government is an anomaly in the eye of him who is a professed admirer either of absolute monarchy or a pure democracy. A mixed government implies the necessity of mutual checks and controls on opposing elements. The check and control, abstractedly viewed, may be, and probably is, an anomaly; but viewed with reference to its object—to its influence on the general working of the system of which it is a part—it may not be open to condemnation—nay, so far from it, it may be an inherent part of the system, and an indispensable condition to its successful operation. The more complicated the system, the more mixed the relations which enter into the frame of it, the more caution is necessary in determining the real character and value of apparent anomalies. In the case of simple institutions—the existence of very striking anomalies—of objections, which would appear à priori to be insuperable—is any thing but an argument for their destruction, nay, the very anomaly itself is sometimes of the essence of the institution. Not an hour since, the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared his admiration for the trial by jury, and was indignant with some one who doubted the love and veneration of the whole body of the people for that process of judicature. And are there no anomalies in the trial by jury? Conceive the case of an educated and intelligent man, versed in the principles of jurisprudence, but knowing nothing of their practical application to any state of society. Tell him there is a country, in which every question of life and death—of all heavy penal afflictions—of almost all controversies about property and civil rights—must be determined by twelve men selected by chance, each of whom calls his God to witness that he will give his verdict according to the evidence. Tell him, that in that country the twelve men, so constituted judges, must be unanimous, that no sentence can be inflicted, no right decided without it, and that the mode of bringing about unanimity is by the process of confinement and starvation of the judges. Will he believe that this is the system extolled by the noble lord as perfect in practice, and endeared to a civilized and enlightened people by the actual experience of its result? Is hereditary monarchy no anomaly? “Of all forms of government,” observes Gibbon, “it presents the fairest scope for ridicule. You cannot relate,” he says, “without an indignant smile, that, in a country teeming with the bravest warriors and wisest statesmen, the government of a nation descends to an infant in a cradle. But,” he adds, “our more serious thoughts will respect a useful prejudice that establishes a rule of succession independent of the passions of mankind; and experience overturns those airy fabrics of government, devised in the cool shade of retirement, which confer the sceptre on the most worthy, by the free and incorrupt suffrage of the whole community.” It is clear, too, that an hereditary aristocracy must share the fate of hereditary monarchy, if mere anomaly and speculation, apart from experience, were to be decisive of the question of their existence.

But, says the hon. gentleman, if there are anomalies in the old system, why may not there be anomalies in the new? There may; but we require a reason for them, and we require it the more, if the anomalies admitted into the new system are at variance with its own principles. There is this distinction between them and the old. They have no prescription to plead in their favour—they must rest for their defence on reason, and reason alone; they have no hold on the feelings and affections of the heart; they have derived no charm from the mellowing hand of time. The anomalies of antiquity are to the anomalies of yesterday what the hereditary honours of a Russell or a Howard would be to mine, were I to present myself to the House of Lords with a new patent of peerage—the reward or the condition of my support of this bill of reform.

I return to the argument of the hon. member for Calne (Mr. Macaulay). He says, and says justly, that we must not denounce the reform bill because it cannot fulfil extravagant expectations of good to be derived from it. He says, there is much evil and much distress which are beyond the reach of political institutions—that government has no power in these days to feed the hungry with miraculous supplies from heaven—and that we must submit with patience to privations and disorders for which there is no remedy. But if all this is true of the reform bill, it is true of the present constitution. There is evil—notorious and admitted evil—but the question is, not whether it exists, but what is the proportion in which it can be fairly imputed to defects in the system of representation, and what is the prospect that reform in the representation will be the cure for it? The hon. gentleman has attempted to solve this, by far the most important problem. He has not contented himself, as many others have done, with the mere argument—“The people will have the bill, and therefore it must be passed; there are anomalies, and therefore they must be removed;” but he has attempted to show, that there are actual evils and grievances resulting from the present constitution of the House of Commons, and that reform is the proper remedy for them. Now, there is satisfaction in reasoning with an opponent who takes this as the true ground of defence of the bill; and the hon. gentleman is fairly entitled to demand, either an answer to his arguments, or the admission that they are well founded. Let us, therefore, take his list of practical evils, and examine whether they can be fairly imputed to the want of reform, and whether they are likely to be removed by the grant of it.

First, says the hon. gentleman, what we desire is that there shall be an open field for the exertions of industry, facility for the accumulation of property, and security for the enjoyment of it when accumulated. Now, I never heard it denied, that, under the institutions by which this country has been long governed, there existed, and in a very marked degree, that facility and that security. There have been complaints of too rapid accumulation; of too great a monopoly of wealth; but I never heard the complaint, that there was any obstruction to the most successful development of industry. As for the security of property, there seems to have been in the past times at least, as much confidence on that head as there is likely hereafter to be, should the present bill pass into a law.

The hon. gentleman then complains of monopolies, and says a reformed parliament will ensure the destruction of all monopolies, and the establishment of free-trade, and the removal of commercial restrictions. Why, Sir, of all the measures that for the last ten years have occupied the unreformed House of Commons, these have been the most prominent. They have been brought forward, and have been completed mainly through the exertions of those who were hostile to reform. There has been opposition, no doubt, strenuous opposition to the progress of some of the measures that were founded on the principle of commercial freedom. When Mr. Huskisson proposed to remove the restriction on the silk manufacture, he was encountered by the most vehement opposition; and I well recollect a speech delivered by Mr. Canning, which inflicted on one of his opponents a memorable castigation, and which compared the spirit in which that opponent acted, to the same hostility to all improvement which dictated the persecution of Galileo, and worked the downfall of Turgot. But who was the opponent? Was he an anti-reformer? No, but a strenuous parliamentary reformer—the gentleman (Mr. John Williams) who, only last night, made a very vehement and able speech in favour of this very bill. There seems then no necessary connexion between the support of reform and the support of liberal principles of commercial policy. I, with many other persons hostile to reform, have supported those principles—I still adhere to them—unshaken in my support of them. But, suppose they have not been carried far enough—suppose the crying evil under which this country is now suffering is the want of free-trade—let me ask, is that the prevailing opinion? Is the public outcry just at present for more free-trade? Does the learned gentleman really think that the new constituency of £10 householders, is precisely the class which will insist on the free importation of foreign manufactures? Will he enquire from the glove-makers of Worcester, or the ribbon-weavers of Coventry, or the persons employed in any other manufacture in any other town, whether they attribute the dulness of trade, the lowness of wages, or any one of the privations which they may occasionally suffer, to the want of more free-trade? In this case then, first, I deny the existence of the evil; and secondly, if it exist, I deny that reform will ensure the remedy.

The next grievance to which the hon. gentleman referred, is the want of enlightened legislation generally. He laments over the indisposition of parliament to promote the comfort and enjoyment of the lower classes of society, and complains that the penal laws, and the laws for the security of property, are not founded on enlarged principles of jurisprudence. Now, on this head, I have some comfort to offer the learned gentleman. The last time he spoke he was haunted by the apparition of fines and recoveries. That ghost is laid—for in this unreformed House of Commons, a bill has been brought in with very general assent, by the member for Stafford, in which fines and recoveries are treated without the slightest ceremony. And where, Sir, are the obstructions at present to the enlarged and enlightened legislation which the learned gentleman calls for? It ought surely to originate with the king's government. They command a large majority in this House; and the same men who support them on reform, will no doubt support them in any measures for the improvement of the law. If there has been delay in the introduction of them, the fault rests not with the House of Commons, but with the government. It may be said, and said with truth, that the House of Commons has been so occupied with reform, that there has been no time for the consideration of such measures here. But the House of Lords has not been overburthened with labour. There the government had an open field for their philosophic and benevolent exertions—there they might have easily and conveniently originated those great schemes of reform that are to promote the enjoyments of the labouring classes, and to embody the sound principles of jurisprudence. Government have not wholly lost the opportunity. While we have been engaged on reform, the House of Lords has been considering two measures brought forward by the government; one for regulating the consumption of beer, the other for the security of property endangered by wicked incendiaries. Here was a glorious occasion for exemplifying the new principles—for contrasting our indifference to the comforts of the poor, our ignorance of the true principles of legislation, with the liberal and enlightened policy which is to be the offspring of reform. But what are the Lords doing? They are actually, at the instance of the present government, correcting the excesses of our too liberal policy. We have made the trade in beer too free—we have been too enlightened—we listened to the Edinburgh Review—we were assured by the great advocates of improved legislation, that the consumption of beer was exactly like the consumption of bread—that as no man would eat too much bread, so no man would drink too much beer—that men are the best judges of their own interests, and, therefore, would never get drunk. It is now discovered that we were in error, and that, so far from being chargeable with stinting the comfort of the poor, and with being enamoured of restrictions on free-trade, we have erred in the opposite extreme.

Now for the penal legislation, for the laws that are to secure property. The noble lord (Lord Althorp) informed us some time since, that there were under the grave consideration of this government, laws for giving that security, and for repressing the crime of incendiarism. I had not a doubt, that the new principles were now to be called into action, that property was to be protected, through the instrumentality of laws—sanctioned by the sage of the law (Mr. Bentham)—eschewing all severity of punishment, appealing to reason and nature, and deriving support from their conformity with the general feelings and sympathies of mankind. Really, Sir, I burst out into an involuntary and incredulous laugh, when I first read, that the great measure for the security of property that had been under the grave deliberation of the government, was the restoration of man-traps!

I could hardly believe that this enlightened government had been driven to the sad resource of hunting in the index of repealed acts of parliament, and that the only product of their united wisdom was the repeal of the Spring-gun bill. I felt sorely for the member for Stamford (Mr. Tennyson). It was hard, that after raising a proud monument to his own character as a lawgiver, by the abolition of spring-guns—it was hard on him, that his own colleagues should undermine the foundations of that monument, and rob him of all his fame. Here was again the error of following the Edinburgh Review. It wrote articles indignant at the use of spring-guns—convinced the House of Commons that they ought to be abandoned:—and here is another instance wherein the Lords are obliged to correct the blunders, not of our illiberal, but of our too liberal policy. How shall we in this respect gain by reform?

The hon. gentleman, in speaking on this part of the question, taunted the members of the late administration with having fled from the government at a time of general embarrassment. Sir, if we did fly, it was not until this House gave a significant hint that it had withdrawn its confidence from us. It left us in a minority on the first proposition which we made for the maintenance of the dignity of the Crown. Our flight was not very unexpected; for I well remember, such was the eagerness for our departure, that scarcely had the division been proclaimed, when I was pressed from this side of the House to state, whether the government did not intend forthwith to resign office? It was considered by our opponents as a matter of course, that, being in a minority on the civil list, we had no alternative but to retire. Now, that we are out of office, we are taunted with having fled from it; but while we were in office, the charge was that we clung to office with too much pertinacity. I very much doubt whether the moral quality of this offence—the flying from office—does not materially vary with the parties that commit it, and with the position of the men who condemn it. The learned gentleman, sitting behind his friends in the government, denounces it as a heavy political sin. But it was not so before. It is wonderful the change that takes place in the appearance of the same identical object, when it is viewed from different quarters. Given—a commissioner of bankrupts as the spectator—flight from office as the object to be viewed—what will be the variation in the appearance of that object, when seen by the commissioner from the back benches of the opposition, and from the front benches of the ministerial side of the House? This is a curious problem in moral optics; and as the learned gentleman is, no doubt, a mathematician, he probably will attempt to solve it.

The hon. gentleman says, that when we had carried the Catholic question, and had thereby forfeited the confidence of our former supporters, our hold upon the country was lost, and our ability to carry on the government was at an end. Why then taunt us with abandoning it? The hon. gentleman also says, although he approves decidedly of the act, that we carried the Catholic question against the feelings and wishes of the middle classes of the people. What, Sir, are the £10 householders ever in the wrong? Are they (the new constituency) sometimes on the illiberal and intolerant side? Are there occasions when it is wise and just to oppose popular opinion, and to risk the loss of popular favour, by preferring the real interests of the people to their present wishes and demands? If this be true of one question, why may it not be true of another? Why is that doctrine, that was sound on the Catholic question, to be scouted as absurd on reform?

But to return to the public grievances and public calamities of which reform is to prevent the recurrence. Reform is to prevent war. We are speaking in the sixteenth year of peace, maintained with an unreformed parliament, and we are to reform it as a security against war. But was the last war commenced or continued against the sense of the people of this country? The learned gentleman is himself an evidence that it was not. He wished to illustrate, by comparison, the present unanimity of the people in the cause of reform, and he says such unanimity has not prevailed among the people of England since Buonaparte threatened us with invasion from his camp at Boulogne—this was in 1805. The country threatened with invasion must take precautions against it. The people who are unanimous for resistance, demand defensive measures proportionate to the means of attack. The war that is thus continued is a war for existence as a nation: and it is the war of a people, and not the war of a government, or of a corrupt, unreformed House of Commons. The truth with respect to war is this; it is very popular at its commencement, but, like a convivial entertainment, the most disagreeable part of it is the payment of the bill. Can any man doubt, that when Buonaparte returned from Elba, in 1815, the feeling and the rational conviction of this country was in favour of war? When an address was proposed in this House—the spirit of which was decidedly warlike—it was met by an amendment, moved by Mr. Whitbread, the object of which was to deprecate war. The number that voted for that amendment, out of 658 members, was thirty-seven. Men of all parties supported the address. Mr. Grattan, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Plunkett, spoke and voted for war. Now, what was the expenditure of that single year, 1815—an expenditure not at variance with, but in strict conformity with, the sense and wishes of the people? It exceeded £110,000,000. The Navy, Army, and Ordnance Estimates alone, amounted to £54,000,000. The people themselves would have hurled from their seats any ministers that refused to make the exertions which led to the battle of Waterloo and the overthrow of the power of Buonaparte. If the people now murmur at the cost of those exertions—if they have changed their opinion as to the policy of them—if the recollection of the glorious successes of the last war is now become painful—if Trafalgar and Waterloo are odious sounds—let the people, repenting of their former enthusiasm, make good resolutions for the future, but do not let them offer up as the atonement for their own folly—if they deem it folly—the ancient institutions of their country.

This topic, and those immediately connected with it, are of all the most important. The public burthens are the chief stimulants of the cry for reform, and they would justify the demand for it if they had been really imposed to defray profligate and useless expenses—if they had dried up the resources and exhausted the strength of the country—or if, by an unjust partition, their chief pressure were not on the rich, but on the productive and industrious classes. It cannot be denied that those burthens are heavy—but in determining their relative weight to those of other countries, it is not enough to take merely the amount of taxation in this or any other country—you must also take, in each country, the amount of the capital and wealth out of which that taxation is to be defrayed. One country may be much more heavily burthened than another, though the rate of taxation, on every necessary or luxury of life, be lighter in the one than the other.

Neither can it be denied that there may have been occasional instances of extravagance. These things must and will occur under every form of government; but the question is, whether the great mass of the public expenditure has not been incurred, in an almost infinite proportion, for honest and necessary purposes. Has there not been also, concurrently with that expenditure, an increase of the national wealth and resources? Hear the testimony, not of Anti-reformers, but the testimony of the most competent witnesses, those witnesses being, at the same time, strenuous reformers. Says Mr. Ricardo—"Notwithstanding the immense expenditure of the English government during the last twenty years, there can be little doubt but that the increased production on the part of the people has more than compensated for it. The national capital has not merely been unimpaired—it has been greatly increased; and the annual income of the people, even after the payment of the taxes, is probably greater at the present time than at any former period of our history. For the proof of this we might refer to the increase of population—to the extension of agriculture—to the increase of shipping and manufactures—to the building of docks—to the opening of numerous canals—as well as many other expensive undertakings; all denoting an immense increase both of capital and annual production." So far Mr. Ricardo. Now, hear the comment on this, in 1830, of Sir Henry Parnell:—"As ten years have elapsed since Mr. Ricardo wrote this opinion, and as similar proofs can be referred to, to show a continued increase of production, the conclusion is, that the national capital and income are now much greater than they were in 1819."

But it may be said, although the expenditure was necessary—although the national resources remain unimpaired—yet the partition of the public burthens among the various classes of the people, is unequal and unjust. Hear again Sir Henry Parnell on this important point. He estimates the total amount of the taxes raised from the people at £50,000,000; of these, he says, £38,000,000 are paid voluntarily, and out of the surplus income of individuals, over and above what is requisite for purchasing the necessities of life. He adds, "that so long as £50,000,000 must be raised, the above-mentioned large portion of it (£38,000,000) is obtained in a way but little liable to any real objection; and if the remainder was provided by taxes of the same kind, the whole revenue would be paid without any serious injury."

Now, of the remaining £12,000,000, some part has been already remitted and modified; and what is there to prevent the present House of Commons making any remission or modification of the remainder which it may be prudent or just to make?

In those desponding views of the future, which are so frequently taken, Sir Henry Parnell does not participate. He says—"As to our future prospects—there is no reason to doubt that a continued augmentation of capital will take place, even in defiance of many obstructions. The same moral, physical, and external causes, which have contributed to the existing amount of national wealth, are still in operation. The free constitution of the government—the exact administration of the laws—the protection afforded to foreigners, and the toleration of all religions—will produce the same effects they have hitherto done. Whatever evils press just now on our manufactures—the more we examine our situation, the more we shall find it possible to trace them to causes of a temporary character."

Here, then, is a picture, drawn by a reformer, of this great and powerful country. Some temporary causes of distress—but those causes sure to be dissipated by the more powerful operation of permanent causes of prosperity—a free constitution—laws exactly administered—protection to foreigners—perfect religious toleration. How can this reformer, on his own showing, with any semblance of justice, expect me to assent to the reasonableness of the change which he proposes under the name of reform?

Here I conclude this part of the argument. I have attempted to show, that there do not exist any such practical grievances—any such insecurity of the blessings we have actually enjoyed—as would warrant us in incurring the risk of so extensive an inflict that heavier penalty—of involving me in their responsibility—of making me an instrument for accomplishing an act—by which we, the liferenters of those institutions, that have made our country the freest, the happiest, the most powerful nation of the universe, are to cut off from those who are to succeed us the inheritance of what we ourselves enjoyed.

Lord John Russell having replied, the House divided on the motion that this bill do pass: Ayes, 345; Noes, 236; majority, 109.

REGISTRY OF ARMS (IRELAND) BILL.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1831.

Mr. Stanley announced his intention, in consequence of the advanced period of the session, and the absolute necessity of asking for some bill on the subject, to move for the discharge of the Order for the adjourned debate on the importation of arms, and the keeping of arms in Ireland bill, with a view of bringing in another bill to revive for one year the acts 47th and 50th George III., which had been in force for many years, but which had now expired. He should therefore move, that the Order of the day be discharged, that the expiring bills might be revived for twelve months.

SIR ROBERT PEELE was gratified to hear of the approaching termination of the session; but, at the same time, he could hardly admit it as a proper ground, or a proper excuse for withdrawing the two important bills relating to Ireland, which the right hon. gentleman, in the course of the session, had introduced. Even supposing that their labours for the session were about to close, surely there were still the same facilities for discussing these measures in September, as there would have been in May or June. He certainly should have thought that upon such a subject, no measure would have been introduced which was not necessary; but to propose measures of extreme severity, and then to withdraw them without discussion, for the only reason that the session was too far advanced, appeared to him to be both inconvenient and improper.

Mr. Stanley thought the course he had adopted did not deserve the language applied to it by the right hon. baronet, and it was not true that he had brought forward a measure without consideration, and then abandoned it without regret.

Sir Robert Peel did not say a word about the consistency of the right hon. gentleman, and therefore his observations on that point were ill-timed and uncalled for. The right hon. gentleman said, a few weeks ago, that he brought forward a bill which he submitted to the House for the registration of arms, as he considered that such a measure was absolutely necessary to the preservation of the peace in Ireland, and to the maintenance of the just authority of the Crown. This bill was of unusual severity, and imposed the punishment of transportation for merely possessing arms that had not been registered. Before this bill was brought forward it ought to have been well considered; and, if this had been done, it ought not to have been abandoned in the manner in which it was by the right hon. member. According to his understanding of common terms, the expression—the late period of the session—implied the termination of it. He did not charge the right hon. member with inconsistency, in having brought forward a bill and abandoning it; but his conduct appeared to him (Sir R. Peel) to be liable to the charge of having acted with some degree of levity on the subject.

Order of the day discharged.

POPULAR EXCITEMENT.

OCTOBER 4, 1831.

Colonel Evans rose to propose a motion, which he supposed the House would agree with him in thinking one extremely proper to be entertained at the present moment. He would beg leave to move an humble address to his Majesty "For copies of papers remaining in any of the public offices, tending to show the extent of the insurrectionary movement expected to have broken out in the metropolis on the 9th of November last: also, of any arrangements or plans of operation for putting down the same by force of arms, so far as these may be communicated without detriment to public safety: also, returns of expenses for movements of troops collected to be in readiness to act against the people on that occasion, or incurred for any addition to the defences of the Tower, towards increasing the cannon and musket-fire capable of being brought to bear from it against the surrounding streets or buildings."

After some remarks from Sir Henry Parnell and Mr. Hunt,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, as the House seemed much averse from entertaining this motion, nothing was requisite for him to do but remind the House, that he had at the time fully explained the motives which induced the government to take the precautions alluded to. He had then adverted to the communications which had passed between the government and the lord mayor, and said, that from these and the symptoms of popular discontent then observable, the government had exercised a sound as well as a humane discretion in securing the public against the miseries of a popular commotion, by providing means for its immediate suppression. The precautions were entirely defensive; and, had the necessity for ascertaining the fact occurred, they would, he believed, have proved effectual, and, by prompt interference, have averted the anarchy and bloodshed which must have been the consequence of a want of preparation to meet such an exigency. He hoped never to see a ministry neglect such precautions. He would only beg the House to bear in mind the events of 1798, in comparison with the crisis alluded to by the hon. member; and then he did not doubt their concurrence in his opinion—that humanity, as well as good policy, required that those precautions should be taken. Those precautions were not to act offensively against the people, but defensively, and for the protection of their best and dearest interests, which were inseparably dependent on the preservation of the public peace.

The motion was negatived without a division.

PROSECUTIONS ON ACCOUNT OF RELIGION.

OCTOBER 5, 1831.

Mr. Hunt presented a petition, numerous signed by respectable persons, inhabitants of the Metropolis, setting forth their disapprobation of prosecutions on account of uttering religious opinions, and praying that Mr. Taylor might be relieved from the very severe punishment he was suffering, which was contrary to justice, and exceeded the sentence passed upon him.

Lord Althorp was of opinion that Mr. Taylor's offence was not one requiring the interference of government.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the unaffected detestation expressed by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O'Connell) of the doctrines and conduct of Taylor, he was sure met with the full concurrence of the House. He had heard the hon. and learned member's remarks with great satisfaction. He also agreed with him in thinking, that very great discretion ought to be exercised in instituting such prosecutions as that under which the person in question was suffering. He had successfully tried the experiment of non-prosecution, but it was extremely difficult to withstand the representations of good and religious men. As to the question which had been propounded by the hon. member for Middlesex, he believed few would agree with him that there should be unqualified impunity, or that all laws which bore upon the questions of religion and morals should be repealed. Why, what would be the result of such a state of things, but that people whose feelings were outraged, would resort to personal violence? He acknowledged it was difficult to lay down any precise rule; but he could never admit that every person might attack the first truths of Christianity at their own discretion. Protection was principally required by the young and thoughtless; not that it could be harmed by the statement of facts, by calm reasoning, or by philosophical discussion, but by insult, burlesque, ridicule, and passionate appeals, such as this man Taylor was in the habit of using. He appeared in the costume of a clergyman, and did all he could to insult the feelings and principles of every man attached to the Christian religion.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

STATE OF THE NATION.

OCTOBER 10, 1831.

Lord Ebrington at the close of a speech of considerable length moved the following resolution:—"That while this House deeply laments the recent fate of a bill for reforming the representation, in favour of which the opinion of the country stands unequivocally pronounced, and which has been matured by discussions the most anxious and laborious, it feels called upon to re-assert its firm adherence to the principle and leading provisions of that great measure; and to express its unabated confidence in the integrity, perseverance, and ability of those ministers who, in introducing and conducting it, have so well consulted the best interests of the country."

In the debate which ensued,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he could not but regret that the hon. and gallant member (Col. Evans) should think it necessary to put a hypothetical case of establishing a government of the sword. Such hypothetical assumptions of governments established by the sword was like the pouring of oil, of which the learned member had just spoken—it was pouring the oil of the sword on the stormy waves of our present discontent, when hon. members said, that they wished that the angry passions might be soothed, and that the excited feelings of the people might be calmed. He had meant to take no other part in this discussion than was necessary to vindicate his own consistency in the vote he should give, and he should not have departed from that determination had not the speeches lately made formed such a signal contrast to the speeches of the noble lord who opened the debate, and the hon. member who seconded the motion. The noble lord meant, by proposing his resolution, to pledge the majority who had passed the bill to adhere to its principles. The noble lord naturally expected that the members who voted in that majority would vote for his resolution; and naturally perceived, that those who voted against the bill were precluded by that from acceding to his resolution. When the hon. and learned gentleman who had spoken some time before (Mr. Macaulay), said, nothing had been uttered on the principle of the resolution—did he expect—did the House expect, after the long discussion of what the hon. and learned gentleman called disgusting and weary details of the bill; did the hon. and learned member expect, that on that occasion they were to renew the whole debate on the question of parliamentary reform? Those who would now vote for the resolution had already proved their approbation of the principle of reform; and he must consider it quite unnecessary that those should again agitate the subject who had expressed their opinions by voting against the second reading of the bill. The object should rather be, to place the subject at rest; and he did not think the agitation was likely to be calmed by again renewing the discussion. It would be more meet, under the present circumstances, to use the language of wise moderation. The great majority of the House had no occasion to prove by the present resolution their attachment to reform; and they would best support the constitution, and best secure their own view of being very moderate, and calming the excited feelings of the people on this important subject, by voting against the motion. Nothing certainly which had happened should make him not adhere to that moderation he recommended. He could not forget, that on the last time he had addressed the House, he had expressed his satisfaction that no personal differences had taken place during the debate, and the noble lord's (Lord Althorp) reply had expressed a hope that all animosity would be buried. He knew not what necessity there was now to revive animosity. It was not justified by the occasion on either side, either in defending the administration, or in assigning the reasons in detail for withholding confidence from the government. In stating some of the grounds for withholding that confidence, he should avoid all acrimonious discussion. If the majority thought it advisable to agree to a resolution to support the bill, in order to place it upon the records of the House, that was not the time for him to enter into verbal criticism of the resolution, for which he certainly did not mean to vote. He, however, doubted, under the circumstances, if it were wise in the noble lord to call on the majority to agree to such a resolution. He thought the divisions on the bill a sufficient proof of the determination of the House to support the bill, without entering into any such resolution. That resolution called upon the House to affirm two propositions, not necessarily connected. They were called upon to declare in favour of the reform bill, and to declare at the same time, that his Majesty's government was deserving of their confidence. He thought it unwise to call on the House to assent to the two propositions in one resolution, and it would be more complimentary to his Majesty's government, as well as more customary, to give expression to the confidence of the House in a distinct resolution. Allow him to say to the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Thomas Duncombe), that he had heard his speech with great pleasure, and was only prevented from giving it great praise by the compliment the hon. member had thought proper to pay to him; but that speech was distinguished by a tone of moderation which the majority would do well to adopt. The hon. gentleman thought it would be most unfortunate if his Majesty had no other alternative to pass the bill but to create a number of Peers. He said, that every other measure ought to be adopted in preference to that, and that such an alternative should be only had recourse to if all other means failed; he was anxious that the House should not despair, and thought that there was yet time to avoid the difficulty by meeting the Peers half-way. But if the hon. member entertained any hope of that, was his course wise? Why, the resolution he supported, cut off all hope for ever of moving one step towards reconciliation. The hon. gentleman had a strange policy; for while he recommended the House to go half-way, he recommended it steadily to adhere to the bill. He hoped to meet the other House half-way, and he counselled the House of Commons not to move one step. The tone of the hon. gentleman's speech was that of moderation, but he supported a resolution which cut off all hopes of a compromise. Was it not evident that there was a contradiction between the hon. gentleman's speech and the resolution he supported? Hon. members must see, that the resolution was a compulsory proposition. Another hon. gentleman had said, that the provisions of the bill might have been modified had it not been for the obstinacy of the opposition. According to that, it was the troublesome opposition which prevented the bill from being made perfect; but the vote the House was called on to come to, implied that it had been made perfect by their obstinacy. It was urged, as one ground for the resolution, that the bill had been matured by discussions the most anxious and laborious. And the fault he had to find with the resolution was, that it implied that this bill ought to be adhered to, when an equally efficient measure might be introduced, which this resolution would preclude them from accepting. Why pledge the House to the bill as it stood, and why exclude themselves from accepting another measure equivalent to that? The resolution pledged the House to all the provisions of the bill—it pledged the House to the £10 clause. One of the many provisions, which was much insisted upon, and which was much objected to, was the uniform right of voting given to the £10 householders. Now, he had heard it stated, he would not say where, nor by whom, but he had heard it stated by a person of high consideration, that the arguments on the uniform right of voting had gone far to shake his mind, and he should be prepared to listen to extensive modifications. Great improvements, therefore, might be made in this part of the bill, though he did not say those improvements would be restrictions; on the contrary, in some cases there might be a considerable extension of the right of voting. That was a most important part of the bill. Perhaps some plan might be acceptable which would give that right to small towns at a lower rate, and restrict it to a higher rent in the larger towns: at any rate, the right might be advantageously modified; but if the House agreed to the resolution, they would pledge themselves against any modification of that or any other of the provisions of the bill. They might pledge themselves, if they pleased, to adhere to the principle of the bill; but by pledging themselves to adhere to the provisions, they would prevent all improvement. On these grounds he objected to the resolution. He doubted the policy of the majority who had supported the bill, pledging itself to adhere to the bill; but being a member of the minority which had done all in its power to oppose the bill, he must give his decided opposition to a resolution which pledged him and the House to that bill. He had heard the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O'Connell) complain of the weariness and tediousness of discussions; he taunted the opposition with being the authors of those tedious debates; but the resolution, of which the hon. and learned gentleman was one of the most strenuous supporters, said, that the bill had been matured by discussions the most anxious and laborious. The noble lord's resolution vindicated the pertinacious opposition, and on these grounds called on the House to support the bill. The resolution embraced two subjects—that of reform, and confidence in the government. The House was called upon to express its confidence in the integrity of the ministers, their perseverance, and their ability in introducing the reform bill, and in conducting it through the House. He did not wish by any means to lower the character and weaken the power of the executive government; and, in expressing a difference of opinion from the resolution, he begged to be understood as not implying any doubt of the personal integrity or perseverance of the ministers; neither did he express any doubt of their ability in debates; but without doubting their personal integrity, their perseverance, or their skill in debate, he might still be far from placing confidence in them as a government. He could not, for example, extend his approbation to the manner in which they had introduced the reform bill, nor the time of introducing it, both of which were, in his opinion, inconsistent with the interest of the country. The resolution praised their conduct on these points, and against that part of it he could give a most conscientious vote. There were several other parts of their conduct which he did not approve of. The repeal of the coal duties had his approbation, supposing it practicable so far to reduce taxation; but their foreign policy, which he would not enter into, was any thing but favourable to the interests of the country. But, without stating all his objections to their policy, it was sufficient for him to say, that the government was not entitled to his confidence on account of the manner in which they had introduced and supported the reform bill. The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Macaulay) said, that refusing to acknowledge the principles of this bill would expose them to a greater domestic danger than this country had ever before been exposed to. The hon. and learned member for Calne had told the House to look on the precipice on the brink of which they were standing, and he referred this danger to the conduct of those who had opposed the reform bill. The opposition, however, considered that his Majesty's ministers were mainly responsible for the crisis, from the extent of the bill they had introduced, from the time when it was brought forward, and from the manner in which its temporary success had been ensured. He would undertake to say, that in the excitement which had been produced throughout the country, if the ministers were to propose a bill for the abolition of the hereditary peerage, which the hon. and learned member for Kerry said might speedily become a question, it would not be difficult to persuade the people that the abolition was consonant to their interests, and that the peerage was full of anomalies, and at variance with their rights. He could not help complaining of the tone of the hon. and learned member (Mr. Macaulay). He lamented the expressions adopted by the hon. and learned gentleman, and his observations on the present state of domestic danger. Why did the hon. and learned gentleman seek, by stating strange principles, and exaggerating difficulties, to increase that danger? Why did he seek to augment dangerous passions on dangerous topics? Why did he not follow the example of the noble lord? Admitting they stood on the brink of a precipice, why did he endeavour to increase their danger, and embarrass the course of government, by inflaming passions which it was so desirable to lull? He must say, that the eloquence of the hon. and learned gentleman not unfrequently got the better of his judgment; and now and then, though there was some semblance of argument in its declamation, when it was examined it was found to make rather against than for his side of the question. Then the hon. gentleman had stated, that the House of Commons was generally, in relation to the House of Lords, in the right, and the bills it had sent up to the Lords, though at first refused, were afterwards assented to; but if the House of Commons had this general means of persuading or compelling the House of Lords to adopt its views, what became of that part of the hon. member's argument which went to state, that the House of Commons was dependent on the House of Lords? Did not that prove that the two Houses were independent, co-ordinate powers, and that the opinion of the House of Commons generally prevailed? He was sorry that the hon. and learned gentleman, in talking of danger, had again introduced menaces into his speech—that he thought it right to menace the House of Lords. The hon. and learned gentleman's whole argument turned upon the principle of intolerance—I am right, and you are wrong. That was the whole of the hon. and learned gentleman's assumption. He thought, however, that he was supported by physical power, and then he said, "You must give way." Could he not think that he was addressing high and honourable men, who were capable of being influenced by reason and argument? and would it not have been more wise to expect to influence the decision of the other House by reasoning than by threats—threats that, if they did not pass the bill, they should be proscribed and exiled like the nobility of France? The hon. and learned gentleman said, that it was important to produce tranquillity; and, therefore, he voted for the resolution of the noble lord: but, if he wished for tranquillity, would he call upon the House to enter into a pledge which excited hopes, perhaps encouraged discontent, and kept alive agitation? The hon. member indulged in prophecies; and he never heard prophecies more likely to realise themselves than those of the hon. and learned member. Instead of calling on the people to demand the bill, why not enjoin them to rest satisfied and contented? Why encourage discontent and dissatisfaction? Why tell the people how they might resist the law, as the hon. and learned gentleman did? The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. O'Connell) had alluded to the state of the metropolis, when an infamous attack had been made upon the life of the prime minister, and that prime minister the Duke of Wellington; an act of the basest ingratitude and the greatest wickedness. The hon. and learned gentleman had alluded to the intended attack on the Duke of Wellington [Mr. Macaulay intimated that he had not alluded to any such thing]. No, it was the hon. member for Kerry he was alluding to; who had considered the attack on a prime minister of England, and that prime minister the Duke of Wellington, as the result of bitter excitement on this question; but while that hon. member had spoken of the base attack on the life of the Duke of Wellington, not indeed by the middle classes, but by the lowest classes, the hon. and learned member for Calne had explained how they might avoid the penalties of the law, and avoid paying the taxes. Was not that exciting the passions of the people? The hon. and learned gentleman deplored the excesses of the people, and their readiness to resist the law, and said it was hardly necessary to make a speech directing them how to show their hostility. He would also say a few words to the other hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Sheil), who had imitated the hon. and learned gentleman, but had fallen below him. He would not follow the hon. and learned gentleman, being warned by his example, that the ambition to make a great attempt does not ensure success. The sentences of the hon. and learned gentleman bore the marks of much labour, and were a credit to his industry. He had given the House several old stories, and among others that of the Sibyl; and on her he thought the House had already drawn often enough during these debates, and he hoped the rules of the House concerning females would, in future, be extended to her, and that she would not be suffered again to be present at the debates. There was another female mentioned by Burke, of whom the hon. and learned member reminded him. Mr. Burke said, that persons who could imitate the contortions of the Pythian goddess thought they had caught her inspiration. The hon. and learned gentleman thought the whole essence of Toryism might be condensed into one short word, and that short word was East Retford. He wished his hon. friend, the member for Hertford, were present; for he could tell the hon. and learned member, that he proposed extending the franchise of East Retford to Bassetlaw, and it was rather singular that the hon. and learned member should have selected the act of a good old Whig to designate the party of the Tories. He hoped he had not said one word to add to the excitement which existed on the subject to which the resolution referred, which it was his wish to calm. He understood that his Majesty's government were to retain office; that they still enjoyed the confidence of the sovereign, and still hoped to carry the bill. There was one thing he thought certain—that they were the truest friends to their country who proclaimed, not that a majority had a fixed determination to support the bill, but a determination to support the law; and that all language which tended to influence the passions of the people—all measures which tended to excite their hopes, would only end in greater disappointment to all. They ought not to refer to the possibility—they ought not to teach the people that it was easy to refuse.

the payment of taxes—they ought not to exaggerate the amount of persons assembled at public meetings, and encourage the people to form others. It was easy enough to say that 150,000 men assembled here and 40,000 men there, but before such assertions were made, individuals ought to be correct as to the facts, for such statements led men to meet in other places; and such meetings could not take place, though for a legal object, without exciting apprehensions in the well-disposed, and without exposing the public peace to danger. Great masses of men could not meet without exciting apprehension. He wished that hon. members would warn the people of the consequences of disobeying the law, particularly of refusing to pay the taxes. The whole community was deeply interested in preserving obedience to the law. It was not for the advantage of the few, but for the benefit of them all; and those mad proceedings now talked of would paralyse industry, suspend commerce, and inflict the most grievous injury on the lowest classes. Again he would say, that the people should be informed that the privileges of the peers, which were now so lightly brought into discussion, were not conferred on the peers for the gratification of their personal vanity—they were not so much personal privileges, as privileges conferred for the benefit of the whole community, and which had, on several occasions, been useful to the people themselves. The independence of the peers was a guarantee and security to the liberties of the people, and tranquillity would be best preserved by respecting their rights. He did not like to trust himself on this subject of the popular excitement; but when he considered the influence of the government, he was persuaded that if the same means were employed to excite an opinion against the peerage which had been employed on the subject of reform, it would not be difficult to produce a very strong dislike to it. In conclusion, the right hon. gentleman declared, that all who had voted for the reform bill would probably vote for the resolution, while all who had opposed the bill were bound in consistency to vote against the resolution.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE KING'S SPEECH.

DECEMBER 6, 1831.

At about half-past two o'clock the House was summoned to attend the House of Lords for the purpose of hearing his Majesty's speech on the opening of the present Session. The Speaker, accompanied by about 100 members, proceeded to the House of Peers, when his Majesty, being seated on the Throne, delivered the following speech:—

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,—I have called you together, that you may resume, without further delay, the important duties to which the circumstances of the times require your immediate attention; and I sincerely regret the inconvenience which I am well aware you must experience, from so early a renewal of your labours, after the short interval allowed you for repose from the fatigues of the last Session.

“I feel it to be my duty, in the first place, to recommend to your most careful consideration the measures which will be proposed to you for a Reform in the Commons House of Parliament; a speedy and satisfactory settlement of this question becomes daily of more pressing importance to the security of the State, and to the contentment and welfare of my people.

“I deeply lament the distress which still prevails in many parts of my dominions; and for which the preservation of peace, both at home and abroad, will, under the blessing of Divine Providence, afford the best and most effectual remedy. I feel assured of your disposition to adopt any practicable measures, which you will always find me ready and anxious to assist, both for removing the causes and mitigating the effects of the want of employment, which the embarrassments of commerce, and the consequent interruption of the pursuits of industry, have occasioned.

“It is with great regret that I have observed the existence of a disease at Sunderland, similar in its appearance and character to that which has existed in many parts of Europe. Whether it is indigenous, or has been imported from abroad, is a question involved in much uncertainty; but its progress has neither been so extensive nor so fatal as on the Continent. It is not, however, the less necessary to use every precaution against the further extension of this malady; and the measures recommended by those who have had the best opportunities of observing it, as most effectual for this purpose, have been adopted.

"In parts of Ireland a systematic opposition has been made to the payment of tithes, attended in some instances with afflicting results; and it will be one of your first duties to enquire whether it may not be possible to effect improvements in the laws respecting this subject, which may afford the necessary protection to the Established Church, and at the same time remove the present causes of complaint.

"But in this and in every other question affecting Ireland, it is, above all things, necessary to look to the best means of securing internal peace and order, which alone seem wanting to raise a country, blessed by Providence with so many natural advantages, to a state of the greatest prosperity.

"The conduct of the Portuguese government, and the repeated injuries to which my subjects have been exposed, have prevented a renewal of my diplomatic relations with that kingdom. The state of a country, so long united with this, by the ties of the most intimate alliance, must necessarily be to me an object of the deepest interest. The return to Europe of the elder branch of the illustrious house of Braganza, and the dangers of a disputed succession, will require my most vigilant attention to events, by which not only the safety of Portugal, but the general interests of Europe may be affected.

"The arrangement which I announced to you at the close of the last Session, for the separation of the States of Holland and Belgium, has been followed by a treaty between the five powers and the king of the Belgians, which I have directed to be laid before you as soon as the ratifications shall have been exchanged.

"A similar treaty has not yet been agreed to by the king of the Netherlands; but I trust the period is not distant when that Sovereign will see the necessity of acceding to an arrangement in which the plenipotentiaries of the five powers have unanimously concurred, and which has been framed with the most careful and impartial attention to all the interests concerned.

"I have the satisfaction to inform you, that I have concluded with the king of the French a Convention, which I have directed to be laid before you, the object of which is, the effectual suppression of the African Slave Trade. This Convention, having for its basis the concession of reciprocal rights, to be mutually exercised in specified latitudes and places, will, I trust, enable the naval forces of the two countries, by their combined efforts, to accomplish an object which is felt by both to be so important to the interests of humanity.

"Regarding the state of Europe generally, the friendly assurances which I receive from foreign powers, and the union which subsists between me and my Allies, inspire me with a confident hope that peace will not be interrupted.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—I have directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be prepared, and they will in due time be laid before you. I will take care that they shall be formed with the strictest regard to economy; and I trust to your wisdom and patriotism to make such provision as may be required for the public service.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—The scenes of violence and outrage which have occurred in the city of Bristol, and in some other places, have caused me the deepest affliction.

"The authority of the laws must be vindicated by the punishment of offences which have produced so extensive a destruction of property, and so melancholy a loss of life; but I think it right to direct your attention to the best means of improving the Municipal Police of the kingdom, for the more effectual protection of the public peace against the occurrence of similar commotions.

"Sincerely attached to our free Constitution, I never can sanction any interference with the legitimate exercise of those rights which secure to my people the privileges of discussing and making known their grievances; but, in respecting these rights, it is also my duty to prevent combinations, under whatever pretext, which in their form and character are incompatible with all regular government, and are equally opposed to the spirit and to the provisions of the law; and I know that I shall not appeal in vain to my faithful subjects to second my determined resolution to repress all illegals.

proceedings by which the peace and security of my dominions may be endangered."

On their return, the Speaker read to the House a copy of the King's Speech.

Lord Cavendish then moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, in answer to his Majesty's most gracious speech." The noble lord then read the address, which was seconded by Sir Francis Vincent.

In the debate which followed,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that during the time he was a minister of the Crown, as well as now in his private capacity, it was always his wish to see the speech from the Throne, and the address in answer to it, so framed as not to give rise to any collision which could prevent the House from coming to a unanimous vote. He thought it desirable that parliament should be enabled to offer to the Sovereign, without a dissentient voice, the testimony of their loyalty and attachment on the opening of the Session. It had always, for this reason, appeared to him, that the address ought to contain no matter which could give rise to difference of opinion. It gave him pleasure, therefore, that upon the present occasion he was enabled to express so much of acquiescence as would render unnecessary any amendment, except one to which he anticipated no objection on any side of the House. Before he proceeded to notice the topics introduced into the address now proposed for the consideration of the House, he must be permitted to allude to the circumstances under which they were assembled. He was perfectly ready to admit, that all considerations of private convenience ought to yield to public duty; but he must take this opportunity of entering his protest against the practice of calling parliament together without the usual notice. He feared the present meeting of the House might be drawn into a precedent, and he considered a practice founded on that precedent would be bad and dangerous. He was aware, indeed, that by law they might be called together within fourteen days: but antecedently to the passing of that law, the practice was, to give a notice of forty days; and so necessary was this considered, that Hatsell said, parliament ought not to be summoned to meet on a shorter notice than forty days. So important did that great authority deem it, that an ample notice should be given, and so great was, in his opinion, the danger of taking the House by surprise, that he said the ministers who advised the calling of parliament together on a shorter notice would be guilty of a grievous misdemeanour, and deserve the censure of parliament. By the Act of 1797, the old law was altered, and the government was enabled to call parliament together after fourteen days' notice. Yet, though such was the law, the conviction of the necessity of adhering to the ancient usage was so strong, that in the thirty years which had elapsed since its enactment, there was but one occasion on which parliament had been assembled at a shorter notice than that sanctioned by established custom. On that occasion (being 1801), the notice was twenty-three days. He admitted, that when Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville introduced the Act of 1797, they alleged that the greater facilities of intercourse, and also of communication by the post, justified them in abridging the time of notice; but it ought not to be forgotten, that since that time the Union with Ireland had taken place, the parliaments of the two kingdoms had been incorporated into one, and therefore a new and important reason had arisen for ample notice. Ministers, be it recollected, were always on the spot; they could tell their friends when parliament would meet, and therefore, if the precedent now established were followed, it might, in the hands of a bad minister, lead to gross abuse. If it had been necessary to take immediate precautions against the cholera, or to devise measures to put down the political unions, or to frame new provisions to suppress disturbances like those which had recently occurred at Bristol, then there would have been some show of reason for assembling parliament without delay. But the speech from the throne said nothing of the necessity of immediate precautionary measures. Reform, however, was said to be of urgent necessity: admitted; but then that necessity was as well known to the government on the 1st of November as it was fourteen days ago. At the close of the last session they were prorogued in the usual way till the 22nd of November. Members left town, not so much to attend to their private affairs in the country, as to obey the injunctions contained in his Majesty's speech, to assist in securing the tranquillity of their respective counties. Up to a period immediately prior to the 22nd of November, it was the general impression throughout the country, that parliament would not meet for the despatch of business before Christmas. For reasons, into the propriety of which he would not enter, an alteration in the intention of government took place. Supposing the necessity for reform were so great as was now alleged, that necessity existed before the 22nd of November, and consequently, members were entitled to a longer notice of the intended meeting of parliament than that which they had recently received. Before he entered into any examination of the topics contained in the speech, which had been so praised for its straightforward and manly character, he must say, that there were some extraordinary omissions in it. That they should meet with two such questions pending as the renewal of the Bank Charter, and of the East-India Company's Charter, and that not one word should be said on either of them in the King's Speech, did appear to him to be most extraordinary and incomprehensible. That his Majesty's Speech should invite discussion on the question, whether the cholera was indigenous, or imported from abroad, a question on which medical men would be the only good debaters, and that they should leave the heavier matters of the Bank and East-India Company's Charter totally unnoticed, was one of the most singular omissions that could well be imagined in a straightforward and manly speech. Moreover, the subjects noticed in the address did not compensate for these omissions; for, without questioning the policy of the views which the right hon. Secretary for Ireland had disclosed respecting that country, he doubted the policy of introducing the tithe question in the King's Speech. If the House were to be so occupied with the discussion of the question of reform that it could not agitate the questions relative to the renewal of the Charters of the Bank and of the East-India Company, why should the King's Speech notice thus prominently the tithe question? The right hon. secretary had told the House, that a committee was to be appointed, to consider whether some improvements could not be made in the laws respecting the payment of tithes in Ireland. He would say, that the appointment of such committee was in itself a very questionable proceeding. If there was in Ireland a systematic combination among the people against the payment of tithes, to hold out, in the King's Speech, the expectation of some change in the laws relating to the recovery of tithe, would only aggravate the existing evils, unless the government at once proposed a specific remedial measure. He was afraid that the right hon. gentleman might find more difficulty in adjusting this question than he anticipated at present. The grand-jury question, and others affecting Ireland, had been before alluded to in a similar way, and little progress afterwards made towards a permanent settlement of them, from the unexpected difficulties that appeared in their progress. He had heard with regret one expression which had fallen from the lips of the right hon. secretary. There might be grounds of policy and expediency, but he was sure, that there were no grounds of justice and legality, on which an alteration of the tithe-system could be demanded. He therefore trusted, that that expression had fallen inadvertently from the right hon. secretary; for if it should get abroad, that the right hon. secretary thought the claims of the people of Ireland to some alteration in the tithe-system legal and just, the admission would give additional force to the system of combination mentioned in the King's Speech. He hoped that the measure of improvement, now in the contemplation of government, would be produced forthwith, and that as little time as possible would be lost in placing it before a committee; for otherwise the rights of property would be endangered by the discussions and delusions which delay would produce. He would now proceed to consider the foreign policy of the country. His Majesty was made, in the speech, to lament, that he had not been able to establish, or rather to renew, the diplomatic relations of this country with Portugal, and two causes were assigned for the non-renewal of them:—First, the repeated injuries to which the subjects of this country had been exposed by the conduct of the Portuguese government; and secondly, the chances of a civil war on account of a disputed succession. He would ask any gentleman who then heard him—he would ask his Majesty's ministers themselves—whether there was not the greatest inconvenience in having a country like Portugal excommunicated from the European system? Did the people of Portugal recognise Don Miguel? And if they did, what right had this, or any other country, to gainsay that recognition? When Don Miguel first assumed, or was called to the exercise of government, it might have been just and necessary to abstain from the immediate recognition of his authority, but such a course of proceeding could not be indefinitely protracted without inconvenience to ourselves, and danger to the general peace of Europe. Whatever might be the private character of Don Miguel, that was a question with which the British government had nothing whatever to do. If fit for consideration at all, it was fit only for the consideration of the Portuguese nation; and he was entirely at a loss to understand upon what principles, but especially how upon Whig principles, his Majesty's ministers could longer withhold the recognition of a prince to whose rule there was no objection made on the part of his own people. But whether the authority of Don Miguel was acknowledged by this country or not, on one thing the noble lord might depend, which was, that while the present state of uncertainty and interrupted relations between the two countries continued to exist—while this country claimed the fulfilment of treaties, refusing at the same time to allow the validity of the authority which was to put those treaties into execution, it placed its own subjects in danger, and embarrassed its own commerce. It had a more than ordinary effect at the present time. Did the noble lord consider the consequence of such conduct? Did it not encourage the contest that was threatened for the throne of Portugal? That was the natural result of still withholding the recognition of Don Miguel. There might have been injuries inflicted on British subjects in Portugal; what those injuries were, whether they were old or new, the speech did not state, and he did not stop to enquire; but he contended that the conduct of the government in refusing to acknowledge Don Miguel after the lapse of so long a period since his accession, had a tendency to produce the very evils, the existence of which the King's Speech admitted and lamented—namely, embarrassment to our own commerce with Portugal, and the risk of a disputed succession. If a contest for the throne of Portugal were to take place, if civil war were to rage in that country, he most earnestly hoped that this country would sincerely act up to those principles of perfect neutrality which it had avowed; that it would not only profess, but that it would act in the spirit of its professions. Now, a few words with regard to Holland. His Majesty had expressed his hopes, that the king of Holland would accede to the arrangement for the separation of the States of Holland and Belgium, to which the king of Belgium had already assented. He sincerely hoped, that these expectations of his Majesty would not be disappointed. He likewise sincerely hoped, that that arrangement steered clear of all interference in the internal affairs of Holland; but, until some account of the transactions connected with that arrangement was communicated to the House, it would be premature in him to give any opinion on a subject of such peculiar delicacy. He was now arrived at that part of the Address to which he intended to propose an amendment. By some strange inadvertence, the Address, as at present worded, pledged them to a distinct approbation of the arrangement which the five Powers had made for the separation of Holland and Belgium. As the Address was proposed, it was couched in this form, "To express our hope, though a similar treaty has not yet been agreed to by the king of the Netherlands, that the period is not distant when that sovereign will see the necessity of acceding to an arrangement in which the plenipotentiaries of the five Powers have unanimously concurred, and which has been framed with the most careful and impartial attention to all the interests concerned." Now he, for one, must refuse to accede to this approbation of an arrangement of which he knew nothing, which had not yet been ratified, and which was not to be communicated to parliament till the ratification had taken place. It was quite clear, that there must be some alteration in this part of the Address. As he was sure that these expressions must have got into the Address by inadvertence, he would take no advantage of it by himself moving an amendment, but would leave it to the noble lord to correct the error, either by omitting the paragraph altogether, or by altering the phraseology of it, so as to avoid this direct approbation of a treaty, of which the House knew nothing. There were many topics connected with the domestic policy of the country which, though slightly mentioned in the Speech, were still of great importance. From the terms of the Speech, no indication of the intentions of government regarding them could be discovered. Mere truisms were stated; but, for that generality of language, he did not find fault with the government. Reference was made to the best means of improving the municipal police of the kingdom, but it was impossible to say what was the nature and character of the improvements contemplated. The subject was a most important one; in fact, there was none more so, and it was well worthy the attention of the legislature; but it was impossible, from the King's Speech, to know any thing of the character of the alterations to be suggested by government. Of this conduct he did not complain. It was perhaps convenient, that the views of government should not be intimated till they could be fully detailed. The mere allusion to the subject, however, naturally occasioned various constructions as to the intentions of ministers. It was supposed by some that they contemplated the total supersession of corporate authority. He must presume that this construction was totally erroneous; at the same time, he certainly thought some material alteration in the municipal police absolutely necessary. In the large towns he could see no security for property and the maintenance of order unless some change was effected. He apprehended the passage hinted at an extension of the principle upon which the metropolitan police was formed; and, if it did so, it certainly would have his cordial approval. Unless a stipendiary police was established in the large towns, there could be no security for good order. Under what authority that police should be placed, he was not prepared to say. In London the matter was easily settled. It was wisely placed under the authority of the executive power, who kept it free from all party and electioneering influence, which, if not effectually excluded, would make the police, not a blessing, but a curse. With respect to Unions, he entirely concurred with that part of the Address which went to assure his Majesty, that that House would give its best aid and assistance to enable his Majesty to uphold the laws, and to maintain tranquillity and good order. The law must be enforced; life and property must be protected; and when the law was found to be inefficient for its objects, he was quite confident that his Majesty might with safety rely on receiving the most prompt and zealous assistance at the hands of that House. With respect to the improvement of the municipal police, however, he must remark, that there was already an Act in existence which bore upon that subject. That Act was passed in 1830, and it enabled every parish, upon the consent of a certain portion of the parishioners being obtained, to establish a stipendiary police, and to raise a rate for its support, and for the lighting of the parish. That Act was not generally known; but, in the parishes with which he had any connection, and from which he had received applications on the subject, he had recommended that it should be put in practice. The allusion, however, made in the King's Speech to the subject would naturally paralyse that recommendation; for every one would be desirous to know what were the plans of government, and what alterations they might expect before they attempted to proceed upon the Act to which he had referred. He had reserved for the last, the first and the most important subject noticed in the Speech and in the Address—it was that of Reform. The Address pledged the House to a most careful consideration of the measures which the Speech informed them would be laid before the House for a reform in the Commons' House of parliament; and it concurred in the declaration of the Speech, that a speedy and satisfactory settlement of that question became daily of more serious importance to the security of the state, and to the contentment and welfare of the people. As he had the assurance of the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary for Ireland, that by this language the House was not to be considered as pledged to any particular measure, or to any particular principles of reform, he did not feel inclined to remark upon the passage with any thing like hypercriticism. Every one must desire, who wished well to his country, to come to a speedy and satisfactory settlement of that important question; but various indeed would be the opinions as to the nature and extent of that reform which would entitle it to the appellation of satisfactory. No outline of the measure had been stated to the House, and he had no means of knowing whether it was to resemble closely the bill of last session, or whether it was to vary materially from that bill in principle or in detail. Nor did he stop to enquire into the subject, for in a few days, they had reason to expect, the measure would be formally and regularly submitted to their consideration; but he must, at the same time, be permitted to say, that, although he most fervently desired a speedy and satisfactory settlement of the question, he very much feared that the government had agitated feelings, and excited desires and expectations, which utterly precluded the expectation of their arriving at any such

of government, it might have been just and necessary to abstain from the immediate recognition of his authority, but such a course of proceeding could not be indefinitely protracted without inconvenience to ourselves, and danger to the general peace of Europe. Whatever might be the private character of Don Miguel, that was a question with which the British government had nothing whatever to do. If fit for consideration at all, it was fit only for the consideration of the Portuguese nation; and he was entirely at a loss to understand upon what principles, but especially how upon Whig principles, his Majesty's ministers could longer withhold the recognition of a prince to whose rule there was no objection made on the part of his own people. But whether the authority of Don Miguel was acknowledged by this country or not, on one thing the noble lord might depend, which was, that while the present state of uncertainty and interrupted relations between the two countries continued to exist—while this country claimed the fulfilment of treaties, refusing at the same time to allow the validity of the authority which was to put those treaties into execution, it placed its own subjects in danger, and embarrassed its own commerce. It had a more than ordinary effect at the present time. Did the noble lord consider the consequence of such conduct? Did it not encourage the contest that was threatened for the throne of Portugal? That was the natural result of still withholding the recognition of Don Miguel. There might have been injuries inflicted on British subjects in Portugal; what those injuries were, whether they were old or new, the speech did not state, and he did not stop to enquire; but he contended that the conduct of the government in refusing to acknowledge Don Miguel after the lapse of so long a period since his accession, had a tendency to produce the very evils, the existence of which the King's Speech admitted and lamented—namely, embarrassment to our own commerce with Portugal, and the risk of a disputed succession. If a contest for the throne of Portugal were to take place, if civil war were to rage in that country, he most earnestly hoped that this country would sincerely act up to those principles of perfect neutrality which it had avowed; that it would not only profess, but that it would act in the spirit of its professions. Now, a few words with regard to Holland. His Majesty had expressed his hopes, that the king of Holland would accede to the arrangement for the separation of the States of Holland and Belgium, to which the king of Belgium had already assented. He sincerely hoped, that these expectations of his Majesty would not be disappointed. He likewise sincerely hoped, that that arrangement steered clear of all interference in the internal affairs of Holland; but, until some account of the transactions connected with that arrangement was communicated to the House, it would be premature in him to give any opinion on a subject of such peculiar delicacy. He was now arrived at that part of the Address to which he intended to propose an amendment. result. If he felt otherwise—if he believed that the passing of such a bill as that of last session would soothe the minds which had been agitated, and would lead the people back to their habitual obedience to the laws, and respect and regard for the institutions which would remain to them, many of his objections would be removed. But it was his conscientious belief, that the principles of the bill itself involved insuperable impediments to the speedy and satisfactory settlement of the question of reform. He believed, that the impulse which had been given to violence and discontent could not be easily allayed, and it was from that feeling, and from observing the principles upon which the government had rested the defence of their proceedings, that he found it impossible to anticipate a speedy and satisfactory settlement of this most important question. He was at issue with the government as to the causes and nature of the excitement existing. The advocates of reform, of course, said, that he, and those who acted with him in opposition to the late bill, had, by their conduct, given rise to the scenes of outrage and of violence which had taken place; while he contended, that those proceedings, disgraceful and dangerous as they were, were the almost necessary consequence of the principles which the government had called into action for its support. The foundations of the ancient institutions of the country could not be shaken without producing the greatest derangement in the whole body politic, and this derangement, he feared, would survive the measure which brought it into existence. Let the House look to the King's Speech, and learn the present state of the country from that authentic document. Commerce embarrassed, confidence suspended, industry paralysed, formidable combinations inconsistent with the spirit of the law—fearful outrage and disorder, by which whole cities have been involved in confusion. Are these the first fruits of reform? Is this the consequence of holding up to contempt the ancient representative system of the country? Did he find any thing in the Speech about the reduction of taxation? Or was it stated in the Speech, that the estimates would be reduced? No such thing. He did not blame the ministers for this. For he believed, that the estimates were framed with a view to economy; but he did blame those who misled the public, by inducing it to suppose that the passing of such a Reform Bill as that of last session would relieve the country, restore tranquillity and contentment, increase commerce and employment, and give security to liberty and property. He had no hope of true economy from reform—from such reform as that which had been proposed by the government, and which would unsettle all the habits of obedience, and shake the constitution to its very foundation. He had heard the sarcastic remarks of an hon. gentleman opposite, respecting Tory governments and Tory measures. The hon. gentleman called upon him, and those who agreed with him in opinion, to attend at the public meetings, and to discuss the question of reform with the multitudes assembled at those meetings—to attend, for instance, where there was an assembly of 150,000 men, such an assembly as had received the thanks of the noble lords, and there to express their opinions if they dared. The sarcasm fell harmless upon them—it was against the bill that it was levelled. It reminded them of the melancholy fact, that there never had been a period, during the whole of the past century, in which such effectual practical restrictions were imposed upon the freedom of speech, in which public discussion was so fettered as it was in these days of liberality and reform. There were worse tyrannies than the tyrannies of individual despots. He had said the worst feelings had been excited for the support of this measure of reform; and could the government deny the existence of such feelings? Who could doubt their galling and oppressive character, who had seen the bitter and unrelenting animosity with which the populace had pursued many of those illustrious characters who acted the part of good subjects and honest men in the House of Lords, without the least suspicion of unworthy motives? And yet could it be denied, that it was not safe for them to travel home to their country seats, after the conscientious votes which they had given in defence of the true interests of the people of England? When the new measure of reform should come under discussion, he, for one, promised to give to it the most calm and dispassionate attention. He wished that he could anticipate from its success the same tranquillizing and satisfactory results as had been anticipated by the king's government. He wished, that he could believe that the spirit of impatience under all restraint, and the reluctance to submit to any control, which at present pervaded and convulsed the land, was attributable to such causes as the opposition which had been given to the progress of the late bill; and that the triumph, if triumph should betide, over future opposition, would bring back the halcyon days of peace and contentment, and restore that spirit of obedience to the laws which had existed under the reviled government of Tories. He had attended to the progress of great revolutions in other countries, and was not insensible to their symptoms in our own. For a time the disastrous scenes of confusion and bloodshed which were displayed in France to an appalled and astonished world, and the establishment of a Reign of Terror surpassing in atrocity any thing heretofore known in history, exerted possibly an undue influence upon the public mind here, and indisposed us to the consideration even of beneficial changes. But let us beware how we erred in the opposite extreme, and rejected the salutary lessons which we might learn from the earlier scenes of the revolution in France. Long before the bloody days of Marat and of Danton, there were pages in the history of that revolution which were but too faithful types of the events of present times. Therein we might read of ministers, once popular, unable to stem the tide on which they had floated to power, denouncing the clubs that were formed for their support, but which usurped their authority. "Death to the proposer of an agrarian law," was the language of the constituent assembly. He had read also in the same melancholy collection of crimes and horrors, that when the King of France accepted the constitution of 1791, he began his speech with the terms, "La révolution est finie," little dreaming, in the exultation of the moment, that the revolution was only then begun. The blame of opposing its progress was then thrown on priests and aristocrats. The cry in France then was, "Down with the Priests, down with the Aristocrats;" the cry in England now was, "Down with the Boroughmongers," "Down with those, be their motives what they may, who oppose the popular will." What system of government could that be in which men denied to their opponents the free exercise of judgment and of speech? Who could hope to propose changes extensive as those of the Reform Bill, without expecting, if they were reasonable men, to encounter opposition? They might denounce that opposition—might visit it with confiscation, exile, and death; but so long as honour and courage existed among men (and in English bosoms he trusted these qualities would find an eternal spring)—they would not, they could not, deter men from the expression of their honest opinions. It was with a spirit of calmness and impartiality that he was prepared to discuss the bill which the noble lord opposite was about to introduce. He trusted that it would be founded on more moderate principles than the last; but be it founded on what principles it might, he owed it as a duty to the people of England—he claimed it as a right inherent in himself, as one of their representatives—to deliver his opinions honestly and boldly upon it; and as the King, in the gracious Speech which they had that day heard delivered from the throne, admitted the right of his subjects, even in confederated unions, publicly to declare their opinions, and to make known their grievances, so did he, as a loyal subject of the King, expect protection in return for his allegiance, if he should incur odium and unpopularity by protecting that which, in his judgment, he believed to be the real interest of the people of England, against their present wishes and temporary delusion.

The address, with the amendment suggested by Sir Robert Peel, was then agreed to.

REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

DECEMBER 7, 1831.

Lord Cavendish brought up the report on the Address in answer to his Majesty's Speech.

After some remarks by Viscount Palmerston, Mr. Hunt, and Sir Francis Burdett,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had listened with great surprise to the very extraordinary speech which the hon. baronet, the member for Westminster (Sir F. Burdett), had just made. As the hon. baronet had been in his place last night, he had then an opportunity of replying to the speech he had now replied to, and it would have been better if the hon. baronet had taken that opportunity of making the animadversions which he had reserved till the present occasion. Notwithstanding the hon. baronet's censures, he would repeat that which he had yesterday said—for it was a remark in which the noble lord (Lord Althorp) opposite had concurred—that parliament ought to have had a longer notice than fourteen days of the period on which it was to assemble. The noble lord had only vindicated the shortness of the notice on the ground of necessity; and so far was the noble lord from having stated that his objection was merely a cavil, as the hon. baronet had called it—

Sir Francis Burdett: I said no such thing. I said that nothing but the circumstances of the case justified the shortness of the notice.

Sir Robert Peel thought, that the hon. baronet had said, that his objection was only a cavil, and that nothing could justify it. The hon. baronet had now stated the reverse, and was prepared to condemn a meeting of parliament, without the usual notice, except under very special circumstances; but why, then, did the hon. baronet speak of fourteen days now being equal to twenty-three days in 1797? The increased rapidity of conveyance, if this argument was good for any thing, went to justify a short notice as a practice that might properly be observed, not only now, but at all future times, whatever might be the circumstances, if the minister of the day fancied he could gain any advantage by acting on the precedent. He had never blamed ministers for calling the parliament together at this season: all that he had said was, that reform being the only alleged cause for its meeting, ministers had an opportunity, more than fourteen days before, of giving notice that it was to meet now. He should not have objected to their meeting at present, after only fourteen days' notice, if any sudden disturbance had sprung up in the country; but his objection was, that the necessity of settling the question of reform was as obvious on the 1st as it was on the 22nd of November. He had said yesterday that he was afraid, that the Reform Bill was proposed and supported upon principles which precluded any thing like a final settlement of the question; and he was confirmed in that impression by the speech of the hon. baronet, who contended that the people had as much right to equal representation in that House as the king had to his crown, or as the peers had to their seats in the other House of Parliament. Now, if such were the case, he should like to know what right the hon. baronet had to draw the arbitrary distinction which he had drawn between such of the people of England as were £10 householders, and such as were not. If equal representation was the right of all—what could be said of this Reform bill—which divided the people into classes, and limited the right of being directly represented to the occupation of a £10 house? He denied the existence of the right, either on one side or the other of the line of demarcation. But how the hon. member for Westminster, who claimed the elective franchise as the prescriptive right of the people of England, could tell him, that this bill, which confined the elective franchise to £10 householders, would be a final settlement of the question, he could not for his life understand. He would beg leave to say one word about the Unions. The hon. baronet had complained of the tone in which he had spoken regarding them. Why, it was the very tone taken in that Speech from the throne, which the hon. baronet so much admired. What were the words used by his Majesty on the subject:—"Sincerely attached to our free constitution, I never can sanction any interference with the legitimate exercise of those rights which secure to my people the privileges of discussing and making known their grievances; but in respecting these rights, it is also my duty to prevent combinations, under whatever pretence, which in their form and character are incompatible with all regular government, and are equally opposed to the spirit and to the provisions of the law; and I know that I shall not appeal in vain to my faithful subjects, to second my determined resolution to repress all illegal proceedings, by which the peace and security of my dominions may be endangered." The hon. baronet had said, that he defied any person to prove, that the Unions were incompatible with regular government, and were opposed either to the spirit or the provisions of the law. He would only say, in reply to the hon. baronet, that the king, for whom the hon. baronet professed such sincere respect, asserted, that he knew of the existence of Unions confederating in England to oppose both the spirit and the provisions of the law. He did not mean to say, that the particular Political Union of which the hon. member for Westminster was a member, was opposed to the law, but he took it for granted that the king would never have declared his determination to suppress certain combinations, unless such combinations existed, and unless their continued existence was fraught with danger. The attack on them did not originate with him—they were denounced, no doubt for some good reason, by his Majesty, in his speech to parliament. As he did not wish to revive the discussion, which ought to have closed last night, he would not enter further into these subjects at present. As he was, however, on his legs, he would state to the noble lord opposite (Palmerston), that there were two points connected with our foreign policy, on which he required some information. The first was, whether the government of the United States had acquiesced in the adjudication made by the king of the Netherlands, on the question submitted to his arbitration respecting the North-eastern boundary of the United States? If the negotiations on that subject were not yet concluded, he would not insist upon an answer. The second point, on which he was going to propound a question, was one on which he was surprised that no observation had been made in the king's speech. It related to the condition of Greece. He was surprised, that after the repeated mention which had been made of the condition of Greece, in the speeches from the throne, and after the singular events which had recently taken place there, no notice of Greece should be found in the speech. He asked, whether the circumstances of the country were such as would enable the noble lord to give him an answer upon these points?

Viscount Palmerston: As to the first question put to me by the right hon. baronet, I can only say, that the decision made by the king of the Netherlands is to be submitted to the Congress on the first Monday of next month; and that I cannot make any communication upon that subject until after that time. As to the question which he has put to me respecting Greece, the reason why no mention was made of that country in the speech is, that the matters connected with it, under the consideration of the conference, are not at present in such a state as would justify the government in giving any final answer on that point. My right hon. friend must know, that the most important matter is the selection of the sovereign for that country, which has not yet been made. I can assure my right hon. friend, that when the progress of our measures shall allow us to make a communication to parliament, we shall be most happy to make it, and to accompany it with the fullest disclosures.

The report on the address was then agreed to, and the address ordered to be presented to his Majesty.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

DECEMBER 12, 1831.

On the introduction of the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England and Wales, Lord John Russell moved that that part of the King's Speech which related to Reform in Parliament should be read. It was read, accordingly, as follows:—"I feel it to be my duty, in the first place, to recommend to your most careful consideration, the measures which will be proposed to you for a reform in the Commons House of Parliament. A speedy and satisfactory settlement of this question, becomes daily of more pressing importance to the security of the state, and to the contentment and welfare of my people."

He then alluded to that portion of the address in which the House—without coming to a division—had pledged itself to a careful consideration of the measure which should be proposed to it for a reform in the Commons House of Parliament, and concluded a long and elaborate speech by moving for leave to bring in, "A bill to amend the representation of the people in England and Wales."

SIR ROBERT PEELE rose for the purpose of requesting that the noble lord (Althorp) would be pleased to state, what course he proposed to adopt with respect to the progress of the bill through the House.

Lord Althorp said, that if the House should agree to allow the bill to be introduced and read a first time on this evening, he should propose to carry it no further than the second reading before the Christmas recess. After the bill should have been read a second time, he would move the adjournment of the House till after the holidays. As to the day to be fixed for the second reading, he thought, that as the bill would be prepared and ready for delivery to members early on Wednesday, it would not be too soon to fix the second reading for Friday. There would, he thought, be the less objection to this course, as the bill had been so fully discussed in the last session, and no alteration was now proposed in the principle. He should hope, that if it were not intended to take the sense of the House in the present stage of the bill, the discussion might be reserved for the second reading.

Sir Robert Peel said, that speaking for himself only, without saying whether Friday would or would not be a convenient day, he was not disposed to take any division on the motion for leave to bring in the bill; and was willing to let the discussion be taken on the second reading. If the House took the same view of the subject, and he believed it was disposed to allow the bill to be brought in, any discussion at present would only anticipate that which must take place in the next stage, and would be at once unprofitable and inconvenient. On that occasion they would have to discuss those great questions which the noble lord had omitted to notice, namely, the necessity of making this extensive change; whether that necessity, if it existed, arose from the nature of things, or from the conduct of his Majesty's ministers; whether the real motive for the reform bill was the practical permanent good it was to effect, or the temporary advantage of yielding to a clamour for reform, which had been mainly encouraged by the ministers themselves. These were questions which must be discussed on the second reading; but without entering into any of them on the present occasion, there was one feeling, which it was vain to suppress—one in which there must be general and unanimous concurrence on all sides—that of rejoicing at the great escape they had had from the bill of last session; a feeling of the deepest and sincerest gratitude to those to whom they were indebted for rescue from a danger which he had never fully appreciated till he heard the speech which the noble lord (Lord John Russell) had just delivered. He would not say by what mode the House ought to express its thanks for that escape, and for the opportunity once more afforded to it of again deliberating on the important change proposed in the constitution of the country; but this he did know, that the speech of the noble lord, and the new bill, now moved and about to be introduced, were a full and complete answer to the calumnies of the last session, against the factious delays, as they were then called, of those who sought to introduce those very modifications which were now relied on as the great improvements of the bill. The advantage of those much maligned delays and objections was now visible. He saw it in many places; for, on hearing the outline of the new bill, he found that there was scarcely an amendment which had been offered from that (the Opposition) side of the House, which had not been adopted. (The principle of population was abandoned—the census of the present year was preferred to the census of 1821—the rights of freemen by birth or servitude were preserved—schedule A was re-modelled—schedule B was totally changed, and many other modifications, which the opposition had struggled in vain to introduce last session, were now voluntarily admitted by the noble lord as so many improvements in his plan of reform. Even the commissioners, whom the ministers had so strenuously preserved last session, were now to be given up. He would not go into the other changes which the noble lord had mentioned: he would not stop to enquire why, when five boroughs were taken out of schedule A, as many more should be added, so as to make it contain the exact arbitrary number of fifty-six, as it stood in the last bill, when clearly fifty-one was the proper number, according to the shewing of the noble lord himself. He would not examine why the number of boroughs having but one member each should be reduced from sixty-nine to forty-nine; nor would he enter into any enquiry as to the cause of the change in the right of voting in cities and counties; but leaving all these as matters for future discussion, he must congratulate himself and his right hon. friends on the opposition they made to the last bill, of the beneficial effects of which they had now such unquestionable proofs. He admired the candour and justice of the noble lord, in commenting so severely on the blunders and defects of the late bill; but he owned he was not prepared for such a sacrifice to the manes of the late parliament as the adoption of the resolutions of General Gascoyne.

An Hon. Member on the ministerial side here intimated, that that resolution was not adopted in the new bill.

Sir Robert Peel had no desire to misrepresent what fell from the noble lord, but he had distinctly understood him to say, that the present number of members in the House, 658, would be preserved. If he had misunderstood the noble lord, he would of course set him right.

Lord John Russell said, that he had stated his intention to preserve 500 members for England and Wales; to have 105 for Ireland, and 53 for Scotland.

Sir Robert Peel: Which numbers, as he calculated them, would exactly make up the present number of the House. Now, what were the words of General Gascoyne's resolution but these? "That it is the opinion of this House, that the total number of knights, citizens, and burgesses, returned to Parliament for that part of the United Kingdom called England and Wales, ought not to be diminished." He had understood the noble lord to say, that he intended to preserve the present numbers; and what, he would ask, was that but the adoption of the resolution of General Gascoyne? As to the proportion of members to be given to Ireland and Scotland, he would only observe at present, that they should be able to form a more correct judgment of the bill for England and Wales, if, before they proceeded to its consideration, they were informed of what was intended to be done with respect to the Scotch and Irish bills. The noble lord had told them, that he still adhered to the £10 clause. He cared little for the name: the name might be preserved, and yet the character and nature of the qualification professing to pass under that name might be totally changed. The circumstances under which the occupier of a £10 house would be entitled to vote, were the only questions worth considering. He had not risen for the purpose of entering into an examination, or of seeking for any present explanation from the noble lord, as to any part of the bill. He rose chiefly to vindicate himself and his hon. friends for the course they took last session, in opposing the bill then before parliament. After all that had been said, in the House and out of the House, as to the nature and alleged object of that opposition, what was at length the result? Why, that it was now declared to be the deliberate conviction of the king's government, that the objections the opposition then took were well founded. On this important question of the formation of a new constitution for the country, they now saw that the objections then urged were not without their important use, and that the delay of a few months could not now be considered what it had then been so constantly held up to be, as time thrown away. In a measure of this magnitude, an attention to the most minute details was of the utmost importance; and the alterations in the new bill proved, that when they came to discuss matters of such extreme interest, involving the organization of a new frame of government, they were bound to proceed most warily and discreetly, and not to grudge the delay of a few months employed in preparing the materials out of which a new constitution was to be moulded. Why the opportunity was not taken last session to effect the alterations which were now proposed, it was not for him to say; but that such an opportunity then presented itself could be no more denied than that such an opportunity at present existed. Whatever might be his objections to the bill which was now about to be introduced, he rejoiced, for the sake of the character of those on that side of the House with whom he had the honour to act, that such a triumphant refutation had been brought forward of charges which had been made against them. He rejoiced at the delay which had taken place, not only on account of the amendments which had been made in the details of the bill, but because—if the House should determine, on the second reading of the bill, to adopt the principle of the measure, and to make so extraordinary and extensive a change in the frame and constitution of the government of this country, they would be enabled to follow the example of the king's government, and make still further improvements in the details of the bill. Another, and, as it appeared to him, a great advantage arising from that delay was, that they would now have an opportunity of discussing this important question in a state of greater calmness, influenced by less excited feelings, and altogether under circumstances better calculated to enable the House to arrive at a wise and dispassionate conclusion. It could not, certainly, be denied that this was a subject which, above all others, was deserving of a calm, and deliberate, and cool consideration. If it were true that upon subjects of comparative indifference—upon matters infinitely less extensive in their bearings upon the interests and welfare of the country at large, discussion was to be deprecated at a time when public excitement and agitation prevailed with regard to them—if it were fit, according to the just doctrines of the Lord Chancellor, that even in regulating the practice of anatomy—even in taking precautions against the continued commission of foul and systematic murder, discussion should be postponed until the first burst of indignation and alarm had subsided—surely it was at least equally fit, that when that living and nobler subject, the constitution, was to be submitted to the amputation and dissection of, he must say, not very experienced practitioners, the most delicate operations should not be performed while their passions were heated, and their judgment disturbed by external clamour, and while their hands were yet trembling with the fever of an unusual and unnatural excitement. Greatly, therefore, did he rejoice at what had occurred at the close of last session, and highly gratified was he that they should be enabled to benefit by the suggestions which had been then made; and that, in consequence of the delay which had taken place with respect to this measure, they could now, on both sides of the House, approach the consideration of the subject with that calmness, good temper, and moderation, which the subject demanded and deserved. The noble lord who introduced the motion to the House, said, that an absolute necessity existed for the speedy and satisfactory settlement of this question. The noble lord said, that extravagant hopes had been excited—that undue apprehensions had been encouraged—and that there was no safe alternative but to turn the expectations of the people into realities. That statement of the noble lord was a decisive proof how cautious a responsible government ought to be, not to encourage expectations which it might find impossible to satisfy, and not to take a course that necessarily led to agitation and excitement which it might find it difficult to allay. The assertion of the noble lord reminded him of what he had heard from the noble lord opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), towards the conclusion of the last session. That noble lord then told them, that when his Majesty's ministers first proposed the measure of reform, they did not expect that it would be carried by the House of Commons. It was a remarkable circumstance, indeed, that when such a question was to be brought forward, his Majesty's government should not attempt the settlement of it by means of the free and unbiassed judgment of both Houses of parliament, but that they should, in the first instance, introduce a measure which they expected would be rejected by the House of Commons. ["No, no," from Lord Althorp.] He might have mistaken what had fallen from the noble lord on the occasion to which he alluded; but on one of the last days of the session he did understand the noble lord to say, that when the measure of reform was first brought forward, so little did the government reckon upon the success of their measure, that they expected their bill would be at once rejected. He for one deeply regretted, however opposed he was to hon. gentlemen on the other side as to the extent and necessity of reform, that the same moderation and temper which distinguished the speech of the noble lord that night, had not prevailed in the councils of the king's government when this question had been first introduced. Whether they were to expect from the tone of the noble lord to-night, that considerable modifications would yet be allowed in the bill, he did not know; but of this he felt convinced, that he should best perform his duty to the people of this country by viewing such a measure as this, not in its present operation, but in its ultimate and permanent effects; and, if he thought it would be ultimately and permanently prejudicial to the welfare of the country, by giving to the principle of this bill a steady, and firm, though, as he was unwilling to prolong agitation, a reluctant opposition.

Later in the evening,—

Sir Robert Peel asked, whether, if the debate upon the second reading of the bill were not concluded on Friday night, it was the intention of ministers to sit on Saturday? If that were the case, and the discussion were protracted, the Sabbath might be broken in upon. He begged, therefore, to remind them of the great inconvenience of sitting on that day, and trusted they would accordingly postpone the discussion until Monday.

Lord Althorp admitted the inconvenience, but, if the debate lasted more than one night, he should certainly propose to sit at an early hour on Saturday.

Sir Robert Peel again suggested that the second reading should be postponed till Monday.

In reply to Sir Charles Wetherell, who stated that the hon. member for Dorsetshire

(Mr. Portman) had drawn marvellously large conclusions from very contracted and confined premises; and promised the right hon. baronet his unflinching opposition to the bill,—

Sir Robert Peel said, he should be ashamed of himself if he could be supposed capable of seeking to induce hon. members to vote with him by any twisting or unworthy modification of his opinions; and he should also be ashamed of himself if it could be thought, that if other hon. members saw reasons to modify their opinions, he should therefore charge them with inconsistency. If his noble friend (Lord Clive) should differ from him with respect to the great measure shortly to be before them, he would give his noble friend full credit for his motives, and their friendly intercourse would receive no interruption. For his own part, he could not consider the alterations which had been made in the proposed bill from that discussed last session—though they were improvements, and suggested by the opponents of that bill—such as to do away with the main objections which he had stated to the former measure. Indeed, he took it for granted that no statement could be more painful to the ministers, than one which went to prove, that there were any important changes in the spirit and principle of their measure. That, however, was not the occasion to state his views on this head. All he would then say was, that when the noble lord (Althorp) stated, that ministers could not think of proposing a measure of reform less efficient than the last, he did not expect that such alterations and concessions would have been made as would have induced those on the opposition side of the House to support it at all. Whatever other hon. members might do, he should oppose the second reading.

The bill was read a first time.

TITHES (IRELAND.)

DECEMBER 14, 1831.

Mr. Hume said, that in consequence of a return having been ordered on a former evening, on the motion of the hon. member for the University of Oxford (Sir Robert Inglis), respecting the Tithes which were the property of laymen in Ireland, he wished, in order that the returns might be complete, to obtain a similar return respecting the Tithes which were in the hands of churchmen in that country. He therefore begged leave to move, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House a return, by the registrar in each diocese in Ireland, of the number of parishes, the tithes of which, or a modus, are in whole or in part the property of and paid to the use of any Bishop or person in holy orders, specifying the name of such Bishop or person in holy orders, and the amount of the income which he has derived from tithes, or from a modus, from each such parish or extra-parochial place, on the average of the last three years on account of tithes and modus, stating, if under the Tithe Composition Act, or not; distinguishing whether the tithes be rectorial or vicarial, and the amount levied on arable and pasture land, respectively."

Mr. Crampton said, that as it was impossible that any return could be made to either motion, he thought it advisable that the hon. member for Oxford should move that his order be rescinded, and then perhaps the hon. member for Middlesex would not object to withdraw his motion.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he entirely acquiesced in the very sensible and judicious view of this question which had been taken by the Solicitor-general for Ireland (Mr. Crampton). If the motion of his hon. friend, the member for the University of Oxford, was persevered in, for a return from the lay impropiators, that furnished a sufficient precedent for a return of tithes held by the clergy; but there were strong objections to publish the names of the clerical holders of tithes in the present excited state of the public mind. As the secretary of state for Ireland had given notice of a motion relating to tithes, perhaps the whole question had better be left in his hands. At all events, he should recommend his hon. friend to give notice to have his order cancelled, and he had no doubt the hon. member for Middlesex would withdraw that before the House.

In reply to Mr. Sheil,—

Sir Robert Peel said, there was a great difference between the returns now sought for, and those made pursuant to act of parliament. Under the Tithe Composition Act, the amount was registered, and there could be no difficulty in obtaining it in each case.

The motion was withdrawn, and Sir Robert Inglis gave notice that he would move to have his order rescinded.

REFORM PETITION.

DECEMBER 16, 1831.

Mr. Warburton presented a petition from a body of persons calling themselves members of the National Political Union, in Council assembled, against any clause of the Reform Bill which should require the payment of rent or taxes as qualification to vote for members to serve in parliament.

The question being put that the petition be brought up,—

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that before the petition was brought up, he must beg leave to call the attention of the House more particularly to it. The petition professed to be the petition of the members of the council of a society called the National Political Union, in council assembled, and it appeared to him impossible for the House to recognise such a body. He therefore felt it his duty, as many other petitions of the same nature might be presented, to call the attention of the House to the point, which appeared to him to be of considerable importance, particularly when he referred to his Majesty's proclamation; for although he was not prepared to say whether or not this particular body came within the scope of that proclamation, yet, as such a proclamation had been issued from the highest authority in the state, mentioning that societies under the denomination of Political Unions had been found contrary to the letter and the spirit of the law, he thought the House ought to be careful how it contravened that law, by recognising the acts of any such societies. He was of opinion that the House could not receive a petition from those parties, except as the petition of the individuals. When they addressed the House as members of the Council of a Political Union, in council assembled, the House ought to be cautious how it gave a sanction to the petition of persons assuming such a title.

Mr. Warburton said, that although on many occasions petitions were presented from persons claiming to sign them as members of certain societies, the House had never objected to receive them on that account. It was as the petition of the individuals that he presented the present petition. He was not aware that any illegal act had been committed by the members of the Union; on the contrary, he believed that they had not infringed on any Act of Parliament.

Sir Robert Peel said, he had disclaimed saying that they had been guilty of any illegal act; but the petition expressly set forth that it was the petition of members of the Council of a Political Union, in council assembled. His Majesty's proclamation, which he had sent for immediately on seeing the title of the petition, described the illegal unions as consisting of members subject to the control and direction of a superior Committee or Council. He therefore thought that the House ought to be cautious not to give a body which might fall under that designation the power of approaching it.

Mr. Warburton would, with the leave of the House, withdraw the petition for the present, but not with the intention of withdrawing it wholly, for he would present it on a future day.

Sir Robert Peel would meet the proposition of the hon. gentleman in the spirit in which he made it, and would not oppose the withdrawing the motion, although he might do so.

Petition withdrawn.

RUSSIAN DUTCH LOANS.

DECEMBER 16, 1831.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he was sorry to interpose a moment's delay before the debate on the Reform Bill commenced; but, with the consent of the noble lord opposite, he was going to put a question upon a matter totally unconnected with reform. He should not put this question now, if it did not involve a point (as it appeared to him) of considerable constitutional importance, the elucidation of which ought not to be postponed. However, in order to avoid, as far as he could, the possibility of a discussion, he should abstain from making any observations except such as were necessary to render the matter intelligible. He referred to that loan which was called the Russian Loan. The original circumstances under which that loan was entered into, it was unnecessary for him to detail; but it would be remembered by the House, that, in the year 1815, we contracted with the king of the Netherlands, and the emperor of Russia, to pay the interest upon a proportion of that loan, which amounted in the whole to upwards of two millions. An Act of Parliament was accordingly passed, which authorized the Treasury to continue the payment of the interest, conformably to our engagement. In order to ascertain whether we were bound, consistently with law, to continue that payment, it was necessary to understand precisely what was the nature of our engagement. The original amount of the loan was 25,600,000 Dutch guilders, which was rather more than £2,000,000 sterling; and we had consented to pay the interest of one-third of that sum. But an express engagement was entered into, that we should not be called upon to pay the interest after the possession and sovereignty of the Belgian provinces should be severed from the kingdom of Holland. He apprehended that the possession and sovereignty of those territories had been for a considerable time past so severed. On the 21st of June, in the present year, in the speech delivered to parliament, his Majesty recognised the right of the people of Belgium to make their own internal regulations, and to settle the government of their country according to their own views. Therefore, on the 21st of June, his Majesty admitted the de facto separation of the two kingdoms. Now, what he wished to ask the noble lord was, whether directions had been given for the payment of the interest upon the Dutch loan up to the present day, or to the next time when it would become payable; and if not, whether he did not consider it important to obtain the sanction of parliament to the payment, if it were to be continued? On the policy of continuing the payment he said nothing; but, in conformity with the letter and spirit of the law, he conceived that there was no authority in the Treasury to continue it.

Lord Althorp stated, that it was the opinion of his Majesty's ministers, and of the law-officers of the Crown, that they were bound to continue the payment.

Sir Robert Peel said, the noble lord had entirely misunderstood him. He was not considering whether it was consistent with the honour and good faith of the country to continue the payment, but whether it was consistent with the law. He wished to know whether the Exchequer was warranted by the Act of Parliament in issuing the public money; and he entreated the attention of the noble lord and of the House to the subject, and begged them to consider whether parliament ought to separate without giving an express sanction to the proceedings of his Majesty's government.

Later in the evening,—

Sir Robert Peel did not wish to appear captious; but really the matter seemed to him so clear, and at the same time so important, that he thought it better to state fully his views at once, than afterwards to turn round upon his Majesty's ministers, and make an accusation against them:—The Convention said, "It is understood and agreed between the high contracting parties, that the said payments on the part of their Majesties the king of the Netherlands, and the king of Great Britain, shall cease and determine, should the possession and sovereignty of the Belgic provinces at any time pass or be severed from the dominions of his Majesty the king of the Netherlands, previous to the complete liquidation of the same." The Act of Parliament said, that the payments should continue only so long as the engagements entered into in the Convention were continued. Now, the sovereignty of the Belgian provinces had passed away from the king of Holland more than six months ago, and the debt had not been liquidated. Whatever honour or policy, therefore, might dictate, he doubted that the Exchequer had authority to continue those payments.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

DECEMBER 17, 1831.

On the motion of Lord John Russell, the Order of the day was read for resuming the debate upon the second reading of the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England.

In the debate which followed,—

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that at that late hour of the night, and in that stage of the debate, when so short a time was left for discussion, unless that discussion were (contrary to the usual practice) protracted into the morning of Sunday, he should have desired at once to address himself to those arguments in favour of this measure which remained unanswered, without referring to any matters of a private or personal nature. But the speech of the learned member for Calne (Mr. Macaulay) who, for the fourth time, had thought it desirable to introduce topics unconnected with the merits of the question, and who had addressed himself in a manner purely personal to him—compelled him to adopt a different course; for he should be unworthy of the situation which he held in that House, if he permitted the debate to close without reference to those topics. He thought, that the learned gentleman, having already, in the three speeches he had made in favour of reform, taunted him on the subject of the Catholic question, might have left that subject at rest. But the learned gentleman again returned to the charge, bursting with all the “sweltering venom” which had been collecting during the days and nights that had passed since the last attack.

The hon. member had charged him with having been guilty of ingratitude towards the present ministry in the course he had been pursuing. The hon. gentleman said, “When you proposed the Catholic question, they who had before brought it forward, handsomely gave you their cordial support; and when they bring forward the Reform Bill, why do not you return the compliment, and support reform?” What exalted notions of public duty the learned gentleman must have! He makes it a matter of courtesy and civility; a sort of interchange of compliments. But the learned gentleman overlooked the essential difference in the two cases. The gentlemen opposite supported the Roman Catholic Relief Bill when brought forward by him (Sir R. Peel) because they had always supported it. Had he supported reform? No, never; and yet the learned gentleman contended that he ought to support it now, not from conviction, but from gratitude.

The learned gentleman’s charge amounted to a charge of gross and corrupt apostasy. He accused him (Sir R. Peel) of having brought forward, first, the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and secondly, the Roman Catholic Relief Bill—not from a sense of public duty, but from the mere love of the power or emoluments of office, and the desire to appropriate to himself the credit which was due to others. He had long been silent under these charges—in the first place, because he did not think that the time had come when he could properly make the necessary disclosures; and in the second place, because he was conscious of having acted from pure motives, and because he felt assured that the time must come when those motives would be justly appreciated.

Now, to begin with the first of these charges. He met it with a positive denial of the fact. He had not undertaken, as a minister, the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. As a minister of the Crown he had opposed it, and he was beaten. When the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) had brought forward the question, the ministers had been left in a minority, and having been so left, he had not made any attempt to deprive the noble lord of the honour due to his success; but convinced, after what had occurred, that something must be done towards the settlement of the question, he had privately and unostentatiously laboured all in his power to effect an amicable settlement. “But,” said the hon. and learned gentleman, “why, having opposed this while in office, did you not resign when you found your opposition unavailing?" The hon. member, with his usual discretion, seemed to wield a two-edged sword, which equally wounded friends and foes. Was it a matter of inevitable necessity that ministers should resign when they could not carry into effect a measure to which they were favourable? If it were so, then why did not the present ministers resign when the House of Lords rejected the Reform Bill? He made no charge against them for not resigning; on the contrary, he contended that it was not fair to infer improper conduct, because ministers did not at once resign when they were defeated in their attempt to oppose or to carry a particular measure.

What were the circumstances under which he, having failed in his opposition to the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, continued in office? On the 9th of January, 1828, he was called on to form part of the ministry. There had been three recent changes of the government; the last, the administration of Lord Goderich, having existed eight weeks only. There were three parties in the state; the Tories, the Whigs, and the friends of Mr. Canning. In the government of Lord Goderich, two of these parties had been united, and yet that government came to an untimely end, from its own intrinsic weakness, before a blow was struck—before even parliament was assembled. In the month of January, the Duke of Wellington was called on to form an administration. The duke and himself were obliged to postpone the meeting of parliament till the 29th of January, and on the 26th of February, one month after his noble friend and he had taken office, the noble lord (Lord John Russell) brought the subject of the Test and Corporation Acts forward, and ministers were beaten on the question. Was there any gentleman who would have had them abandon the king, one month after a signal proof that no other party, nay, no combination of other parties, could make a permanent, or even a decent government? This he considered a sufficient answer to the charge, that, having failed in resisting a certain measure, he had not forthwith resigned office.

He now came to the heavier charge, to that connected with the Catholic question. For several years he had taken an active part in resisting concession to the Roman Catholics. He had taken that part from a serious doubt, whether, viewing the state of property in Ireland—the state of the Protestant church—the state of society in a country wherein the religion of the great majority was not, and could not be, the established religion of that country, the concession of equal political power to the Roman Catholics would extinguish its religious discord, and lay the foundation of ultimate repose. But a combination of circumstances had concurred to convince him that exclusion was no longer maintainable—that there was greater risk to the peace of Ireland, and to the security of the Protestant establishment, and Protestant interests, in attempting to prolong that exclusion, than in the removal of every existing disability under which the Roman Catholic laboured. When he had declared that his opinions were unchanged on the Catholic question, what did he mean? Simply this—that his apprehension of the consequences of concession—his fears that it would not produce satisfaction and harmony, remained the same; but still there was a certain and impending evil, which could only be averted by incurring the remoter hazards of concession, an evil which would, after desolating Ireland, leave the question of concession where it found it, or rather, with a diminished prospect of any satisfactory settlement.

Into some of the reasons for entertaining these opinions he could not then enter; but the events of the Clare election showed that matters could no longer rest where they then were—that there must be either a settlement of the Catholic question, or the elective franchise must be modified. But in a House of Commons recently elected, the Roman Catholics had an actual majority. There was, in truth, so large a mass of Protestant influence and Protestant opinion ranged on the side of the Roman Catholics, encouraging their vehemence, and defeating the efforts to restrain it, that further opposition to a settlement of the Catholic question became, in his opinion, equally mischievous and impracticable. With that opinion, what course was he bound to pursue? Was it his duty to consult his own personal interests, to maintain his own personal consistency, by continuing and encouraging resistance—or to say, as he had said, to the king, of whom he was the minister—"On the balance of public evils there is, in my opinion, less of hazard in concession than in continued and fruitless resistance, and therefore I advise concession?"—The question, so far as any charge could be justly preferred against him, was this. In giving that advice to the king, was he influenced, as the learned gentleman insinuated, by any desire of office, any wish to usurp honour or credit due to others, or by any base and interested motive of any kind?

He trusted he should be able now to vindicate himself for all time to come from any charge, or any suspicion, on that head.

After the discussions in the two Houses of parliament on the Catholic question, in the session of 1828—frequent communication took place between himself and the Duke of Wellington respecting the position of that question—and each of them had come to the conclusion, that it could not safely be left in the position in which it had stood for so many years—the members of the king's government having no opinion in common upon it, and the two Houses of parliament coming to opposite decisions.

He left town shortly after the close of the session, and the communication to which he referred was continued with the Duke of Wellington, in a confidential and most unreserved correspondence, from which he should quote those passages which would explain his own personal views and wishes in regard to the mode of settling the Catholic question. In the month of August, 1828, he wrote a letter to the Duke of Wellington, which, after entering fully into the general policy of attempting a final adjustment of the question, proceeds in these terms:—

"I have thus written to you without reserve upon the first and great question of all; the policy of seriously considering this long-agitated question, with a view to its adjustment. I have proved to you, I trust, that no false delicacy in respect to past declarations of opinion—no fear of the imputation of inconsistency, will prevent me from taking that part, which present dangers, and a new position of affairs, may require. I am ready, at the hazard of any sacrifice, to maintain the opinions which I now deliberately give—that there is upon the whole less of evil in making a decided effort to settle the Catholic question, than in leaving it as it has been left—an open question; the government being undecided with respect to it, and paralyzed in consequence of that indecision upon many occasions peculiarly requiring promptitude and energy of action.

"I must at the same time express a very strong opinion, that it would not conduce to the satisfactory adjustment of the question, that the charge of it in the House of Commons should be committed to my hands.

"I put all personal feelings out of the question. They are, or ought to be, very subordinate considerations in matters of such moment; and I give the best proof that I disregard them, by avowing that I am quite ready to commit myself to the support of the principle of a measure of ample concession and relief, and to use every effort to promote the final arrangement of it.

"But my support will be more useful, if I give it with the cordiality with which it shall be given, out of office. Any authority which I may possess, as tending to reconcile the Protestants to the measure, would be increased by my retirement. I have been too deeply committed on the question—have expressed too strong opinions in respect to it—too much jealousy and distrust of the Roman Catholics—too much apprehension as to the immediate and remote consequences of yielding to their claims—to make it advantageous to the king's service that I should be the individual to originate the measure."

The letter from which he was quoting concludes thus: "Consider these things well. If the question is to be taken up, there is clearly no safe alternative but the settlement of it. Every consideration of private feelings and individual interests must be disregarded.

"From a strong sense of what is best for the success of the measure, I relieve you from all difficulties with respect to myself. I do not merely volunteer my retirement at whatever may be the most convenient time—I do not merely give you the promise, that I will, out of office (be the sacrifices that I foresee, private and public, what they may), cordially co-operate with you in the settlement of this question, and cordially support your government; but I add to this, my decided and deliberate opinion—that it will tend to the satisfactory adjustment of the question, if the originating of it in the House of Commons, and the general superintendence of its progress, be committed to other hands than mine."

He trusted that he had thus shown, that, when he originally concurred in the course which was afterwards adopted, he had not been swayed by any considerations but those of public duty. He remained until the month of January, 1829, retaining a decided opinion that the government ought to bring forward the Roman Catholic Relief Bill without delay, but in the earnest hope and belief, that his support to that measure would be given by him in a private capacity. But in the course of that month it was proved to him to demonstration, that his retirement from office would aggravate the difficulties with which the Duke of Wellington had already to contend, to such a degree as to make them insuperable. He had, therefore, written to the Duke of Wellington a letter, which bore date the 12th January. He repeated, in that letter, that his retirement from office was the only step which he could take, which would be at all satisfactory to his own feelings; he deprecated, in the most earnest manner, the necessity that he should be the person to bring forward the question in the House of Commons, but he concluded that letter by the following declaration:—"But I will have no reserve with you. I know all the difficulties of your situation. I know how those difficulties have been recently increased, as well by the communications which have taken place with the bishops, as by the necessary recall of Lord Anglesey.

"You will do justice to the motives of the declaration which I am about to make, and you will take no advantage of it unless it be absolutely necessary.

"If my retirement should prove, in your opinion, after the communications which you may have with the king, and with those whom it may be necessary for you to consult—an insuperable obstacle to the adoption of the course which I believe to be unavoidable; in that case you shall command every service that I can render in any capacity."

On this letter of the 12th January he found the following endorsement, written at the time:—"When I wrote this letter, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Durham, had had an interview with the Duke of Wellington, and had declared to him that they were finally resolved to give their decided opposition to the proposed measure for the relief of the Roman Catholics."

The circumstance referred to in that memorandum, and the earnest appeal made to him by the king, not to shrink from proposing a measure which, as a minister, he advised the king to adopt, left him no alternative, consistent with honour and public duty, but to make the bitter sacrifice of every personal feeling, and himself to originate the measure of Roman Catholic relief. Could he, when the king thus appealed to him, when the king referred to his own scruples—to his own uniform opposition to the measure in question—when he said, "You advise this measure—you see no escape from it—you ask me to make the sacrifice of opinion and of consistency—will you not make the same sacrifice?" what answer could he return to his sovereign but the one he did return; viz., that he would make that sacrifice, and would bear his full share of the responsibility and unpopularity of the measure he advised? So much for the part he had taken on the Catholic question, and the motives by which he had been swayed.

While he totally abjured the doctrine of the learned gentleman, that he was bound to support reform because the advocates of reform had supported the Catholic question, he would never retract the opinions he had expressed with regard to those who, being politically opposed to him, had supported most zealously the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. He must repeat now what he had before said, that the conduct of those gentlemen who had given him their support on the Catholic question, was dictated by the purest and most honourable motives, and entitled that party to his respect and gratitude. He said so at the time; but did the hon. and learned member therefore think, that with "bated breath and whispering humbleness," he should shrink from offering opposition to this bill? Was he not at liberty boldly to say, that he thought the king's ministers were in error, if he thought them so? If he considered he was disqualified from taking the most decided part on reform, he would abdicate his functions, and not stand there to offer weak opposition to the measure. He would assert, however, that he was at liberty to offer this opposition, and, without any compromise of principle, or rendering himself liable to any charge of ingratitude or inconsistency, to resist to the utmost of his power the extensive measure of reform proposed by the ministers.

A great part of the speech of the hon. gentleman turned upon the question, not whether this measure was for the permanent advantage of the country, but who were the parties that caused the present excitement? The assumption was, that to the pressure of external force we must give way, and that we had no alternative but that of satisfying the craving of the people. The hon. gentleman had said, "How is it that we can have eyes and not see, ears and not hear, legs and not walk; how is it that all our senses do not convince us that reform must be conceded?" Would he ask the same question of the Marquis of Lansdown, who had eyes, and ears, and legs; but who had neither seen, nor heard, nor walked, having for years opposed parliamentary reform? The hon. gentleman was very severe on all doubt and indecision in matters of public concern. How was it, then, that the hon. and learned gentleman was himself still undecided on that important point, the ballot? How did it happen that, like a certain animal (to which he meant by no means to compare him) between two bundles of hay, the hon. and learned gentleman remained still balancing, and unable to decide, between two series of arguments? He had been accused of obstinately resisting the popular demand for reform, and he felt that from many, the majority, of the members of the present reform government, such an accusation fell with a particular ill grace. Had hon. members forgotten the events of the year 1827? Did they recollect, that in that year the Marquis of Lansdown, Lord Palmerston, and the two Mr. Grants, and other hon. gentlemen opposite, took office under Mr. Canning?—Mr. Canning, the uncompromising foe of all reform; and who emphatically declared in that House (and that, too, be it remembered, after these noble and right hon. gentlemen had joined his administration), that he would oppose reform to the last hour of his life. Perhaps it might be said, that though these were Mr. Canning's personal feelings with respect to this particular question of reform, it, like the Catholic question, might be open to every member of the government to speak and vote as he pleased without affecting its integrity. His noble and right hon. friends had not this resource; for Mr. Stapylton's recent "Life of Mr. Canning" placed the fact beyond doubt, "that Mr. Canning was not only determined to resist reform himself, but that he would not acquiesce in any member of his government supporting that question. According to Mr. Stapylton, there was a written record of the principles on which Mr. Canning's government was formed, in which were these words—"That the inconvenience of having one open question in the cabinet, made it more necessary to agree that there should be no other; that all the then acting members of the cabinet were united in opposing the question of parliamentary reform, and could not acquiesce in its being brought forward and supported by any member of the government." Thus it appeared that public men, differing upon other questions—actuated by no dishonourable motives—taking what are supposed to be enlarged and comprehensive views of the interests of this country, did dread the agitation of that question of parliamentary reform. Why did he state these facts? Not, be assured, for the purpose of condemning the inconsistency of his noble and right hon. friends, who had joined with Mr. Canning, and were now reformers, but to inculcate this lesson—that if so recently as 1827 these eminent, noble, and right honourable gentlemen saw no reason against their joining an administration pledged to the death against reform, he, who then as now was opposed to all such schemes of reform as the present, might see reasons—other than mere party obstinacy—for persisting in the same course in the year 1831. If his noble and right hon. friends shrunk from opening the question in 1827, surely it was not so very remarkable but that he might remain impressed with the same feelings of apprehension a few years longer? Why censure him for not being immediately convinced of the necessity of reform, when Lord Lansdown and the other members of Mr. Canning's cabinet—those very persons by whom it was now advocated in both Houses of parliament—had, up to this time, remained unconvinced? They knew the decided opinions of Mr. Canning upon the question; for in 1827 he refused to transfer the franchise of Grampound to Leeds, and yet he believed that Mr. Tierney was the only member of Mr. Canning's cabinet who stipulated for liberty to support the question of reform. The learned gentleman said, that pertinacious resistance to moderate reform was the cause and the justification of the present measure. Could he be surprised at resistance to the principle of reform, however moderate the shape it might first assume? Did he recollect the triumph of the noble lord, the author of this bill? Did he recollect his address to the most moderate of all reformers? Said the noble lord, "You have conceded the whole principle, when you agreed to transfer the franchise of Grampound to Manchester. How, then, can you stop there? To you who admit the principle, but refuse to go its lengths, I say, in the words of Cromwell, 'The Lord has delivered you into my hands.'" If, then, to make the slightest concession be a "delivering into his hands," what resource had the opponents of extensive reform, but to oppose the principle altogether? He had been complimented by the learned gentleman for having, on the first night of this discussion, sung his palinode—

Mr. Macaulay: I did not mention you; the term was directed to the right hon. ex-secretary of the Admiralty. All that was meant was, that the right hon. baronet's party took the whole credit to themselves of measures for the improvement of our systems of jurisprudence, commercial laws, and foreign policy, which had been forced on their reluctant conviction by the party now in office.

Sir Robert Peel: True, the hon. gentleman did not mention him by name, but the sarcasm was not the less pointed on account of the omission of the name. In introducing improvements into the commercial jurisprudence of the country, he had never arrogated to himself the praise that belonged to Sir Samuel Romilly; but what was to prevent him from effecting substantial reforms, supposing such reforms, though contemplated by others, remained unexecuted? The learned gentleman represented him as having taunted the government on the evening in which the present bill was introduced. So far from taunting ministers with their amendments of some of the details of the bill, as so many adoptions of the principles advocated on the opposition side of the House, as so many concessions to the wisdom of their opponents' policy, he stated, that he did not regard the alterations in the light of concessions, for that the essential principles of the measure remained wholly unchanged, and, therefore, equally objectionable. He added, at the same time, that he thought the country was in a better situation now for a deliberate consideration of the bill than when that of last session was under their notice—and therefore that the House and the country ought to feel grateful to the House of Lords for that decision, which afforded them an opportunity of reconsidering the fatal consequences of the former bill. He, for one, heartily rejoiced at that decision. He was confident that it would tend to the permanent advantage of the country. It was necessary to that calmness and deliberation fitting the legislature, and essential to the satisfactory discussion of the great question at issue, that the excitement which prevailed throughout the country with respect to the ministerial plan of reform should abate—that the public mind should be cooled somewhat from the fervour into which it had been artfully thrown—that some short time should be afforded and that opportunity, and that interval, and that requies, were furnished them by the decision of the House of Lords. Indeed, no persons should feel better pleased with that decision than ministers themselves, inasmuch as it had enabled them to lick somewhat into comeliness and grace another bantling of the same family. The right hon. secretary for Ireland seemed quite enamoured with this new offspring, vaunting much of the symmetry of its features, telling them, in the well-known that the daughter far exceeded in beauty her lovely parent. Without presuming to offer an opinion on the delicate question of female beauty, while he complimented the right hon. gentleman's gallantry and good taste in embracing the daughter in preference to the mother, he wished he could contemplate with any satisfaction the future progeny of reform. He wished that it might not prove degenerate in itself, and, in the words of the same Horace,

"O matre pulchrâ filia pulchrior,"

———"mox datura
Progeniem vitiosiore."

After what they had heard in the course of this debate, it was but fair to presume, that they should no longer hear this bill defended on the ground of the constitution. The noble paymaster appeared to dissent from this; but had he not himself said that evening, that if it had been his fortune to have lived at the period of the revolution, he would have voted for the exclusion of Catholics from political power, and also for the maintenance and continuance of the small boroughs? But surely, if these small boroughs were now contrary to the first principles of the constitution, they were equally so at the time of the revolution. The noble lord had, in the course of the debates, cited that part of the bill of rights which declared that "elections should be free." Now, it would not become him to question the historical and constitutional knowledge of the noble lord; but when he quoted these words as an argument in favour of the present bill, particularly that part of it which disfranchised the small boroughs, it became necessary to remind the House of the true meaning of the words "elections shall be free," and of the intention with which they were inserted in the bill of rights. Those words were introduced into the preamble of the bill of rights to meet a particular specific grievance, which had no connexion whatever with small boroughs or the reduced number of electors. The grievance to be redressed was, the direct and repeated interference of James II. in the election of members of parliament. That monarch was then deeply engaged in his design of restoring the Catholic worship to its pristine supremacy; and, for that purpose, he had issued orders to the several sheriffs to make out lists of electors and candidates who would vote for the repeal of the test act—the barrier against the admission of the Catholics into parliament and public office. Without entering into a minute history of James's proceedings, he would cite one anecdote in point: it was told by Sir John Reresby, in his Memoirs.* It appeared that the king requested the writer to stand for York. "If your Majesty so please it," replied Sir John, "I will, but it can only be on one condition." "Name it." "Simply, that your Majesty will so order it that none of the corporation shall vote but those I may choose." The King gave the order, and Sir John was returned. And it was to meet this, and similar gross violations of corporate rights, that it was declared in the bill of rights, that "elections shall be free," evidently showing, that there was not the remotest connexion whatever between that declaration, and the disfranchisement of small boroughs.

One word with respect to what had fallen last night from the hon. member for Calne; if, indeed, it was not something worse than superfluous, to offer any additional observations, after the unanswerable and matchless speech of his right hon. friend (Mr. Croker) beside him. The hon. member dwelt much on the necessity of the legislature evincing, what he called an animus, for adapting its enactments to the growing wants, and intelligence, and spirit, of the age. He was ready to admit, that if there did not exist an elastic spirit in the constitution, expanding itself to meet the temper of the times, that there was something imperfect, something that required alteration; and he would further admit, that if the boroughs were made of such iron stuff that they would not yield to the impression of improvement, that their doom ought to be from that moment sealed. But would any one, after looking at the acts of the legislature, and of late years in particular, say, that the animus of this House lagged behind the improvement of the times? Was it not rather in advance of the spirit of the times in what it did on the Catholic question, and on that of free trade? In what instance, during the last five years, would the hon. member point out, that that House had not kept pace with the growing improvement of public opinion? or, if the hon. gentleman preferred the phrase, with the "spirit of the age?" If the hon. gentleman could not point out any, it was most unwise to attempt, by precipitate means, and rushing on blindly in the dark, to effect a change which was silently and gradually in operation, and which violent interference on our part could only obstruct and retard. Had hon. members duly considered the effect of the proposed change in our constitution, upon our immense colonial possessions? If it were said, that the population of India was of so low a grade of intellect as not to understand the nature of good government, he thought that was an additional reason for caution in unsettling a dominion which had its foundation in the feelings, in the habits and prejudices connected with established usage, and the prescriptive exercise of authority? Then, to look nearer home, let them consider the effect which their freely and cavalierly destroying the smaller boroughs must inevitably have upon the minds of the people. If there was any feeling which, more than another, should be cherished in this country, it was that of regard—scrupulous regard—for the interests of property, and for the preservation of those political rights which were the birth-right of freemen. Was the feeling cherished, by destroying small but honourable boroughs, merely because they were small?—for no effort was made by ministers, to distinguish merely the small from the nomination boroughs, though the distinction was as practicable as it was just. It might be very well to say, that the nomination boroughs must be got rid of, but why not destroy the principle of nomination, by extending the constituency, and reserve the elective right to the borough? This was the very course pursued in the case of some boroughs. Take Midhurst for example—the mound Midhurst; they had been told, over and over again, that the representation of that place belonged to a hole in a wall; but after all, that very hole in the wall was to retain its right. It was true that the constituency was enlarged, and why not apply the same principle to other boroughs, at least equally admitting of its application? The noble lord confessed that this great and immediate change in the constitution could not be made without peril; and his noble colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, added, if he thought it would have the effect of injuring the landed interests, he would, instead of forwarding the measure, oppose it. This remark of the noble lord seemed to imply some latent doubt as to its working; but the noble paymaster had not distinctly described the nature of the peril he anticipated. Was it to be found in the great extension of the franchise? The noble lord said, that by giving a vote to £10 householders, it would be conferred on a class of persons of intelligence, who could not be easily led astray by those whose interest or whose wish it might be to deceive them—a class of persons who could not be deceived into a belief, as the electors of Preston had been, that the Civil List for the exclusive use of the sovereign, and for his individual purposes, amounted to £1,000,000 a year. He could not concur with the noble lord in opinion, that £10 householders were a class qualified to draw profound conclusions on the intricate questions of commerce and legislation, or exempt from the bias of party violence, or deaf to the delusions and exaggerations by which they would be assailed. He had been favoured with the copy of a manifesto, addressed by the Walsall Political Union to the new constituency of that embryo borough; and, if that manifesto contained the appeals and arguments best suited to their taste and capacity, he could not consent to any compliment paid to them at the expense of the electors of Preston. The House, however, might judge for themselves, for he would read an extract from this document:—“The reign of oppression is nearly at an end; the fiat of the people of England has gone forth, and the decree has been confirmed by our patriot king, that might shall no longer triumph over right. The bill of reform must pass; and our future destinies will be placed in the hands of upwards of a million of Englishmen, whose true interests are identically the same with those of the still greater body of their unrepresented fellow-countrymen. You, fellow-townsmen, will have an important trust to perform in the great work of national regeneration. Reform in parliament will matter little to us, if we do not send men there who will do the business of the people; we entreat—we implore you, then, in the name of our common country, to look well to the character and political principles of the men who may offer themselves as candidates for your suffrage. Do not vote for any man who will not pledge himself to insist upon the most rigid economy in the expenditure of the public money, as well as to vote for the repeal of all taxes which press with peculiar weight upon the poverty and the industry of the nation; especially the iniquitous corn-laws, the assessed taxes, and all acts imposing taxes or restrictions upon the circulation of political knowledge—those odious and oppressive imposts, whose only effects are, by inducing ignorance, to lead to the commission of crime, and to hide from the public gaze the open profligacy and the insidious workings of corrupt and tyrannical governments. The abolition of the monopoly of the East-India Company—the instant and utter extinction of that abominable traffic in human flesh and blood, denominated negro-slavery—an earnest endeavour to procure for the honest electors of Great Britain, the protecting shield of the Ballot—and the limitation and duration of parliaments to a period not exceeding three years—on each and all of these important questions, the man who desires to be your representative ought to give distinct and positive pledges that he will act in accordance with your opinion and feelings; or, if his own opinion shall come into collision with these, that he should then resign the trust which you shall have delegated to him, and thus afford you an opportunity of choosing some other person whose political opinions shall be more congenial with your own." He did not mean for a moment to question the right of the workmen of Walsall to urge their opinions on these difficult and most complicated questions, nor did he mean to say, that all which they did was not very honestly intended; but what he was afraid of was, that when the country got a popular parliament, it would jump to conclusions—conclusions that might be right abstractedly, but which, from the great variety of interests they embraced, required the nicest caution and consideration in their management. In the same way with respect to property: he had no fear of its destruction by confiscation; but he was afraid that some popularity-seeking Chancellor of the Exchequer might be forced by a democratic assembly to propose the repeal of taxes, and to adopt steps, the ultimate tendency of which would be, to shake the confidence of the country in the security of property; and that confidence once shaken, there would be an end to the chief stimulus to productive industry, the foundation of all our wealth, power, and eminence. Let them look to the present state of France—France, after her glorious revolution—France, relieved from the load of an hereditary peerage, and an established religion—France, with her popular king, whose only occupation it would seem was to run about seeking the vive le roi of his enthusiastically devoted subjects. And what was the state of this favoured country, which had so far outstripped us in the race of reform, notwithstanding the zealous efforts of our reform ministers? Let hon. members, anxious for the solution of the question, read the foreign correspondence of The Times, a journal above all exception as a witness in this case, being an advocate for reform, and distinguished for the ability of its foreign correspondents—what is their account of the state of France in respect to the employment and happiness of the industrious classes, whose especial benefit is to be promoted by reform—"Every post," says the French correspondent of The Times, "brings fresh intelligence to Paris from all those departments where any considerable portion of the inhabitants depend for their support on the prosperity of their trade or commerce, of the extreme state of misery and depression to which they are reduced; as an instance, you may take that portion of the French territory which is nearest to the shores of England. The towns of Arras, Bethune, and Hesdin, including the whole line of coast from Calais to Etaples, are described to be in a state of privation bordering on famine." This was the condition of a country with a decreasing revenue, a declining commerce, and a daily increasing army. Was it to be inferred, from his stating these facts, that he thought that the French were not justified in resisting the illegal exercise of power? No such thing. But he said, that the effect of all such rash and precipitate changes in government was, to suspend commerce, to derange industry, to put a stop to credit, and injure almost to death the manufacturing and labouring classes. His object was, to show that any violent change in the constitution of a country exposed to hazard its dearest interests, and that no such change could be advisable, unless under the pressure of a necessity, the existence of which in this country he utterly denied. "I oppose the bill," said the right hon. baronet in conclusion, "not that I expect to be successful here in my opposition, but because I will enter my solemn protest against incurring the responsibility of making one of the greatest and most precipitate changes in a constitution, which was the very best that ever existed in the annals of history. You should well consider the ultimate effects of the change you are about to accomplish on the three parts of the empire. You are about to disturb those proportions which were settled at the respective periods of the Union, and to add to the already existing causes of discontent and excitement in Ireland, new sources of jealousy and complaint, which it is wholly unnecessary to open. It is not in the spirit of hostility, but from the common interest which I take with the ministers in the welfare of the country, that I implore the government not to suffer this House to separate for the recess, without publicly proclaiming the course they mean to pursue with respect to the proportions of representation for the different parts of the empire, particularly Ireland. If you are determined upon not adding to the number of the Irish representatives, say so; but if you are not so determined, and feel that you must ultimately concede, I say give way at once, and by doing it graciously and in time, make the merit and favour your own. I offer no opinion on the justice or expediency of the concession, but call upon ministers to at once avow their intentions. Do you, or do you not, mean to yield to the demands of the Irish members? I repeat, Sir, my opinions are decidedly opposed to the bill. I expected that the present ministers would bring in a reform bill on their acceptance of office; but I believe, in my conscience, that the concessions made by them to the popular demands have been far more extensive than was at all necessary. I was not prepared for so extravagant a measure, still less could I have thought that they would have ventured to bring in so large a measure of reform within three months after they had taken office, and while the country was yet agitated by the events of the French Revolution. No issue of this discussion can be satisfactory, for, decide as we may, there must be much irreparable evil. I may be obliged to submit by necessity to a plan of reform which I cannot successfully oppose; but believing, as I do, that the people of this country are grossly deceived, grossly deluded, in their expectations of the practical benefits they will derive from reform, I shall not be precluded from declaring my opinion, and opposing that reform as long as I can. My opinions being thus wholly opposed to ministers on the question of reform, I am precluded from taking any part whatever in the settlement of the question. I am satisfied with the constitution under which I have lived hitherto, which I believe is adapted to the wants and habits of the people. I deplore a disposition, which seems too prevalent, to innovate unnecessarily upon all the institutions of the country. I admit, that to serve the sovereign and the public in an office of honour and dignity, is an object of honourable ambition; but I am ready to sacrifice that object, rather than incur the responsibility of advocating measures which, in my conscience, will tend to the destruction of the best interests of the country. I will continue my opposition to the last, believing, as I do, that this is the first step, not directly to revolution, but to a series of changes which will affect the property, and totally change the character, of the mixed constitution of this country. I will oppose it to the last, convinced, that though my opposition will be unavailing, it will not be fruitless, because the opposition now made will oppose a bar to further concessions hereafter. If the whole of the House were now to join in giving way, it will have less power to resist future changes. On this ground I take my stand, not opposed to a well-considered reform of any of our institutions which need reform, but opposed to this reform in our constitution, because it tends to root up the feelings of respect, the feelings of habitual reverence and attachment, which are the only sure foundations of government. I will oppose to the last the undue encroachments of that democratic spirit to which we are advised to yield without resistance. We may make it supreme—we may establish a republic full of energy—splendid in talent—but in my conscience I believe fatal to our liberty, our security, and our peace.

The House divided on the question, that the bill be read a second time. Ayes, 324; Noes, 162; majority, 162. The House then adjourned till the 17th of January.

JANUARY 20, 1832.

Lord John Russell moved the Order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a committee of the whole House on the Parliamentary Reform Bill for England.

On the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair,—

Mr. Croker expressed his surprise and regret, that ministers still adhered to their determination of forcing on the bill before the House had been supplied with the documents necessary for the elucidation of its most important details, and implored them not to force the House into a premature consideration of the measure.

Lord John Russell, in reply, denied that any reason had been adduced which ought to influence the House towards postponing the committee upon the bill itself, or that there had not been laid before them ample information to consider other parts of the bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the noble lord appeared to have greatly misunderstood the observations of his right hon. friend. The objection of his right hon. friend went to this—that the information on this subject which ministers themselves considered material, not having been yet supplied, it was improper, without that information, to go into the committee, which ought, therefore, to be postponed until
